only £120 to one curate, and £130 to another; one of the curates being removable at the pleasure of the Dean, the rectory having being attached to the deanery for a great many years. The income of the deanery was small, being derived from the Dean's share of the chapter's estates, and did not exceed £500 a year. In the reign of Queen Anne, by statute, the rectory of Tatenhill was appended to the deanery; and by an Ecclesiastical Commission Act of 1850 it was enacted that thereafter no Dean should accept, take, or hold with his deanery any benefice not within the city. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners in 1852 augmented the deanery prospectively up to £1,000 a year. On the death of the late Dean, Canon Champneys was appointed to the deanery, and had taken possession both of the deanery and the rectory. He (Mr. Acland) had obtained a copy of a letter which the Dean had addressed to one of the Commissioners, in which he stated that when he was offered the deanery he was informed that the rectory of Tatenhill was attached to it, and he stated his desire and intention to make adequate provision for the spiritual wants of the whole parish; that he authorized the insertion in the public journals of a statement to that effect on the 7th December, and that having made himself more fully acquainted with the wants of the parish he was fully prepared, in the event of its being decided that the rectory was still annexed to the deanery, to carry out his intention. He would now proceed to answer the Questions. As to the first Question, whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recognize the appointment of the Dean of Lichfield to the rectory of Tatenhill, that was a legal question, the decision of which did not rest with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. As to the second Question, the Commissioners had taken the opinion of the Law Officers, and the Law Officers were agreed that the Dean of Lichfield could not accept or hold the rectory; but they were not all agreed on the question whether the emoluments passed to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. But the Dean, he was bound to say, had forwarded to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners a case, together with a statement of the opinion of Sir Roundell Palmer and Mr. Mellish, and their opinion was to the effect that Canon Champneys, on becoming Dean of Lichfield, became ipso facto rector of Tatenhill. The hon. gentleman's next Question was whether the patronage of the living of Tatenhill was not restored to the Duchy of Lancaster. It was not possible, in the present uncertain state of the law, for him to say, whether the patronage of the living had been restored to the duchy. The next Question was, whether the Commissioners contemplated any new legislation in that matter? It was not quite certain that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in the discharge of their duty as trustees of a public fund, had any interest in that matter; but he might express a hope, which was shared by many of them individually, that the Government would think it necessary to introduce fresh legislation on the subject. As to the last Question, with reference to the revenue of the deanery of Lichfield, apart from the living of Tatenhill, now producing about £2,000 per annum, he had already stated that the deanery, exclusive of the rectory, was in 1852 prospectively augmented to £1,000 a year. That augmentation was made under an Order in Council, which was not revocable without legislation.

IRELAND—POLLING-PLACES—THE LAW OF CIVIL BILLS.—QUESTIONS.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he would beg leave to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Government intend to make any and what arrangements to obviate the present danger and inconvenience admitted to exist from the insufficient number of polling-places in Ireland; and, whether, no General Election being apparently imminent, similar facilities as to the number and distance of polling-places should not be at once afforded in Ireland to those that exist in England and Scotland? In the absence of the hon. Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce) he would also ask the right hon. Gentleman the Question which stood in his name—namely, Whether he intends to introduce a Bill this Session to amend the Irish Civil Bill Acts?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said he was not aware of what amount of danger or inconvenience was admitted to exist in Ireland from an insufficient number of polling-places, nor that the applications for additional polling-places had of late years been numerous; but no doubt there were considerable imperfections in the present law on the subject, and there were obstacles in the way of the Privy Council acting on the applications which might come or which had come to them, in a few cases, from Quarter Sessions, for additional polling-places. He thought some legislation would be necessary on the subject, and the matter was under consideration. With respect to the Question as to the amendment of the Irish Civil Bill Acts, that matter was under the consideration of the Attorney General for Ireland.

EXPENSES OF THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he has taken any steps to carry into effect the Resolution of the House of Commons (May 26, 1868), viz.:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, all sums required to defray the expenses of the Diplomatic Service ought to be annually voted by Parliament, and that Estimates of all such sums ought to be submitted in a form that will admit of their effectual supervision and control by this House?"

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, the Foreign Office, many months ago, before the accession of the present Government to Office, had directed its attention to that subject. A Bill had been prepared and was ready for introduction, for the purpose of dealing with the Diplomatic Service; and it was proposed that during the present year the expenses of the Diplomatic Service should be provided for under the Estimates.

CASE OF THE "TORNADO." QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What is the present position of the "Tornado" case; if any steps have been taken for the recovery, from the Spanish Government, of the property of which the crew of that vessel were plundered, and for the payment to them of the indemnification claimed for the wrongful imprisonment and the treatment they experienced from that Government; and, if he will lay upon the Table such further Correspondence as has taken place respecting the "Tornado" and her crew?

MR. OTWAY, in reply, said, the hon. Gentleman was no doubt aware that the Tornado had been pronounced a good prize by the court at Cadiz. But, in consequence of an assurance having been given by the Spanish Government that the defendants would have an opportunity of appealing to the Council of State, and that assurance not having been fulfilled, Her Majesty's Government had instructed our Minister at Madrid to apply to the Spanish Government that the case should be re-heard before a special tribunal. At the same time a request was made that the Tornado should not be sold. No reply had yet been received to that request, which was made in December last; but a communication had been made to Sir John Crampton from the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs that he was waiting for the decision of the Minister of Marine and the Colonies on the subject. Of course the claim of the crew must await the issue of the principal case. There would be no objection to lay the further Papers on the table.

THE CIVIL WAR IN HAYTI.

QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any communications have been received as to the state of affairs arising from the civil war in Hayti; and, whether orders have been given to the West Indian authorities with a view to the protection of the interests of British residents in that Republic, should the necessity for it arise?

MR. OTWAY, in reply, said, that the only case for damage to British interests in Hayti which had been brought under the notice of the Government had reference to the seizure of certain vessels for the infraction of a blockade, the validity of which had not been acknowledged on account of its inefficiency. Commodore Phillimore had promised that twenty-four hours' notice should be given before any bombardment should take place, and that he would give every facility for the protection, as far as possible, of the lives and property of Her Majesty's subjects. The President Salnave had informed Commodore Phillimore that the people of Hayti deprecated anything which could lead to a misunderstanding with Her Majesty's Government, and that he had given orders to afford every protection to Her Majesty's subjects.

HER MAJESTY'S SHIP "BUZZARD" AND THE HERNE BAY OYSTER COMPANY.—QUESTION.

MR. PEMBERTON said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, in answering a Question on Monday last with reference to the employment of Her Majesty's ship "Buzzard" on behalf of the Herne Bay Oyster Company, he intended to state that the ship was sent on the report of one of the Inspectors of Fisheries, made by him officially as an inspector; whether he is aware that the Herne Bay Company is by their Act placed under the supervision of "the Inspectors of Fisheries under the Salmon Fishery Act, 1861," of which body Mr. Pennell is not a member; whether he is aware that Mr. Pennell was one of the promoters and original shareholders in the Company; and, whether he will produce copies of all the Reports or Letters, whether of inspectors or other persons, in consequence of which the Board of Trade recommended the ship to be sent?

MR. BRIGHT: The Report to the Board of Trade, which decided the action of the Board of Trade and of the Board of Admiralty, was, I believe, made by Mr. Pennell in his official capacity. The hon. Gentleman supposes that these matters are under the Salmon Fisheries Act of 1861; the fact is, that in certain specified events, the Salmon Fishery Inspectors are to make inquiry if the company's ground has been properly cultivated. The hon. Gentleman asks whether I am aware that Mr. Pennell was one of the promoters and original shareholders in the Herne Bay Company? I am not aware that Mr. Pennell is a shareholder of that company, but I believe he had some connection with it in its origin, but before he became inspector he had ceased to have a connection with the company. The only official Paper is the Report of Mr. Pennell. Probably the hon. Gentleman will be satisfied with seeing the Report at the Board of Trade; if so, if he will call he may see it. If after that he sees any public ground for having it printed, I have no objection; but I think he will perceive that my answer meets all the points requiring reply in his Question.

REGISTRATION (IRELAND) ACT.
QUESTION.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, When the money will be paid to the Clerks of Unions and Town Clerks in Ireland awarded for special services under the Voters Registration Act of last Session?

MR. AYRTON said, that the accounts had been examined, and the money would be speedily paid.

COLLECTION OF RATES AND TAXES.
QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SIMEON said, he would beg to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether it is the intention of the Government to give effect to the recommendation made by the Select Committee on Poor Rate Assessments, to the effect that Local Collectors should be appointed to collect the Local Rates and the Taxes payable by the Taxpayers resident in the parish?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, he thought the recommendation of the Select Committee in question was most valuable, but he was afraid that effect could not be given to it this Session. It formed part of the whole subject of the machinery of local taxation, the importance of which the Government fully recognized, and was also connected with the task of reducing to something like order the present chaotic state of local finance. The Government was fully alive to the importance of that matter.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—
AMOUNT OF ENDOWMENTS.
QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will be good enough to furnish the House with a statement of the property belonging to the Established Church in Ireland, with which the Government propose by their measures to deal?

MR. GLADSTONE: Many of the figures relating to the subject are, in their present state, only matters of opinion; but I think it is our duty to give them, as the basis of facts, as far as we can supply them, in any matter that may be desirable, and we shall therefore be most happy to meet any inquiry which may tend to the production of facts. With regard, however, to those figures which are matters of computation, I would ask the House to take them as opinions only. As I believe that the figures, though not very numerous, which I gave this day week, were not quite accurately reported, and as the matter is one of importance and of great interest, perhaps the House will allow me to recapitulate them in order to avoid misunderstanding. The estimated amount of the property of the Irish Church, without reckoning anything either for the fabrics of glebe-houses and the fabrics and sites of churches, constitutes one point, the other being the estimated amount of charge under the provisions of the Bill as they stand. The figures, as I stated them, were as follows; but I will now add one or two more particulars for the sake of greater clearness. I estimated, on the part of the Government, that the probable proceeds of the tithe rent-charge—speaking in round numbers, as I shall do throughout—would be £9,000,000. The proceeds of the leased lands and perpetuity-rents, or the value of them, might, I said, be taken at £4,000,000. The value of the glebe lands and other lands, let out for short terms, would be not less than £1,500,000. The value of the lands in the occupation of ecclesiastics might be taken at £750,000; and the value of stocks, moneys, and other miscellaneous funds, not being tithe or land, also at £750,000. The total of these figures is £16,000,000. Then, with respect to the charge, it stands as follows:—The value of the life interests of all incumbents—that is to say, of bishops, dignitaries of cathedrals, and parochial clergy—will be £4,900,000. The value of the interests of the curates, as they are proposed to be taken, will be £800,000. The value of the lay compensations will be £600,000; the bulk of those lay compensations being to either officers of cathedrals, and to clerks and sextons of parishes who hold freeholds. The estimated value of advowsons is £300,000. The conjectural amount of private endowments is £500,000. The building charges, which can be computed with a certain degree of accuracy, and which must be paid in order to get possession of the glebe-houses, is £250,000. The sums required to make good the provisions in respect of the various Presbyterian charges and Maynooth College, £1,100,000. The expenses of the Commission, with all its officers, for ten years, at £20,000 a year, will be £200,000. The total of these figures is £8,650,000, against the sum on the credit side of £16,000,000, leaving a difference of £7,350,000. But as, on the whole, I thought the results would come out rather better than worse under the provisions of the Bill, I took them at £16,000,000 as the whole—£8,500,000 for the amount of charge, and £7,500,000 for the amount of surplus.

THE INDIA CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATION.—QUESTION.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is the fact that gentlemen have been recently selected for the office of Examiners at the India Civil Service Examination who were at the time private tutors in the Universities; and, whether it is the fact that the practice of selecting some of the Examiners from among the members of the Irish Universities has been of late years discontinued?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to say, that the Civil Service Commissioners rarely appoint as Examiners for the Civil Service of India gentlemen who are engaged in private tuition. To make, however, a rule of absolutely excluding gentlemen so engaged would be tantamount to refusing the assistance of some persons of exceptional efficiency. No one is ever knowingly appointed to examine his own pupils, and three appointments have been cancelled in the past year lest this untoward result should arise. No practice of selecting as Examiners members of Irish Universities as members of Irish Universities having ever prevailed, it cannot be said to have been discontinued. Such persons have often been appointed, and will, no doubt, often be again, because they were the best men available; not because they were Irish. It may console my hon. Friend to know that, in a list containing all the names of Examiners for the Indian Civil Service since 1858, I find seven connected with the Irish and only five connected with the Scotch Universities.

ASSESSED RATES BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. CHARLES FORSTER inquired, Whether the Government intend to move the second reading of this Bill on Thursday next?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, that it was not the intention of the Government to proceed with the Bill on that day, but at the earliest opportunity after the Easter Recess. The local authorities in many large towns took great interest in the measure, and, in accordance with their wish, expressed through their representatives, the Government had determined to postpone the second reading in order to allow them the opportunity of discussing the provisions of the Bill among themselves.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

CONSTITUTION OF THE BOARD OF TREASURY.—QUESTION.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH rose to call attention to the Treasury Minute of the 28th December, 1868, and to make further inquiry as to the constitution of the present Board of Treasury. The hon. Member said the House was aware that on the formation of the present Government certain important alterations were made in the constitution of the Board of Treasury as well as in that of the Board of Admiralty. His right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Childers) had already made a clear statement in reply to an inquiry as to the changes which he had thought it his duty to make in the Board of Admiralty, and his only reason for now interposing was his anxiety to elicit from some member of the Board of Treasury a similar statement in reference to the changes which the Government had deemed it necessary to make in that Department. The Office of Lord High Treasurer had been in commission for more than 150 years. From time to time the commission had varied in numbers; but he need not enter into its past history, because the practice, with which all hon. Members were familiar, of appointing three Junior Lords under the First Lord and the Chancellor of the Exchequer was of comparatively recent date. The practice originated, he believed, with the recommendation of a Committee of that House which sat to inquire into miscellaneous expenditure in the year 1846, and which made a distinct recommendation to the effect that the number of Junior Lords should be reduced from four to three. That recommendation was followed, and from that time to the present there had been three Junior Lords. Now, if there were no other reason, he should say that the number having now been varied, contrary to the expressed opinion of a Committee of that House, it was essential that an explanation on the subject should be given by Her Majesty's Government, and the more so on account of the great importance attaching to one of the offices now newly created. He accordingly asked a Question of the Secretary to the Treasury in reference to this subject shortly after the opening of the present Session, and his hon. Friend immediately promised to lay on the table the Minute explaining the changes which had been made. He little thought, therefore, that it would be necessary for him again to trouble the House on the subject. But, in point of fact, the Minute which had been laid upon the table in compliance with his inquiry was so unsatisfactory and ambiguous that he deemed it his duty to re-open the question. The Minute had reference only to one out of the four subordinate officers of the Treasury, and even then did not convey any clear idea of the duties assigned to that officer. With the permission of the House, he would read one or two paragraphs from that Minute. It stated that Her Majesty's Government had

"deemed it expedient to assign to the Third Lord of the Treasury, Mr. Stansfeld, certain duties, and the investigation and decision on certain subjects connected with the business of the Department, which will have the effect of placing him on a different footing from the Junior Lords; and, in consideration thereof, they recommend that there should be assigned to him a salary of £2,000 a year, and a Private Secretary, with a salary of £150 a year."

Now, he wanted to know what were the "certain duties" intrusted to the Third Lord, and what were the subjects in respect to which the House might regard him as a responsible Minister of the Crown. A newspaper statement had been made, apparently by authority, at the time of the formation of the Government, and to that statement he would refer in order to ask whether it were really intended to indicate the position of the Third Lord of the Treasury. The Times of the 10th of December last stated that the Third Lord

"will undertake so much of the work of the First Lord as has hitherto been thrown on the Financial Secretary, and he will, in fact, represent the department of receipt, whereas the Financial Secretary represents that of expenditure."

His (Mr. Sclater-Booth's) term of Office at the Treasury was not, it was true, very protracted, but he confessed himself unable to understand what was meant by the "department of receipt." He had no desire, however, to prejudge the question, nor to deny that some redistribution of the work of the Financial Secretary might have become necessary, especially during a very laborious Session. He would merely remark that the necessity, however urgent, was less so at a time when the duties of the Leadership of the House were dissociated from the position of Chancellor of the Exchequer, as they had been during the last three years; and it was his own opinion that, if the Financial Secretary was to be the spokesman of the Board of Treasury in that House, he certainly should be acquainted with all the business that went on at the Treasury. He should have thought therefore that the Financial Secretary, rather than the Permanent Secretary, should have forwarded such heavy business as could not be dealt with by himself to the Chancellor of the Exchequer or to the Third Lord as the case might be. The Government appeared to attach much importance to the appointment of Third Lord, seeing that the salary of the office was £2,000 a year, and the holder of it obtained the rank of a Privy Councillor. It was but right, therefore, that the House should be informed of the reasons which had led to the change. The Minute said nothing whatever about the augmentation of the number of Junior Lords of the Treasury, but this matter was one with regard to which the public had not been left altogether in the dark, because the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Truro (Captain Vivian), in addressing his constituents, subsequent to his acceptance of Office, told them very plainly what was to be the nature of the position which he was to occupy. The statements, however, which he on that occasion made were, in some respects, of so startling a character, that he felt induced to ask some higher authority at the Treasury whether they were to be accepted without qualification. The hon. and gallant Gentleman began by making some very unpleasant remarks as to the discharge of their duties by some of his predecessors in Office, whom he by implication described as drones; and against such a description he (Mr. Selater-Booth), for one, must protest, for he was sure there were in the late Government no harder working men than his hon. Friends the Members for Bridgnorth (Mr. Noel) and Peeblesshire (Sir Graham Montgomery). The hon. and gallant Member for Truro, on the occasion to which he referred, went on to say—

“The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government is determined to abolish these sinecure offices, and in their place to establish two of great importance, with very important duties. One of them is to be at the Treasury, and to have financial control over the Civil Service Estimates and general finance. . . . To the other of these important offices Mr. Gladstone has suggested to Her Majesty to recommend me. The duties of that office are to supervise the whole finance of the army. I am to watch the Estimates, to watch the accounts, and to diminish both the one and the other if I can. In short, with my office and my staff at the War Office—

He might have said “my rod and my staff.”—

I am to be called the War Lord of the Treasury, and I am to exercise a general control over the financial administration of military affairs, subject, of course, to my Chief, who is the Secretary of State for War.”

Now, he should like to know whether that statement contained a correct definition of the position which the hon. and gallant Gentleman was to occupy. If so, it appeared to him to place an absolute extinguisher on that important change which had lately been made at the War Office by the appointment of a Controller-in-Chief and his Assistant, by whose exertions, as the House was well aware, very great reductions had last year been effected in that Department. In the second place, the appointment, as described by the hon. and gallant Gentleman, added one more to the already somewhat large number of heads of departments in the War Office. The Secretary of State had an Under Secretary of State, a Military Under Secretary of State, and a Financial Under Secretary of State, and if in addition to those he was to be burdened with a Lord of the Treasury, he (Mr. Selater-Booth) must say that, in his opinion, a confusion of that distinction which ought to prevail between two great Departments in the State must be the result. He wished, before he sat down, to say one word with regard to another appointment—that of a noble Marquess as one of the Treasury Commission. The statement which appeared in the papers at the time of the appointment of the noble Lord to whom he referred was to the following effect:—

“The new Administration has hit on a patent process for the utilization of young Peers. The Marquess of Lansdowne, whose large fortune would prevent his accepting any small official berth with a salary attached, is to be made an extra Lord of the Treasury without salary.”

Now, hon. Members, no doubt, remembered with great respect the services of the grandfather of the present Marquess of Lansdowne, and no one in that House would, he felt assured, venture to dispute the claims which that nobleman had upon his party. It was, however, a somewhat new doctrine that a noble Lord, who happened to be a man of very large fortune, was to be placed in a position of authority and responsibility without, at the same time, accepting the salary which usually attached to the performance of the duties of his office. He did not exactly know whether the grandfather of the noble Lord to whom he was referring received any salary when, without holding Office, he was a member of a Liberal Cabinet; but the precedent, at all events, was not one which could be urged in support of the present arrangement. The House had within a very short time expressed it to be its opinion that even in the Diplomatic service the anomaly of having unpaid attachés should be done away with, and it was not at all desirable, he thought, that the circumstances of the appointment to which he was calling attention, should pass unnoticed by the House; and he need hardly say, that neither in that case—the case of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (the Third Lord of the Treasury)—nor the case of the hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian), whose talents he had often occasion to admire, had he any wish to disparage their fitness for the performance of the duties imposed upon them. His object in bringing the question forward was simply to get from the Government information on the subject of those appointments. As to the noble Marquess who had been appointed a Lord of the Treasury, he would only add that while he had no doubt he would make an excellent public servant, yet he should have thought that the office of private secretary to some great officer of State would have been a more appropriate channel of introduction to public life than that which he had received. Many gentlemen entering public life would, he felt, have some reason to be jealous at seeing a person appointed an officer of the Treasury without the salary which properly belonged to such an appointment because he happened to be a nobleman possessing a large fortune. In conclusion, he hoped he should receive from the Government satisfactory explanations on the subject.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think, Sir, the hon. Member for North Hampshire (Mr. Sclater-Booth) has only done his duty in calling the attention of the House to this subject, and thus affording the Government an opportunity of giving an explanation with respect to it which, it appears to me, can be very easily given, and which, I trust, he will regard as satisfactory. By what has been done a very considerable change has, there is no doubt, been made in the Board of Treasury. The House is aware that the Treasury is constituted under a Royal Commission to supply the place of a Lord High Treasurer, just as the Board of Admiralty supplies the place of a Lord High Admiral. There is no limitation whatsoever to the Prerogative of Her Majesty as to the number of Commissioners she may appoint, and there is no violation of any official or other rule in creating a larger number of Lords of the Treasury than it has been usual to appoint for some years past. The arrangement must stand or fall according to its effects as regards the expediting of Public Business. All, indeed, that is requisite is that the number of appointments should be in accordance with that which, in the judgment of the House, may be necessary for the efficiency of the Department. It cannot be said that there is anything either proper or improper in the number of officers beyond this, and there is no rule in the matter, except that a Committee of the House of Commons on a previous occasion recommended that the Lords of the Treasury should not exceed three. Now, the Junior Lords of the Treasury have—at all events—ever since I have been in Parliament, occupied a position which no one, I think, can regard as satisfactory. One of them has generally assisted the Patronage Secretary to discharge his duties in this House, and the other two did little except settle the superannuation allowances of clerks. But although those Lords had little to do, it seems to me to be impossible to deny—indeed, my hon. Friend who has just spoken has admitted—that the Department has been considerably overworked, and that the pressure of business has been too great, especially on the Secretary to the Treasury, who was expected to be constantly in this House, watching the conduct of a great mass of its business, and who was obliged to get through an immense amount of work in his department besides. The first object of the changes which have been made was to remedy that state of things, and the best way to effect that object was deemed to be this—to leave the Secretary of the Treasury in possession of the duties which he exercised in regard to this House, but to relieve him from a portion of the official labours through which he had to go, so as not to overload a single officer in a department where the business was sometimes very involved. The Third Lord of the Treasury was created with that view, and the business of the office has been divided entirely for the purposes of internal convenience, but the change made is tentative, and subject to alteration. In making that arrangement we allotted to each of these Gentlemen the duties which we thought best calculated to promote the efficiency of the Department. Very likely in many cases we have not made so good a division of the duties as future experience will enable us to make. At any rate, we have made the attempt, and it is not the only one that has been made, because in 1805 the Treasury became convinced of the evils which arose through the disappearance of the whole Board at every change of Government, and they appointed Mr. Harrison the first Permanent Secretary, dividing the business between him and the Parliamentary Secretary. That, as the House is aware, is the constitution of several great Departments of State. The Permanent Under Secretaries of the Colonies and the War Office have each stated parts of the business of their Departments, the remainder being done by the Parliamentary Under Secretary. The arrangement we are now discussing is an extension of that principle, and makes the constitution of the Treasury so far analogous to the office of a Secretary of State. As to the duties of the Third Lord of the Treasury, they are very important. He has a large portion of the business of the office to transact. If I were to describe it in general language, I should say that his duties rather tend towards those which are discharged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, while the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury tend to those which have been ordinarily discharged by the Secretary of the Treasury. The division of duties may not be a logical or complete one, but that is the direction to which it points. For instance, to the Third Lord belongs the duty of looking after the revenue; to the Secretary of the Treasury that of looking after the expenditure. That is the sort of idea upon which the present tentative division has been made. Then the third Lord has been and will be most useful and valuable to the Department in conducting those inquiries into the expenditure of other Departments of State which form so important a part of the duties of the Treasury. It has been the practice previously to appoint gentlemen at the head of large Departments at the Treasury to make these inquiries, together with the permanent officers of other Departments. That practice has not been, on the whole, beneficial to the public service—first, because those gentlemen, being permanent officials, did not always command the weight to which their abilities and knowledge might entitle them; and, in the second place, because they were already fully occupied. The time which they took in investigating the business of other Departments was too often subtracted from the necessary business of their own. It is a great advantage to have a Gentleman in the Treasury holding high Parliamentary position, and having the full confidence of the Government of the day, who will be able to serve in the conduct of such inquiries, giving the weight of his authority and official position to the Reports which may be made during these inquiries, without, at the same time, materially disarranging the business of the office to which he belongs. That is the best answer I can give to the Question which has been put as to the functions of my right hon. Friend the Third Lord of the Treasury. Well, then, I am asked whether a newspaper account of his duties is correct, which account, my hon. Friend (Mr. Sclater-Booth) says, appears to have an official origin. I should have thought that my hon. Friend's official experience would have shown him that it was not very likely that such a statement would come from the Treasury, when it stated that the Third Lord would discharge certain of the duties hitherto performed by the First Lord. As my hon. Friend knows, the First Lord of the Treasury, being at the head of the Government, does not take any part in the departmental business of the Treasury; nor was it likely that it would be stated on the part of the Treasury that the Third Lord was put there to watch over the receipts of the revenue, a duty which, of course, we know belongs to a different Department altogether. I hope, therefore, my hon. Friend will believe that statement was not inserted by the direction of the Lords of the Treasury, and I can assure him that it does not contain a correct statement of the duties of the Department, which are, as nearly as possible, what I have described them to be. Then I am asked as to the duties of my hon. Friend the Member for Truro (Captain Vivian), and am requested to explain what it was he thought necessary to address to his constituents on this subject. No doubt my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Truro will, if he thinks necessary, explain that address. I think it would be a most evil practice to take upon ourselves the responsibility of each other's election speeches. All that I am answerable for is the actual duties intrusted to my hon. Friend. On the occasion referred to he described those duties perhaps a little emphatically, but in substance pretty correctly. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War will, I am sure, fill that office very ably; but he has not been a man of war from his youth up, he was not born in camps and cradled in the field. It will be no derogation from him to say that he is not thoroughly versed in all the technicalities of the military art. It was necessary that the Under Secretary for War should be in the House of Lords, because the administration of the War Department is a subject in which the House of Lords, from the fact that it contains so many retired military officers, takes a keen interest. A great many of the questions connected with this Department are for this reason nowhere more keenly debated, and it was, therefore, necessary that some representative of the War Department should have a seat in the House of Lords, the presence there of the Commander-in-Chief making the necessity still greater. I do not understand that any one blames the arrangement, which indeed was the arrangement of the late Government, under which the Under Secretary for War is placed in the House of Lords. But then my right hon. Friend (Mr. Cardwell), from the little defects in his education to which I have referred, felt the want of a military assistant in this House. The Lords of the Treasury not having been overdone with work hitherto, we thought it a good arrangement that the hon. Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) should be associated with the Secretary for War, in order to give that technical assistance and advice which his great abilities enabled him to give in transacting the business of the Department in this House. Then, as to the remaining Lord of the Treasury, the Marquess of Lansdowne—it is hardly fair to represent his appointment as nearly equivalent to that of a private secretary. The Treasury has no representative in the House of Lords. Many questions, however, arise there which it is necessary that somebody should answer on behalf of the Department, and I hope no one will think we did wrong in endeavouring to establish a connection between the Department and the House of Lords by having a distinct representative there. The duty which the Marquess of Lansdowne specially discharges at the Treasury is that which was formerly discharged by the Lords of the Treasury—the arrangement of the superannuations that come before the Department. He has also been employed in several other matters, and has given real and very efficient and useful assistance to the Department. That fact I do not understand to be called in question, and nobody who knows my noble Friend would doubt it. What I understand to be complained of is, that we have appointed the Marquess of Lansdowne without giving him £1,000 a year. Well, in the first place, that is a fault very easily remedied. But, in the next place, I doubt whether it be a fault. There being such a pressing necessity for his appointment—the Lords of the Treasury being fully occupied in the public service: the Third Lord in discharging very important duties, the hon. Member for Truro in assisting the Secretary for War, and the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. Adam) in assisting the Patronage Secretary for the Treasury—and the presence of a representative of the Department in the House of Lords being expedient, it did not appear to me that, considering the ample resources of my noble Friend, it was necessary to give him a salary, when he was willing, patriotically, to discharge the duties intrusted to him without a salary. Of course, this change in the Treasury—for it is a very considerable change—necessitated a change in the conduct of business in my office, because, when you have two Gentlemen performing duties there, a responsibility is thrown upon the head of the office quite different in its nature from that which will be thrown upon him if one person only be so engaged. It is his duty in that case to preserve a unity in the work of the office, for were there not one common centre it is quite possible that my two hon. Friends might, without intending it, diverge in their principles of action; the Department might hold different language upon matters brought under our cognizance there, and might adopt principles which could not be reconciled. It is only on this ground that I have undertaken rather more of the Treasury work—duties ordinarily discharged by the Secretary of the Treasury—than, perhaps, it has been usual for persons in my situation to undertake. I have done so very much with the view of maintaining uniformity in the decisions and conduct of the office. I have done so, also, for another reason—because the Government has come into Office pledged, if to anything, to economy. I am not so foolish or so vain as to suppose that I can discharge the business better than the two able Gentlemen by whom I have the honour to be assisted. But if you want to enforce economy, you must throw into the scale of financial retrenchment all the weight you can get; and high Office is a great element of strength and one which a Government anxious for economy ought not to neglect. It is a very different thing whether a recommendation comes from a Secretary, a Third Lord, or a Chancellor of the Exchequer. I therefore thought it my duty to throw my own personal exertions into the scale, so that the recommendations of the Treasury should have as much weight as it was in my power to give. That, I think, is a full answer to the Questions which have been asked. I hope what we have done will be found to work satisfactorily, and will also be found not to diverge from the principles on which public offices ought to be constituted. Whether the change works well or not, however, it has been made with the sole and single object of promoting public economy and departmental efficiency.

MR. HUNT: The House, I think, will agree with me that the subject brought under its notice by my hon. Friend (Mr. Sclater-Booth) is one of very considerable importance, and one quite worthy of being discussed by the House; and I cannot say that the explanations given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer are, to my mind, at all sufficient with regard, at least, to one of the changes made by the present Government. It will have been noticed by the House that, when the right hon. Gentleman came to discuss the expediency of the appointment of a Junior Lord of the Treasury without salary, he seemed to feel that he was getting into smooth water, and had to deal with a subject far less difficult than that of the appointment of the Third Lord of the Treasury. I confess that, after listening attentively to the right hon. Gentleman's explanation as to the respective duties of the First Lord of the Treasury and the Financial Secretary, I feel myself very little wiser than I was when he began. The right hon. Gentleman did not, I think, give us a very clear account of the particular duties assigned to those two functionaries. With regard to the Department of the Revenue, I should fancy that the duties connected with that particular Department would lie with the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself. I cannot, therefore, understand why the duties ascribed to the Third Lord of the Treasury should not be as well performed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman, no doubt, truly states the case when he says that in increasing the number of the Junior Lords, nothing has been done contrary to law; but we must remember that the number of the Lords of the Treasury was fixed some years ago upon the recommendation of a Select Committee of this House. The salaries of those officials were also fixed. Since 1847, the number of Lords of the Treasury has been five, three being Junior Lords. Now, what I complain of is this—that an additional Junior Lord of the Treasury has been appointed by the present Government without any notice to Parliament, or statement of the reasons for such appointment. The real state of things, then, is this—a new office has been created in the Department of the Treasury second only to the First Lord in political rank, in salary, and in dignity. Though such a creation may not be altogether illegal, I think there can be no doubt that it is against the spirit of the Constitution that such a new office of this importance should be created by the Government by a stroke of the pen without any notice being given to Parliament or the country. The office that is really created is that of Chief Financial Secretary of the Treasury, and the post of Financial Secretary has been reduced to that of Assistant Financial Secretary. [Mr. Lowe: No, no!] If the House will bear with me, I will endeavour, in a few words, to prove my statement. The information in respect to the office is very meagre, but the Minute states the intention to be that, under the instruction of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Permanent Under Secretary shall transmit to Mr. Stansfeld all Papers relating to certain subjects, to be transmitted by the latter from time to time to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that with respect to certain Minutes, the signature of Mr. Stansfeld shall be taken as the decision of the Board. You here state in effect that the act of a particular Member of the Board shall be the decision of the Board. I want to know then whether this new functionary is not really created the Chief Financial Secretary. I repeat that, by a mere stroke of the pen, a new office has been created without any communication being made to Parliament on the subject. Now, the year before last, the very contrary to this was done. There were two officers in the Board of Treasury with the same salary, and each a Member of the Privy Council. A Bill was brought in to abolish one of the offices, and to substitute that of Parliamentary Secretary in its stead. That arrangement was ultimately effected. In the present case, however, a new office has been created without any communication on the subject to Parliament. I think that this is a precedent which ought not to be followed. It may, no doubt, be said by the Government that the House of Commons will still have a voice in the matter, inasmuch as the House may object to the salary of this Third Lord when it comes before them in the Estimates. For one, I should be sorry to see the House of Commons placed in the position of discussing so important a matter at such a time. I confess, I should feel the greatest difficulty myself in expressing my opinion upon the question when it was presented to me in the shape of a particular Vote in the Estimates, because its consideration then must have a personal bearing, which I should be sorry to give it. I have not the slightest wish to disparage the merits of the right hon. Gentleman who has been so appointed. Indeed, I am certain that the right hon. Gentleman has every claim upon those with whom he is politically connected, and that his high honour and ability qualify him for one of the highest offices in the Government. I say, however, it is my opinion that there was no necessity for the appointment of a second Secretary of the Treasury of the same calibre as that of the Financial Secretary. The Government ought, at all events, to have shown us that the work of the Financial Secretary is too great to be discharged by one man, or by those who have hitherto filled the position of Junior Lords. The Minute of the appointment says nothing of the kind. I certainly should be surprised if such a representation had been made by the present Financial Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Ayrton); for we all know how constant has been his attendance, and how indefatigable he was, when out of Office, in taking part in the discussion of every subject connected with the business of Government. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman has always shown himself to be a master of every subject which came under his notice. If I were asked to select a man who was thoroughly competent to discharge even two men's work, I should certainly be disposed to name the hon. Gentleman who now discharges with such efficiency the office of Financial Secretary. I have had some experience of the labours of Financial Secretary of the Treasury. When I was at the Treasury the question was mooted, whether a Lord of the Treasury ought not to be appointed to assist me in my duty. I, however, declined to receive such assistance, considering it wholly unnecessary. The duties of Secretary of the Treasury are much more considerable when the Chancellor of the Exchequer is also the Leader of the House; but the time chosen for creating this new office is one which cannot offer even that as a reason for such an appointment. It seems to be a question whether the man was wanted for the place, or the place wanted for the man. I do not want to say anything personal, but we all know that it has been stated that the greatest difficulty in the way of forming the new Government was the immense number of claims for Office. Doubtless, the result of the General Election reduced that difficulty considerably, inasmuch as several right hon. Gentlemen of Liberal principles, who had previously filled high offices in the Government had failed to recommend themselves to the respective constituencies whom they wooed. I should wish, however, to know whether, if the number of claimants for Government appointments had been fewer, we should have heard of such an official as a Third Lord of the Treasury. I am inclined to think we should not. I do not see how the right hon. Gentleman opposite has made out any case for this new creation, nor for giving this Junior Lord double the salary of any of the other Junior Lords. If the Head of the Government and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had shown that it would conduce to the advantage and convenience of the Department to assign it to the three Junior Lords' duties, which would prevent their being drones and would make them working bees, I am sure we should never have heard this discussion; but they have thought proper to create what I say is a new office, and I think the House will watch rather jealously the creation of this new office by a stroke of the pen of the First Minister without some explanation of its necessity to the House. I now come to the duties of the War Lord of the Treasury, and

I confess that when I read the speech of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Truro (Captain Vivian), in the papers, I was a little startled to find from it that he was to control the whole military expenditure; because last year we had a discussion which resulted in the expression of opinion that military men were the most unfitted to control military expenditure, and the decision of the late Government was that it was highly expedient that the civilian element should be introduced into that Department, so that the military authorities at the War Office should not be left with the sole control of military expenditure. The Secretary to the Treasury and the Secretary for War under Lord Russell's Government were in the House at the time the discussion took place, and they approved of the view expressed by the Treasury; and I must say I am very much surprised now to find that the present Government have selected a military man to control military expenditure. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has told us that, although he cannot exactly answer for all the expressions used by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Truro (Captain Vivian), yet they must be taken as substantially correct, and if that be so I think they require a little more explanation than we have just had given to us. If the account given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer is correct, the hon. and gallant Gentleman's position appears to be that of a sort of military interpreter to the Secretary for War, to explain to him the meaning of military terms, and, when he makes official statements in this House on military matters, he will endeavour to keep him straight. My experience of the abilities of the Secretary of State for War leads me to suppose that he requires no such assistance, because I have confidence in my right hon. Friend that he is able perfectly to master military terms and matters without the assistance of an officer of the army. But supposing his modesty is such that he feels a diffidence with regard to these matters, and requires assistance, it seems to me that it is not to the Treasury he should go for assistance. It is the duty of the Treasury I take it to control public expenditure, and not to supply military interpreters to civilian Secretaries of State for War. But I want to know whether the War Lord of the Treasury is a member of the Board, and if he is to have a discretion with regard to military expenditure; because, if so, I should prefer that he did not go so often to the War Office. I understand he passes his departmental time at the War Office, and not at the Treasury. Now, I should much prefer that he should breathe the atmosphere of the Treasury than the atmosphere of the War Office, because those who are surrounded by military men are less likely to check military expenditure than those who pass their official hours at the Treasury, where the habit is to criticize and object to every item of expenditure that comes before them. The explanations then with regard to the Third Lord and the War Lord with which we have been favoured, in my opinion require supplementing. In neither instance do I exactly understand what their functions are. I now come to the Sixth Lord of the Treasury. Shortly after the Union with Ireland—in 1807, I believe—a sixth Lord was added to the Commission. Up to that time the number varied. For the most part there had been five, but from 1807 to 1847, there were six Lords, and the reason given for the appointment of the Sixth Lord was the increase of business in consequence of the Union with Ireland. But in 1846, as my hon. Friend has stated, a Committee, appointed by the House, investigated the miscellaneous expenditure; and having considered, in the first place, whether the salaries should be reduced, they recommended in their Report the reduction of the number of the Junior Lords to three rather than to continue the full number at reduced salaries. It is rather remarkable that the Sixth Lord at that time was the Earl of Shelburne, the father of the present Marquess of Lansdowne the present Sixth Lord of the Treasury. The Earl of Shelburne resigned his office, and it has never been filled up until this appointment of his son. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has treated, I think, rather lightly this appointment of rank and wealth to an office without salary. I think, however, the House will be of opinion that this is rather a grave matter: and the question is, are offices of State to be put up to a sort of Dutch auction, and disposed of, not to the best man for the position, but to the man who will take the office with the least pay, and is none, so much the better. That is a very serious matter. Not only is it serious to the country at large, but also to public men. It is, I think, a question for consideration whether such a course of procedure is quite just to public men. I do not wish to disparage the merits of the noble Marquess; I have not the honour of his acquaintance, and I have no doubt he ably performs his duties if he has any to discharge. But what I want to know is this—Would he have been placed in his present position without salary, but for the rank and wealth he enjoys? If not, I want to know, considering the competition—if I may say so—that exists amongst public men to attain official dignity, ought those who have adventitious advantages to be lighter weighted than those they compete with? I consider it is an honourable ambition for a man to wish to serve the Crown in high offices of State, and it is seldom that a man can do so without first beginning in the lower ranks, and a generous rivalry exists among competitors for these minor appointments. Nothing gives a man so great an advantage towards his being selected for high official position as two or three years experience in Office, and no one will deny that he is a much more competent man for Office than if without that experience. If you get young Peers to be utilized in this way you will give them that official experience which will enable them to distance all competitors when they seek higher offices. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) asks what objection we can raise to the appointment of a Sixth Lord of the Treasury if he has no salary? but I answer, will not the noble Lord who takes that place, without pay, have superior claims to the first vacant place with pay? In this country, where all public men, Peers or Commoners, should start on an equality, it is objectionable—certainly it is novel—to give either class an advantage by placing its members in high official position, even though they receive no salary for the duties they perform. Some explanation beyond what has already been given should be offered to the House for this novel proceeding. If work is to be done by a man, whether he be Prince, Peer, or peasant, he should receive a salary for it. The labourer is worthy of his hire, and if the noble Marquess has duties to do which occupy his time he should receive a salary. I make no apology for detaining the House, because, although the Navy Estimates are of great interest, the matter which my hon. Friend has brought before us is of considerable importance and ought to be discussed at an early period of the Session. The Chancellor of the Exchequer's explanation does not satisfy me that the changes which have been made in the constitution and functions of the Treasury—as far as I understand them—are justifiable, nor can I comprehend from the right hon. Gentleman's remarks in what manner the duties of the Treasury are divided among the Junior Lords.

MR. CARDWELL: So much has been said respecting the alteration that has been made in the mode of conducting the business of the War Office that I should like to say a few words in answer to the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken. When I first entered Parliament we had in this House, to take part in the debates on military matters, the Secretary of State for War and the Colonies, the Secretary at War, the Paymaster of the Forces, and two members of the Board of Ordnance; the Treasury was responsible for the Commissariat, the Home Office was responsible for the Militia, and there were no Volunteers. When I look at the Board of Admiralty I see that my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty has associated with him no less than three Colleagues in this House; and, if my memory serves me, my noble Friend Lord Herbert, with all his great knowledge of the business of the War Department, urged upon the Committee presided over by Sir James Graham—and that Committee agreed with him—the great importance and necessity of providing additional assistance in the War Department. Moreover, when my right hon. Friend opposite (Sir John Pakington) vacated the office I now have the honour to hold, he expressed the opinion, which I am sure he sincerely felt, notwithstanding his competence to discharge the duties of the post, that his successor would be the better for some additional assistance in the House of Commons. When I found that my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government had submitted my name to the Queen for my present office, I took the liberty of saying I should want some professional assistance in giving satisfactory answers to the numerous questions that would be asked me in the course of discussions in this House. It was an old saying Cucullus non facit monachum, and a man putting on the wig and gown of a barrister does not necessarily become competent to give answers on all questions of law and equity. So a man does not become acquainted with all the difficult and complicated questions which military knowledge involves merely because his Sovereign has chosen him to fill the office that I now have the honour to hold; and I assure the House, with perfect frankness, that when my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury told me that he had submitted my name to Her Majesty's approval for the office of Secretary for War, I told him that what my predecessors had felt I felt in an increased degree, and I trusted that he would give me the assistance of an experienced military officer to aid me in taking part in the discussions in this House. I will not allude to the remarks made by my hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Vivian) to the electors of Truro; but this I will say, that I have felt the manner in which my hon. and gallant Friend has devoted his talents and his industry to the laborious duties of the office which he has accepted to be most useful. That is the arrangement which has been made, and no unconstitutional change has been introduced. My hon. Friend has not signed any letters or done anything that could be regarded as unconstitutional in one holding his position, but he does give me assistance which I greatly value in my endeavours to reduce our military expenditure. Then the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Hunt) has said that it used to be the object to have civilians rather than military men employed in the War Office. But the right hon. Gentleman must have forgotten that upon the constitution of the late Government, a military Friend of mine, a man most competent to fill any office, was placed at the head of the War Department, and that the office of Under Secretary of State was also allotted to a military man. The late Government also made two other military appointments in the War Office, for which I fully admit they deserve great credit. I allude to the appointment of that distinguished man, Sir Henry Storks, and his Assistant, General Balfour. These were all military appointments and yet the right hon. Gentleman argues against military appointments. Now, what is the course taken by the present Government? They have placed a civilian at the head of the War Department and another civilian (Lord Northbrook) in the House of Lords, whose ability in the conduct of Business in this House is still fresh in the memory of hon. Members. That is the case with respect to the War Department, and I will venture to say that, from the experience and knowledge of my hon. and gallant Friend, the House of Commons will derive great advantage in the discussion of military affairs. I do not know that I am so competent to speak with regard to the duties of the Treasury. It is a long time since I had the honour of filling the office of Secretary of the Treasury; but this I know, that no one can have taken part in the discussions of this House, or in any Department of the State, without seeing the great labour that has been thrown of late years on the Secretary of the Treasury. During the short time when I held an office to which little labour was attached, my right hon. Friend who sits beside me (the First Lord of the Treasury) used frequently to appeal to me to take the Treasury business and to manage it before Committees of this House, when it would have been more appropriately conducted by some member of the Treasury; and I am inclined, from my own experience, to affirm strongly that the Treasury did require additional force in order to exercise in this House a more complete and adequate control over the expenditure of the country. As for my right hon. Friend the Third Lord of the Treasury, I am sure that every one who knows him will admit that there was no man whose services it was more desirable to enlist on the side of economy. Then, fault has been found with the appointment of a noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) who represents the Treasury in the House of Lords. What is the fault? Is it that the Treasury should be represented in the House of Lords by a competent person, or that he should be appointed without salary? But if he had been appointed with a salary, it would have been in direct violation of the last Report of the last Committee that had inquired into the subject. Therefore, if the appointment was right it was more respectful to the House, and more in accordance with the precedents which we are desirous to follow, that we should have made the appointment without salary than with it. I hope the House will see from this explanation that the object of the Government was to promote retrenchment and economy, and to do so in the manner which seemed to them best calculated to carry the wishes of the House into effect.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

MR. CHILDERS said: Mr. Dodson, in the Speech from the Throne, which was communicated to this House, Her Majesty stated that the Estimates which would be submitted for our consideration would provide for the efficiency of the Service, but at the same time would be reduced in amount, and it is my duty on the present occasion, in moving the first Vote of the Navy Estimates, to explain the manner in which the pledge so given has been and will be fulfilled, and to ask the Committee to pass Estimates for the Naval Service, which I hope to be able to show will fully maintain its efficiency, and at the same time be considerably less in amount than those which were laid before Parliament during the last two years. Sir, I appear, of course, at a disadvantage in having to give full details as to these Estimates—first, because I had, with my Colleagues, not more than eight weeks to prepare them; and, secondly, because I have the honour to follow in office my right hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry), who, probably more than any civilian in this, or I might almost say in any, country, is well versed in all the details of naval affairs, and whose explanations on former occasions have always been marked with so much ability, and received with so much satisfaction by both sides of the House. But although many hon. Members may find in points of detail that I shall not be able to give them such clear and exact information as greater experience would enable me to do, the Estimates themselves and the statements with which I propose to support them will indicate a clear policy on the part of her Majesty's Government in dealing with these great Services, a policy which I trust the House, and I feel confident the country, anxious as it is for economy, will be prepared to endorse. In the first place, I will state to the House briefly what are the facts and the figures of the present Estimates compared with those of former years. The Estimates provide for the Effective Service of the Navy, for the Non-effective Service of the Navy, and for the Transport Service which the Navy conducts for the Army. For the Effective Service we ask a sum of £8,164,768, for the Non-effective service £1,515,525—total for the Navy proper £9,680,293, and for the Army Service £316,348, or in all £9,996,641. From that we must deduct the contribution of £70,000, which will be paid by India towards the expense of her naval protection, and the net amount which the country will be called upon to pay for the Naval Service will therefore be £9,926,641. The Estimates of last year, after making allowance for a change in the manner of account, gave for the Effective Service £9,332,579, or, making the Indian deduction, a net amount of £9,146,316; for the Non-effective Service £1,474,111, or a total for these two Services of £10,620,427. The Estimate for Transport Service, in the same way, after deducting £17,029 for a change in the manner of account, provided £333,571, or a total of £10,953,998. Taking the comparison on this basis, the difference between this year's Estimates and those of last year shows a reduction in the present year of £1,027,357. But it has been customary to state the Estimates in a slightly different form, and I will follow those who have done so in previous years, although I do not think that that is the best form. I will allow as against the expenditure the income connected with the Naval Service which will be paid into the Exchequer arising from the sale of old stores, ships, and other matters. Well, making allowance for them, we propose to spend £9,996,641, and estimate to receive £396,623, so that the net charge upon the country from the Chancellor of the Exchequer's point of view would be £9,600,018. Last year my right hon. Friend (Mr. Corry) proposed to spend £11,177,290, and estimated to receive £443,292; the net amount being £10,733,998, or £1,133,980 more than our Estimate. And going back to the year before I find that the actual charge in 1867-8 was £11,342,798, not including the expenditure on account of the Abyssinian Expedition, whereas our Estimate is £9,996,641, the difference in our favour being £1,346,157; and if the extra receipts be deducted on both sides, as we estimate for 1869-70, and as they were actually received in 1867-8, we have almost the same result—namely, a difference in our favour of £1,368,856. Sir, I think, after stating these figures, I may say to the House, in general terms, that the present Estimates show a reduction upon those of the current year, 1868-9, of about £1,100,000, and upon the expenditure of the previous year of about £1,300,000; and this reduction of expenditure is pretty fairly distributed all through the Votes. I do not think that in any of the Effective Votes is there any excess at all proposed in the Estimates of the current year, excepting only in one of the Medical Votes, where the excess is occasioned by the rather large additional charge which it is proposed should be borne by the country in connection with the Contagious Diseases Act. There is, however, a slight increase in the non-effective charge of the moderate amount of about £40,000 or £50,000. Then with respect to the construction of the Estimates I may be allowed to say that I think it is satisfactory that we have reverted this year to the form of Estimate which was in use before last year. I suspect that my right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Corry) entirely agrees with me in thinking that nothing could be more inconvenient than the arrangement of last year, which showed the Navy Estimates in a different form from the Army Estimates. I am glad to say that I have been able to induce the Treasury to revert to the former plan, which gives to Parliament a real, and not an imaginary statement of the charge for the Navy. The difference is mainly this, that instead of swelling the Estimates by including in them provision for stores supplied, and work done for other Departments or Governments, because the payments pass through our books, and making all extra receipts in the shape of repayments by these Governments and Departments go into the Exchequer, we ask for the amount that will really be required for the naval service, and that alone. And that is not only convenient as a matter of account, but also advantageous in the interests of economy, because I believe that when, merely as a question of account, you have two alternative methods of estimate you ought to choose the one that gives you the smallest Vote. You may be perfectly certain that if you grant the larger sum the departmental tendency will be to spend it; but you have not the same security that the extra receipt will be obtained. Therefore I hold, and have held in previous years, and in the Committee on Public Accounts, that the better plan is to estimate for the smaller rather than for the larger amount. There is another change in the construction of the Estimates that I think will also be of public advantage. It has been customary to show in connection with the naval establishments on shore only those salaries which are directly charged on the establishments, but to omit from these Votes what may be very considerable amounts in the shape of pay and allowances, the officers being held to be borne on ship's books, and therefore paid under the Vote for the Fleet—that is Vote 1. In regard to the present Estimates, there was not time for me so to re-cast them as to make all these transfers; but I have been careful throughout the Estimates to show in connection with every establishment not only those officers who, as in previous years, were charged on the Vote, but also the number of those other officers supposed to be officers of ships, and borne on the ship's books. There are also one or two trifling changes in the construction of the Estimates which I have made in consequence of the inquiry conducted by the hon. Member for Lincoln's (Mr. Seely's) Committee of last year. It is very important in connection with the dockyards that we should, as far as possible, provide in the Dockyard Vote only for the charges which actually belong to the dockyard; and, on the other hand, that we should enter as dockyard charges those that were previously contained in other Votes, but which should really be included in the Vote for the Dockyards. As an instance of the former, I may refer to the cost of the Water Police which now appears as a distinct item of Vote 14, instead of in the Dockyard Vote 6. These are the principal changes in the arrangement of the Estimates, all of which, especially those which tend to economy, I hope the House will approve. The effect of these changes upon the comparison between the Estimate of last year and the Estimate of this year is as follows:—Apparently, according to the printed Estimates, we have made a reduction in the Wages Vote of £274,000; but from that sum must be deducted £75,000 in connection with troop-ships transferred to Vote 17, so that the real difference between the Vote of last year and that of this year is only £199,000. In the same way, with respect to the second Vote—for Victuals and Clothing, apparently, on the face of the Estimate, there is a reduction of £163,000; but that reduction must be diminished by extra receipts amounting to £90,500, so that the real reduction is £73,000. So, also, in connection with the dockyards, there is apparently a reduction of £137,000, but the real reduction is £127,000. Again, in the case of Naval Stores, the reduction is apparently £91,000; but the extra receipts connected with those stores are £34,000, so that the real reduction is only £57,000. Then in the Vote for ships building by contract, there is an apparent reduction of £325,000; but to this must be added a sum of £6,000, transferred from the Dockyard Vote, for salaries and expenses of dockyard officers connected with contracts; so that the real reduction is £331,000. Again, in the Transport Vote there is an apparent saving of £34,000; but the actual reduction, after allowing for transfers is only £21,000. These corrections being made give the result, which I have stated before—namely, an actual diminution of charge of £957,000, as shown on the face of the Estimates, or—allowing for the Indian contribution—of £1,027,000.

And now I pass from the very dry region of figures to the main questions affecting these Estimates—the three great subjects with which the Admiralty have been engaged, the results of which are shown on the face of the Estimates, and which I shall do my best to explain fully to the House. The first of those subjects is the reform in the organization of the Board and the subordinate departments of the Admiralty affecting all the Votes for Naval Establishments. The second is, the policy of the Government in relation to our fleets and our men; and the third is our policy in relation to the dockyards and to ship-building. These are the three great questions of interest with which the Navy and the Admiralty are concerned; and, as to each of them, I will, as briefly as possible, state to the House what our views are and what is the policy that we are anxious to pursue. The first point—namely, with respect to the organization of the Admiralty and its establishments—naturally divides itself into two; one, the question concerning the governing body of the Admiralty—as to which it has been my duty to give some information to the House in reply to a Question from the hon. and gallant Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone)—the other the general reduction in the naval establishments both in London and in the country, which we have attempted to make by concentrating offices and diminishing routine. With regard to the first of those two questions, that relating to the governing body of the Admiralty, the House, or those hon. Members who have attended the debates on the subject of late years—who, I regret to say, are not so numerous as they were formerly—must be aware that a controversy of very great importance has been going on, and had not, until a short time since, received a solution. That controversy, I think, may be said to have begun with the Report of the Commission which, in the year 1860, was appointed to inquire into the management of the dockyards. When I say it begun then, I do not mean to deny that the organization of the Admiralty had been called in question much further back than that; but the first time at which that subject was fairly grappled with since 1832, at the hands of a public body, was in the years 1860-1, when the Commission, on which the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Dalglish) sat, made a most able and exhaustive Report on the whole question of dockyard management. It was referred to that Commission to consider the control and management of the dockyards, the purchase of materials and stores, and the cost of building, repairing, altering, fitting, and re-fitting ships; and they reported that the control and management of the dockyards were inefficient. They gave as causes of this—first, the constitution of the Board of Admiralty; second, the defective organization of the subordinate departments; and third, the want of clear and well-defined responsibility; and they proposed to cure those evils—by making the Minister entirely responsible for the control and management of the dockyards; by authorizing him to appoint a Controller General subordinate to him; by making the superintendents of the dockyards instruments for carrying out the Controller General's instructions; by putting under the Controller General the Storekeeper General and the Director of Works and by requiring the Accountant General, although not his subordinate to prepare such accounts as he wanted. The Commission, having made these recommendations, reported on the 11th of March, 1861, and on the 12th of March, 1861, the following day, by a curious coincidence, a Committee of the House of Commons was appointed which went into the whole constitution of the Board of Admiralty and of naval control, not only with respect to the organization of the dockyards and their superintendence, but also as to all other matters, such as the control of the fleets and the government of the Navy, with which, as well as the management of the dockyards, the Admiralty are concerned. And before that Committee also the controversy raged as to what ought to be the constitution of the governing body, whether, preserving their general character, in any minor respects the present arrangements might be reformed, and generally how the defects in the Admiralty superintendence might be most conveniently remedied. Unfortunately the Committee which had to deal with so important a question made no Report of its own, but merely reported to the House the evidence it had taken, the result being that those who wished to ascertain the opinions of the Members of that Committee must wade through a large mass of testimony, and endeavour to gather those opinions from the questions put to the witnesses. I think there can be no doubt that the tendency of the Committee and the weight of the evidence adduced was adverse to the first proposal of the Commission—namely, for the abolition of the Board of Admiralty and the appointment of a distinct Minister. I find that the Duke of Somerset, Sir James

Graham, Sir Charles Wood, Sir Francis Baring, who had all been First Lords of the Admiralty, and Sir George Seymour, Admiral Bowles, and Sir Maurice Berkeley, who had been First Sea Lords, united in giving a very strong opinion in favour of the existence of a Board; while, on the other hand, my right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), who had been a First Lord, and Sir Thomas Cochrane, Admiral Elliott, and, I think, Admiral Denman, were the only witnesses who objected in general to the constitution of the Board of Admiralty and would substitute a Minister. I have said that as the Committee made no Report, one can only gather the views entertained by the Members from the questions they put to the witnesses, and that I need hardly add is not a very satisfactory way of eliciting an opinion on so important a question. I think, however, that, upon the whole, the questions and answers tended to three conclusions, although I would not state them very positively. The first was that, so far as the management and discipline of the fleet were concerned, the arrangements of the Board were not unsatisfactory. Secondly, as far as the dockyards were concerned, I do not think the Committee would have differed from the Commission. On a third point, it struck me that the evidence was all one way—that the functions of the First Sea Lord were excessive, too much work being thrown upon him. The result of the debates in this House appears to me to have been the same. My hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely) has raised on more than one occasion a debate as to the administration of the Board of Admiralty, and I think he hit some blots as regards the management of the dockyards, but he brought no evidence to prove the Board of Admiralty to be an inefficient body as far as other functions are concerned. But this question of Admiralty administration was most fully inquired into last Session. My hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln moved for the appointment of a Committee, of which I had the honour of being a Member, and that Committee went into two most important questions. The first was that of the Admiralty Accounts, and on this head the Committee was practically unanimous. The other was the question of the application by the Admiralty of its funds, and the Committee sat until late a period of the Session that, after the reception of two Reports—one from its Chairman and one from my hon. Friends who then represented the Admiralty—the Committee despaired of going further, and simply reported the evidence to the House. But no impartial person—and I hope I was such—attending the Committee could but feel that great faults in the system of management at the Admiralty had been exposed. Under these circumstances, was it not the duty of Her Majesty's Government on its formation to take up this question of Admiralty re-organization? We have arrived, then, at the conclusion that, if we had on the evidence before us clear views on this question, Parliament would expect us to act on them, and establish a better system of administration; and it is that system which I am now going to explain to the House. The arrangements under which the Admiralty business has hitherto been conducted may be stated, in brief, to be these. The Board consisted of a First Lord, a Member of the Cabinet, who might or might not be a naval man. To him there were attached four naval officers, as naval members of the Board, and one civilian; and the Board so constituted had, of course, permanent officers directed by a Secretary, who might or might not be a naval man, and also a Parliamentary Secretary, who, if the Minister were a Member of the House of Lords, represented the Department in this House. That Parliamentary Secretary was sometimes a naval man and sometimes not, and there has been a marvellous amount of controversy as to his exact position—whether he was really the second officer of the Department or merely a subordinate, who registered the decisions of the Members of the Board. However that may be, there can be no doubt that the administration of the Board of Admiralty was practically in the hands of four or five distinguished naval officers, presided over by the Minister; those naval officers dividing the departmental business among them, and approaching to the action of a Committee, advising and carrying out the administration of the Admiralty under the First Lord. Now, I do not think that the administration was satisfactory so far as regards those great public establishments—the dockyards. The practical superintendence of them was divided between three Lords of the Admiralty—the First Naval Lord, the Store Lord, and the Civil Lord, and under such arrangement it is hopeless to expect distinct sufficient responsibility. But I see no reason to doubt that the administration of the Board of Admiralty was in other respects satisfactory, and I believe that there is no occasion to alter it so far as the superintendence of the fleet and all questions connected with men and patronage are concerned. For this part of the administration there is no occasion to substitute for the action of the Board the action of a Lord High Admiral or of a Secretary of State; and I would venture to add that, even if it were convenient, for other reasons, to create a naval Secretary of State, there is one objection to it which in my mind would be overwhelming. I am not going into the delicate question of the relations between the War Office and the Horse Guards; but no one who has watched the former or recent interpellations and debates in this House on this subject would wish to add this difficulty to other naval problems. Under all the circumstances, it has appeared to me desirable to carry out the recommendation of the Commission of 1860-1 with regard to the dockyards, without disturbing in other respects the constitution of the Board of Admiralty. The evidence taken before the Commission and the Committees pointed to one great change. The Controller of the Navy, who was popularly looked upon as the manager of the dockyards, was not a Member of the Board, and, moreover, he was subject to a subordinate Member of the Board, the First Sea Lord. There was thus a confusion of responsibility, and at the same time it was clear that the First Sea Lord was over-worked. We have therefore determined to relieve the First Sea Lord of all business in connection with the dockyards, to abolish the office of Store Lord, and to bring the Controller of the Navy to the Board, putting him in charge of all the matériel departments connected with the building, repairing, and fitting-out of our ships. No change has been made as to the fleet and men, who will be, as heretofore, under the superintendence of the First Sea Lord, nor will any change be made as respects the patronage or the discipline of the Navy, the division of which will be preserved. And on this point I may add that it is my intention to act as fully as any of my predecessors in consultation and harmony with my naval advisers. In a word, the new division of business is that, under my superintendence, the First Sea Lord will take charge of all the business connected with the personnel of the Navy, while the Controller will take charge of all the business connected with the matériel of the Navy, the dockyards, and the purchase of stores. These great officers will be directly responsible to myself without the intervention of any Board or Committee. There is, however, one other point in connection with Admiralty management in regard to which I thought a great improvement could be effected. A great defect of the former system was the absence of sufficient financial control over the expenditure. For a short time, indeed, when I had the honour of being a Lord of the Admiralty in 1865, this deficiency was so much felt that for some months I was called by the title of Financial Lord, and was placed in a position to do some good in respect of dockyard and other expenditure. But that system was only a partial and temporary system, and I did not find it in force when I returned to the Admiralty two months ago. The arrangement I have made in this respect is that my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose is called Financial Secretary, and all matters connected with expenditure, whether in the fleet or in the dockyards, whether relating to men or ships or stores, come under his review in conjunction with the administrative officer who takes charge of the business. The greatest possible practical benefit has resulted, and I expect will result, from that division of labour, not only as regards the efficiency, but also the economy of the service. I may, perhaps, be allowed, in passing, to allude to a Question which my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone), said he would ask a few nights ago, but which, however, he did not put. The question is whether the arrangements which I have made, and to which I have just called attention, are in accordance with the words of the Admiralty Patent. I have heard whispers of such a doubt being entertained, but I thought them entirely dissipated by the evidence taken before the Select Committee of 1861. I have looked, however, at the Patent itself, and I am bound to say that it is a very antiquated and venerable instrument, using terms in vogue many years ago, as to naval matters, enumerating a good many colonies and omitting a good many others, in language to which we are not accustomed in the present day; but the only enacting part of it is this, that everything may be done by the Board of Admiralty, and that two Lords must sign certain orders. The arrangement of business in the Department itself is a matter for those who form the Board. I have to assure my hon. and gallant Friend that I have done nothing which I do not believe to be entirely consistent with the words of the Patent; but I may add that when the Admiralty was formed every member of it accepted Office on the condition of carrying out the plan which I have described to the House, and that these arrangements were embodied formally in a communication to the Treasury, which formed the basis of an Order in Council. If it should be necessary to issue a new Patent, and I have anything to do with the construction of that new Patent, I think it will be well to word it in modern language, and that, in terms as well as in effect, there may be no doubt about its being consistent with the arrangements which we have made. In the meantime I can assure my hon. and gallant Friend that we have been acting—and we shall act—in strict accordance with the law. I will now, with the permission of the House, refer to one or two other reforms in immediate connection with the superintending department. I may say, in the first place, that we are carrying out, and that we hope to carry out fully, an arrangement which has been anxiously looked forward to by all those who take an interest in Admiralty administration. That arrangement consists in getting rid of the division between Whitehall and Somerset House. Everyone must be aware of the inconvenience which results from having one set of offices out of the Strand—a thoroughfare constantly blocked up—and another set a mile off—in Whitehall and Spring Gardens. By amalgamating departments, by reductions in the number of clerks and by giving up three official houses, we shall, I think, be able to bring all those divisions of the Admiralty whose functions are administrative, to Whitehall. It will not be necessary to transfer some parts of the Accountant General's office, the gentlemen in which are employed in the examination of ship's accounts, but we hope to bring to Whitehall all that portion of the Admiralty establishment to which constant reference has to be made. Great advantage will, in my opinion, result from that change. Not only will the control be better when the various offices are brought more together, but we shall be able to dispense with a mass of double work of which the Committee have, in all probability, no conception. I have been very inquisitive on this question of double work with some curious results. For instance, I found that two departments were preparing precisely the same books from precisely the same documents, in precisely the same form, and that neither department knew that the other was so employed. I will not mention the names of the departments, as this is now at an end, but the fact was so. That was the result of the division which existed between Whitehall and Somerset House, and the amount of letter writing and references which will be avoided by bringing them together will be very great; nor will the advantage consist merely in effecting a small economy in expenditure, but in increasing the efficiency of the service. The result of the arrangements which we have already made in this respect has been, as I stated the other day, to accomplish a saving of something more than £5,000 a year in the cost of superintendence, and £14,000 a year in clerical work in London. I gave the figures then, and will not weary the House by repeating them. The Committee will not expect that an operation of this kind can be other than tedious and gradual. It is still going on; but I think I am in a position to say that the whole economy we shall be able to effect in the official establishments in London, including Whitehall and Somerset House, will be not less than £20,000 a year; and as I have been accused, on the one hand, of cheeseparing, and on the other of effecting over-great reductions, I should like, with the permission of the Committee, to state a few facts which may serve as a guide to them in arriving at a decision as to whether I was right or not in taking up this question of economy in these great establishments. I find that in 1849, that is, in the year after the last extensive revision of the Public Departments, there were 260 clerks, including assistant clerks and writers in the Admiralty offices in London, whose salaries were £68,320. In 1859 the number of clerks had increased to 315, and their salaries to £84,209. The number of clerks stood in the beginning of the present year, shortly after I took Office, at 445, and their salaries amounted to £123,196 a year; that is to say, the number of clerks increased between 1849 and 1869 by 185, and their salaries by £55,000; so that the reduction I have proposed of £20,000 only diminishes that increase by about one-third. I hope the Committee will believe me when I say that with me that nothing could be more against the grain than being concerned in operations of this kind. Few things can be more personally disagreeable than cutting down the numbers of public officers, many of whom are in the same station of life as oneself, exposing oneself to so doing to all those imputations of cruelty, and of making wilful and perverse changes, which must be most painful to any man of feeling. But I can say that, since I took this task in hand, I have endeavoured to perform it, as far as I could do so consistently with my public duty, with as little hardship to individuals as possible; nor do I believe that, up to the present moment, injustice has been done to any one in effecting these reductions. The course which I pursued was this. When we found what a particular department consisted of, and what it ought to consist of, we considered how the reductions could be made in the personnel of that department. We then gave all the gentlemen interested notice that they were liable to be removed. In the case of the two departments notice was given in January that a reduction would take place on the 1st of April. I then appointed a Committee consisting of persons who were not permanent officers of the department, two of whom were outside the department altogether, and certain who could not be accused of any personal feeling or bias, and who were to go very narrowly into those proposed reductions, and to endeavour to carry them out with the least possible injury to individuals, laying down the rule, which was authorized by the Treasury, that for the purpose of these reductions the whole of the Admiralty services should be treated as one, so that officers might be retired from any part of the departments, inste-

of necessarily from the particular office which was being subjected to a large reduction. That Committee was appointed at the beginning of last month. My hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) is one of its Members, as well as Lord Camperdown and Mr. Anderson, the Assistant Controller and Auditor who, as the Committee well know, is one of the most efficient of all our public servants. The inquiry under these auspices has been, and will be, conducted most fairly, and my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose authorizes me to say that they already see their way to carrying out the proposed reductions, with the smallest possible amount of injury to those employed in the public service who do not wish to leave it. As I have stated before, I have given up in these matters my own patronage altogether. All those gentlemen who will be reduced will be placed on the redundant list, and if there is any efficient person on that list who is fit for an appointment in the Admiralty henceforward he will be appointed to it if it becomes vacant during my tenure of Office. I do not believe I can do more than that. Such is the painful task I have undertaken, and which I intend to persevere in. And I will only appeal to the House, while believing that we will do what is fair to individuals, to give us time to carry out the plan in the most efficient way. I have stated in general terms the alterations we propose to make with respect to the officers of the Admiralty; and there is one of those departments as to which I may appeal to the House not to press us too rapidly—I mean that connected with the purchase of naval stores. I have already stated that our desire is to carry out the recommendation of the Commission of 1861 with regard to the Storekeeper General's Department, and to place the whole arrangement of our naval stores and contracts on a thoroughly efficient and business footing. On this subject I never shall forget what the late Mr. Cobden said in I think his last speech; when speaking from the seat now occupied by the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith) he appealed to the Admiralty to improve the arrangements for the purchase of stores. He said what was wanted was not so much a contracting, as a buying department, and he asked us to make our purchases in the same way as any private firm or individual. My hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) has that subject in hand, and he is perfectly capable of dealing with it. I have no doubt we shall be able to carry out greatly improved arrangements; and I would again only appeal to the House—knowing what they do of the burdens of the Admiralty—to give us a little time, in order that we may thoroughly mature our plans.

I now come to the other establishments of the Admiralty—I mean those not in London—as to which we wish, as far as possible, to obtain more efficient management. The most important of these are the dockyards. We have not yet had time to look through the administration of the dockyards in detail, but we have been able to effect some minor reforms, which any one who looks into the Estimates will notice. One is, greater unity of management. We propose to make some such arrangement at each dockyard as has been carried out in the office of the Controller of the Navy. As, instead of making the Constructor of the Navy, and the head of the Steam Department two co-ordinate authorities, we have amalgamated them with assistants for the different branches of their business; so we propose at the dockyards to combine the office of Master Shipwright with that of Chief Engineer, creating thus a civil manager for the whole business. That has already been done both at Portsmouth and Chatham, and I have not the least doubt the arrangement will be attended with success. Again, with respect to a subject brought forward on more than one occasion by my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely), and upon which I believe he once divided the House—namely, as to the permanence or non-permanence of the dockyard superintendents, we propose to appoint our superintendents with a view to keeping them at the dockyard as long as we think fit; so that when we have got a good man of business we shall be able to retain him whether his term of office has expired, or he has risen to higher naval rank. Hon. Members will also, I think, observe with satisfaction that we have decidedly improved the proportion between the salaried establishments and the labour in the dockyards. I omit all reference to Deptford and Woolwich, which we do not propose to continue—[Mr. CORRY: We discontinued Deptford]—but we have been able to make reductions in the cost of superintendence at Chatham, Portsmouth, Devonport, and Pembroke, from £95,121 to £86,197, although the wages in 1868-9 were £643,240, while in 1869-70 they will be £677,622. We have therefore succeeded in reducing the cost of superintendence by £9,000 a year, while we have increased the wages by £34,000 a year. The percentage of salaries to wages in 1868-9 was 14·79, and in 1869-70 it is 12·72. I now come to the question of the concentration of the dockyards. My right hon. Friend has said that the Government determined last year to close Deptford as a dockyard, and we have carried out his intention. After some consideration we have thought it desirable—as there must be a storeyard on the Thames—that Deptford should be retained for that purpose, and in our Estimates provision is made accordingly. With respect also to Woolwich we came to the conclusion—in the case of that large establishment, it was a very painful conclusion—that Woolwich ought to have notice that it would be closed, and we have determined to close it on the 1st of October next. It was very painful to have to deal with the interests of so large a number of men, and also with the interests of so large a town more or less affected by the withdrawal of that establishment. But there the question we had to ask ourselves, was—and I apprehend the Committee will agree with me, that there is only one reason that would justify us in maintaining any particular establishment—Is Woolwich Dockyard required or not? And the only answer I could give, after very careful inquiry, was that it was not required, looking to the programme of work to be undertaken. I wish to be very precise on one matter connected with this decision. I know there is an idea afloat—and a very natural one—that we have not given to those interested fair and reasonable notice. Now the notice itself was given in the early part of January, and therefore extended to nine months; but in reality all parties concerned have known well what was coming so far back as 1864, for we are only carrying out the policy at that time unanimously adopted by the Committee to whom the great works of dockyard extension were referred, and on whose Report the House acted. That was no mere casual Report. The policy which that Committee recommended is that under which we have embarked on very great works at Portsmouth and Chatham, and the expenditure on those great works is regulated; and the adoption of the recommendations of that Report constitutes undoubted notice to all concerned. The proposal as to Woolwich Dockyard was made in these terms—

“In recommending projects which will, if carried out, involve a large additional expenditure, your Committee do not think it beyond their duty to suggest that it is worthy of consideration whether Deptford, Woolwich, and Pembroke Dockyards might not be suppressed altogether and disposed of, and the business now carried on in them transferred to the yards to which such important and costly additions are in progress or in prospect.”

It has been stated that this recommendation was not unanimous; but as to Woolwich this is an error. There was a division on the question whether the names of the dockyards should be recited, or whether the terms should be “some of the minor dockyards;” but it was decided by a majority of 8 to 5 that the particular dockyards should be named. Thereafter came distinct Motions as to these particular yards. Deptford was inserted unanimously; and Woolwich was inserted unanimously. The only question raised was as to Pembroke, the hon. and gallant Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay) and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) voting that Pembroke should be inserted, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry) and the hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) voting that Pembroke should not be inserted. I find also that in moving the Estimates for 1866-7, on the 26th of February, 1866, Lord Clarence Paget said distinctly that no further expenditure would be incurred at Woolwich, with a view to its being closed in accordance with the recommendation of the Report. I do not think, under these circumstances, there could be any doubt that Woolwich Dockyard should be closed as soon as the business to be done in the yards admitted of the reduction; and when, on reviewing the programme of work, I was satisfied that the time had come, we decided to take the step; and notice was given that it would be closed on the 1st of October. With respect to the persons employed there, I am most anxious that they should be treated with the greatest consideration, and I hope our policy will minimize the distress and loss to which they will be exposed. The established men will be transferred to other yards; we propose also to transfer as many of the non-establishment men as we can, and with regard also to mechanics in the factory who, although liable to be discharged at any moment, are of value to the Government, we hope, as vacancies occur in other yards, to re-enter as many as possible after the 1st of October. So far as regards the interests of the officers and men. Then, as regards the interests of the town of Woolwich, the yard will be let for the purpose of a private establishment if any parties are prepared to take it. It has been proposed to sell it; but looking to the possibilities of a naval war, I should hesitate to do so until the works at Chatham are finished. Meanwhile, we shall try to carry out arrangements by which the ground, buildings, and valuable machinery will be utilized. That is all it is possible to do in the interests of the locality, and that we shall do to the best of our power.

With respect to the expenditure in the great dockyards, I will just allude to our proposals under Vote 11, that for Works and Machinery. That part of the Vote which concerns buildings is less by £38,000 than last year. But the cause of the reduced expenditure is no falling off in the great works which are necessary for the docking of our fleets. On the contrary, we increase that expenditure. For instance, at Portsmouth and Chatham, where extension works of great importance are being carried on, we propose to spend £470,000, against £420,000, which was the amount of the Vote last year. We also propose to take £30,000 to complete the dock at Malta, and £15,000 for a berth for the floating dock at Bermuda. Where we economize is in the petty expenses upon the small works which fritter away so much money; although so far as ordinary repairs are concerned we have provided above £60,000. There is one dockyard which I cannot help alluding to, and with which the name of my right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Corry) will always be connected. Keyham is the child of my right hon. Friend, and I must say that it does credit to its parent. Among the many things which the House and the service owe to him, the construction of that great establishment at Keyham is one of the greatest, and most thoroughly has it answered the expectations that were formed of it. The Committee of 1864 proposed to carry out still larger works at Keyham in respect of basin and dock accommodation, but just now I do not think these are required. Remembering what we are doing at Portsmouth and Chatham, we should be, in my judgment, wrong in embarking on an expenditure of several thousand pounds at Keyham, and my right hon. Friend must therefore forgive me if we do not propose to do more there than ordinary maintenance. I may now remind the Committee that the dockyards are not the only great establishments under the Admiralty. We have in the victualling-yards large and expensive establishments where the food of our men is prepared and shipped, and we also have very important naval hospitals at our principal dockyards and naval ports. We have been making inquiries as to each of these great establishments, and those hon. Members who have looked at the Estimates will see that, sooner than rashly effect detailed reductions as to which we have not yet had time to complete our inquiry, we have taken gross sums, knowing that we shall be able in the course of the spring to mature more economical arrangements. There is no doubt that in the victualling-yards there is a very excessive charge for superintendence, and the division of duty between the superior officers, however well considered in times past, is now not altogether satisfactory, and in some respects altogether anomalous. The time has come for re-considering these arrangements; but the course I took is one which, after the debate this evening and the Notice of the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone), will, I fear, expose me to some criticism. When the Government was formed it was thought a judicious arrangement that one of its junior members should be ready in the House of Lords to answer any questions which might be asked there respecting the Navy. We heard this evening of the old generals in the House of Lords, but there are old admirals as well as old generals. Lord Camperdown has undertaken this duty; and in order that he may do so more effectually (and I cannot speak too highly of his ability), I have thought it advantageous to give him an opportunity of personally looking into some of the Admiralty business. Lord Camperdown has visited the victualling-yards, spent some time with the principal officers there, and made a valuable Report to the Admiralty. Upon that Report we hope by-and-by to found many judicious and economical arrangements. The subject has not yet been fully considered, but I anticipate considerable benefit from the minute and careful examinations which he has made into those great es-establishments. In the same way, one of the things which cannot but strike any man who goes into the details of the Admiralty Estimates is the gradual increase which during the last ten years has arisen in the establishment charges at our naval hospitals, while the number of patients and the expenses of maintaining them, the other expenses, have not increased at all. When this came under my notice, it occurred to me that the present was a very favourable opportunity for obtaining some advice and assistance outside the Department, because Dr. Bryson, who has been Medical Director General for some years, was ending his term of service (it has since expired), and his successor has not been appointed. We therefore appointed a Committee of three medical men, known, I dare say, to many Members of this House—Dr. Murchison, Mr. Holmes, who has rendered similar assistance to the Government on previous occasions, and Mr. Ellis—and they furnished to us a Report of great interest, going minutely into the details of the establishment of those hospitals, comparing them with the civil hospitals, proposing certain reforms, and giving very valuable information upon the whole subject. That Report has only been received within the last few days. It will be referred to the different officers concerned by whom it will be narrowly examined, and I have every reason to believe that in consequence very valuable improvements will be made in the administration of our naval hospitals.

I have now, I fear, at too great length gone through the principal amendments and reforms which up to this moment we are in a position to propose with respect to departmental organization at the Admiralty; and I repeat that, as to the dockyards, our reforms are as yet imperfect, and that further inquiry will be necessary. But I am now going into the second great subject which I shall have to lay before the Committee—I mean our policy respecting our fleets and men. In 1867, speaking from the opposite Bench, I was the organ of those who, having had some Admiralty experience, took an interest in these matters, and I developed to the House the change of policy which we believed was called for with respect to our fleets. I explained—I hope modestly, because I did not pretend to speak with the authority of a Minister having access to official information—the

be made, with due regard to the security of our national interests, in our squadrons abroad. I elicited from the Government their views upon a question which, until then, had not for many years past been discussed in either House of Parliament. My right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Corry) very fully entered into the debate, though he had been but a short time in Office, and, except that he rather snubbed persons who had been Civil Lords for daring to enter into the high region of Admiralty administration, I think his remarks were exceedingly fair. The result proved that; because—though for the moment, with due official caution, he objected to my scheme which was to reduce 7,000 in our foreign squadrons—he himself afterwards effected a reduction of 3,208. I cannot but rejoice, therefore, that we took occasion then to re-open a subject admitted now by both sides of the House to be one which should be taken up by the Government. My right hon. Friend laid down at the time a very sound doctrine, which he put in clear words. He said that this question of the strength of the foreign squadrons was not so much for the consideration of the Admiralty as for that of the Colonial and Foreign Offices—it was not so much for the consideration of Parliament as for that of the responsible Advisers of the Crown; and in passing I may say that from the latter point of view I was a little surprised at the notice he has given this Session for a Select Committee to consider these questions. This, however, was the doctrine which he laid down, and I have now to inform the Committee that in what I have done and propose to do I shall most carefully follow his advice—that is to say, whatever we do in connection with our foreign squadrons will only be done after most careful consideration, with the Foreign and Colonial Secretaries, upon whose action, of course, the arrangement of our fleets abroad very much depends. During the short time I have been in Office I cannot pretend to have had time to go through the whole details of our foreign stations, particularly those which, as lying nearer home may be dealt with later, our Mediterranean and North American stations. We have, however, carefully considered with the Foreign and Colonial Offices the whole details of our fleets on the China and other distant stations, and I am in a position to say what we propose to do. At the present time our fleets on the south-east coast of America, in the Pacific, on the Australian station, on the China station, on the East India station, at the Cape of Good Hope, and on the west coast of Africa—taking the figures from my right hon. Friend's speech last year as indicating his intention in the late Board of Admiralty—constitute altogether a force of eighty ships, with 11,767 men. We have already arranged, in accord with the Foreign and Colonial Offices, that those eighty ships shall be reduced to sixty-four, and the 11,767 men to about 8,500—altogether, a reduction of sixteen ships and 3,267 men. That is what we have been able to do on these stations during our two months of Office. This, added to the reduction of last year, gives altogether a reduction of 6,600 men; and as the reduction I ventured to suggest in 1867 was only one of 7,000, I think we have gone a long way towards carrying out that suggestion. The force on foreign stations as proposed by the late Admiralty and by the present, is shown in the following comparison:—

“Strength of force, according to the late Admiralty in 1868—South-east coast of America, 6 ships, 969 men; Pacific, 12 ships, 2,755 men; Australia, 4 ships, 776 men; China, 34 ships, 4,008 men; East Indies (after deducting ships detained on account of the Abyssinian war), 7 ships, 1,275 men; Cape of Good Hope, 8 ships, 509 men; West coast of Africa, 14 ships, 1,475 men; total, 80 ships, 11,767 men.

“Strength of force as now arranged with Secretary of State—South-east coast of America, 5 ships, 500 to 600 men; Pacific, 10 ships; 2,000 men; Australia, 4 ships, 700 to 800 men; China, 25 ships, 2,700 to 2,800 men; East Indies (not including gunboats in the Persian Gulf), 6 ships, 1,000 men; Cape of Good Hope, 3 ships, 400 to 500 men; West coast of Africa, 11 ships, 1,000 men; total, 64 ships; 8,800 to 8,700 men (say, 8,500 men).

With regard to the East Indian station, we have effected an arrangement which appears on the face of the Estimates, and which, I hope, the House will approve. We have called on the Indian Government to bear their share of the cost of the Navy in Indian seas. Hitherto, although India has borne her share of her military expenses, she has not borne any share of her naval expenses. My noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll) and his Council have agreed to an arrangement upon a basis which I will now explain. Proposals have been made from time to time to restore the old Bombay “Marine” for the purpose of having a small fleet in the Persian Gulf. That, I am happy to say, was not the view of the late Admiralty or of the late Government. The late Government came to the decision that that arrangement was not a wise one. I entirely agree with them in that view, and we have arranged with India that we shall furnish her with a sufficient force to keep three gunboats in the Persian Gulf, she paying the expense of the fleet in the Bay of Bengal and the Arabian Gulf, that is everything north of a line drawn from Cape Guardafui to Ceylon and the Straits Settlements. She will pay a capitation rate of £70 on the average number of men within these limits, and we, on the other hand, will pay as now for any fleet kept on the east coast of Africa. I think that is a fair bargain. India then, in respect of the fleet now on her coast, will pay into our Exchequer £70,000 a year. With respect to the Mediterranean and North American stations, as I have said, we have not had time to come to any definite arrangements; but their state will be well considered by the Admiralty, in conjunction with the Colonial and Foreign Secretaries of State. At the same time that we propose to make this reduction in our foreign stations we shall carry out the policy of sending a flying squadron to visit all our foreign stations, and for this purpose we hope soon to fit out six or seven very fine ships. Under this arrangement we shall keep our men more at sea than they are at present. In the course of the present spring, about Whitsuntide, we also propose to send out on a cruise several of our coastguard ships, and flag-ships, forming what I may call our First Reserve Squadron; and we intend to offer to any of the Naval Reserve men who might like to take their drill at that particular time the option of going out on the cruise. I wish it to be understood that it is not by this measure intended to call out the Reserve, which indeed can only be done in time of war, or to consider this a test of their efficiency, but we think it would be useful to the public service for the Reserve men to have the opportunity of going to sea. I may say that the ships which we expect to have prepared for the purpose at Whitsuntide are the Black Prince, the Agin-court, the Valiant, and the Hector, iron-clads; the Donegal, the Duncan, the Trafalgar, and the Royal George, line-of-battle ships, and the Morsey, frigate; that is to say seven coastguard ships and the flag-ships at the Nore and at Cork. With regard to the Naval Reserve, we propose no considerable change in the Estimates, but I think the time will come in the course of the year when it may be convenient that the Admiralty and the Board of Trade should make some minute departmental inquiry into the whole arrangements connected with that force.

I have now stated our general policy with regard to our fleets. We propose gradually to reduce the foreign squadrons to the minimum amount necessary for the maintenance of the honour of the country, the protection of our commerce, and for effecting those other objects for which the squadrons are maintained. We propose to keep our ships and men as much at sea as possible; and I need not say in connection with that that we also propose to be as economical as we can in the consumption of stores, and especially of coal. I now come to the actual effect which our proposal will have on the Vote for the men. In the last year, 66,770 men were voted. In the present Estimates, we propose to take only 63,000, thus effecting a reduction of 3,770. I must not, however, omit to state that a very considerable part of this reduction is due to my right hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry). The reduction which I propose is in the non-seamen class. We do not propose to reduce a single blue-jacket, and there has been no reduction of the blue-jackets afloat since I came into Office. I shall give the House the details of our reduction. The number of officers and men of the non-seamen class voted last year was 18,455, this year it is proposed to be 16,677. Last year the number of blue-jackets was 20,085; the number now proposed is 19,400. The number of boys in the coastguard ships is reduced from 360 to 328. The coastguard on shore is reduced from 4,500 to 4,325; the boys for service from 4,300 to 4,000; the boys in training from 3,100 to 3,000. The number of marines last year was 14,700; it is now to be 14,000. The total number under these several heads were, last year, 65,500; this year the number is to be 61,730. The numbers were as follows when my right hon. Friend retired from Office:—Officers and non-seamen class, 18,112; blue-jackets, 19,280; boys in coastguard ships, 312; coastguardmen on shore, 4,513; boys for service, 4,517; boys in training, 2,702; marines, 14,231; being a total of 63,667 as against 61,730, which we now propose. The reduction effected therefore by my right hon. Friend was 1,833, and I propose a further reduction of 1,937. I may now enumerate some of these reductions. My right hon. Friend substituted for an establishment of engineer's stokers, and shipkeepers and servants in charge of the ships in reserve, a small establishment of officers and men on board divisional ships—the ships being what is called "locked up." He greatly reduced the yard craft, abolished the Reserve at Chatham and one stationary ship at Sheerness. We also have abolished one at Portsmouth, and we shall also abolish one at Devonport. [Mr. Corry: What is the name of the new flag-ship?] The Duke of Wellington. The Victory, I may add, is not laid up in ordinary as has been imagined. We have ceased to train second-class cadets in the St. George, all the boys being transferred to the Britannia. We have abolished the coastguard ship at Milford, reduced the establishment at Ascension, abolished the Commodore's flags at the Cape and on the South Sea station, reduced the Commodore on the Indian station to the second class, substituted marines for a large number of servants. We have also reduced the number of non-continuous service stokers—the number of stokers in the Reserve being admitted to be excessive—and we have made an arrangement under which a number of blue-jackets will be employed as stokers at an increase of pay, the plan being similar to one which has been adopted with success in the French Navy. The total result of our change is not to diminish by one single man the really effective power of the British Navy. We propose also to reduce the boys by 400. This reduction is a pure matter of arithmetic. My right hon. Friend opposite knows very well how past Lords of the Admiralty have strained to make up the number of boys to a sufficient number to supply the waste of the fleet. Even in 1867 I urged the necessity of more being done in this direction, but I am happy to say that we have now reached that point, and gone beyond it, while the waste is diminishing every year. With regard to the reduction of the non-seamen class, there are some facts which I think will prove of interest to the Committee. Since 1858-9, this class has been steadily increasing, while the seamen class has been falling off in numbers. In 1862-3, the seamen numbered 27,130, as against 10,518 of the non-seamen class; in 1863-4, the former class had fallen to 24,593, while the latter had been increased to 11,160; in 1864-5, the numbers were 23,039 and 11,950; and in 1867-8, the seamen class had been reduced to 20,615, while the non-seamen class, exclusive of officers, had been increased to 12,718. These figures, I think, go far to justify the course we propose in stopping the reduction of blue-jackets. Let me, at the same time, show how the moderate reduction which we propose to make in the coastguard can be made without injury to that force when regarded in the light of a reserve of additional seamen for the fleet. In 1865-6, when the present establishment of the coastguard may be said to have been settled, there were in it 4,000 of the seamen class, and 1,200 of the civilian class. The blue-jackets, of which the coastguard forms a reserve, stood at 21,567. The former under our plan will be 4,450, compared with only 19,401 blue-jackets afloat. The result of this will be that the strength of the coastguard, compared with the blue-jackets of the fleet, will be very much greater than it was in 1865-6.

I now come to one part of our Navy in which our Estimates show a reduction which requires a little explanation, although the present Board of Admiralty did not settle the figures—and that is the strength of our Marines. When I took Office I found that my right hon. Friend had approved a proposal to reduce that force from 14,700 to 14,000, and had also approved of the reduction of the Woolwich division. It has been our duty to carry out what my right hon. Friend proposed to do. There can be no doubt that his proposal was a sound one, and for this reason — If you have an excessive number of Marines on shore as compared with those afloat, the body, which is a costly one, does not get sufficient training. The number of Marines afloat was, in 1859, 10,200; in 1862, 8,700; in 1865, 7,900; and in 1868, 7,600. It is therefore quite clear that a gradual reduction in the Marines on shore has been imperative; and my right hon. Friend's second thoughts were best, though he resisted my proposed reductions both in 1867 and last year. But, though the task of reducing the men was not entirely left to us, I found, on acceding to Office, that I had a damnosa hereditas in the reduction to be made in respect of the officers. I had hoped that this exceedingly disagreeable task would not have fallen to my lot. [Mr. CORRY was understood to deny the correctness of the right hon. Gentleman's statement.] I am not attempting to throw any blame upon my right hon. Friend, but am endeavouring to make some excuse for what I myself have been compelled to do. I had not been in Office a week before I was inundated with complaints about my harshness and injustice with regard to the officers of the Marines, and I wish, therefore, to offer a few remarks in my own justification. In April, 1867, there were 509 officers of Marines and 15,887 men. In August, 1867, there were 532 and 15,678 men, my right hon. Friend, for a reason which he explained as having for its object the improvement of promotion, having increased the number of officers by twenty-three, at the same time that he reduced the number of men by over 200. In March, 1868, my right hon. Friend reduced the men by above 1,500 to 14,165, but for some unaccountable reason he left the officers at 533, and in December, 1868, when I came into Office, I found that, with the same number of officers, the men had been still further reduced to 13,436. The complement of officers to that body of men—and we have arranged it on the most liberal scale—was only 438, and it was consequently my disagreeable task to make a reduction of no less than ninety-five officers. In addition to that, too, a few days before I took Office, a number of gentlemen had been sent up for examination for commissions, and of these sixteen had passed, two out of that number having actually been appointed. I therefore had to deal not only with ninety-five officers, many of whom ought to have been reduced the year before, but with those who had just passed for their commissions. I mention this extraordinary state of things for my own justification, because I have been bombarded by the fathers and mothers of these Marine officers, complaining of my cruelty in putting some on retired or half-pay, and not appointing others.

And now this brings me to the most important part of my statement with regard to the officers and men—namely, the enormous excess of officers on the active list. This has been the subject of remark for a long time past, and no doubt several important amendments have been made. I see sitting by my right hon. Friend his Colleague the hon. Member for Stamford, and I know that they both think that some remedy must be found for this evil. Indeed, I have read carefully the interesting controversy between them in 1862, and I might appeal to my right hon. Friend's famous letter from Rome. But at the present time the facts as to the state of the lists are these. I leave out the admirals of the fleet and admirals—very few of whom now-a-days are employed or supposed to be fit for really active service. There are seventy-nine vice admirals, of whom twenty-three are on the active list, and of these four only are employed at sea and four in harbour and elsewhere. Of rear admirals we have 127, of whom forty-eight are on the active list, and of these three are employed at sea and six in harbour and elsewhere. Out of 725 captains, 295 are on the active list, and of these sixty-one are employed at sea, and thirty-nine in harbour or elsewhere. Of 1,161 commanders 405 are on the active list, and only eighty-six are employed at sea, and ninety-nine in harbour or elsewhere. The result of these figures is that we have employed at sea only one in ten of vice and rear admirals on the active list, one in five of captains, and one in four and a half of commanders. As to the junior part of the captains' list, matters are lamentable in the extreme. Out of 111 captains with service of five years and less, there are only ten employed, the proportion being one in eleven; and out of eighty-nine commanders of two years' and less service, fourteen only are employed, the proportion being one in six and a-third. Dividing the captains into three batches, I find that the first 100, who have been on the list an average of thirteen years, have been employed for six years and 322 days each. The second 100, with an average of six and a half years on the list have have been employed one year and 277 days; while the third 100, who have been on the list an average of two years each, have been employed for seventy-one days each. Again, as to se service. I find that the first class of captains, out of their average of thirteen years on the list, have had only between four and five in sea service; the second class, out of their six years and a half, have had only between one and two years; and the third class, out of their two years, have had only sixty-one days or two months. Now I think that is a state of things which imperatively demands relief, and yet when we look at it from another point of view it seems difficult to say in what way the relief is to be brought about. One might hope that by reductions in the numbers of the lower ranks of late years gradually the excess above might be eased off. But I fear that the late Board of Admiralty took too much credit for this. The number of entries of naval and navigating cadets in 1865 was 186, in 1866 was 160, in 1867 was 175, and in 1868 was only brought down to 140. During that time the number of sub-lieutenants and navigating sub-lieutenants which in former times had been thought sufficient at 150, or 200, had risen from 298 in 1865 to 362 in 1866, 347 in 1867, 364 in 1868, and 446 this year; of whom there were in the first four years made lieutenants and navigating lieutenants 88, 141, 122, and 76. At the beginning of this year, as I have said, there were no less than 446 sub-lieutenants on the list. Looking then at the state of things now existing in respect of officers, I think it will be admitted that it is most unsatisfactory. Let us see what is the result. Of course, it is very uneconomical. Of that there can be no doubt whatever. You are paying more officers than you can employ; but not only is it directly uneconomical, but indirectly it has two bad effects. One is that when officers are employed for so short a time the pay they receive is insufficient. Though the rate of full pay may be very good if an officer received it for his full time, it is by no means satisfactory when an officer is paid for only one-third of his time; you thus have constant agitation for higher pay. But more than that, when you have too large a number of officers for the service to be performed, do what you will, it makes the Government look tenderly on the creation of unnecessary employment. I do not wish to go into detail on this point. I have already mentioned establishments in which to my mind too many officers are employed. It may be right to employ them in those establishments or it may not be; but so long as you have so large a number of idle officers it is impossible to resist the pressure to create employment for them. But I wish to point out a still more injurious result arising from our having too large a number of officers, and I make this statement with a full sense of its importance, and on my responsibility. I feel no hesitation in saying that it is injurious to the efficiency of the Navy. Communications which I have received within the last two months from admirals and other officers in command in all parts of the world, convince me that though our naval officers are as gallant men as are to be found in the world and as willing to do their duty, yet there is a want of efficiency among them, arising from a want of employment. You cannot expect adequate experience from captains and commanders who are for two-thirds of their time on shore. I appeal then to the House to support us in reducing these lists in some practical and regular way. It cannot be done by the slow process of knocking off two or three a year under Orders in Council like those of 1866. The proposal we intend to make will be embodied in a Bill, which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will introduce if I do not. It will provide that officers on half-pay willing to retire, and who may be spared from the service, shall be able to compound their half-pay for its equivalent present value, the State having then no more claim on them. This would be effected through the agency of the National Debt Office, who would advance the composition, the amounts of half-pay being annually voted, and paid over to them. At first this would save nothing pecuniarily; but the practical gain would be that our active lists might be reduced to the numbers really required, and we shall then be able to substitute for the artificial, and in many respects unintelligible, rules of retirement a simple system with rates of pay based on service and sea service. We should also have an opportunity of fixing the numbers of each rank on an actuarial calculation, which, allowing for deaths and a due proportion of retirements, would secure, as far as possible, that officers would reach the various classes at suitable ages. This system should apply to all the lists. I do not mean that we should have only a sufficient number of officers for ships in commission in peace time. We must provide a reserve for war; but at present our reserve is too great. I may add that we have already checked the supply from below by reducing the entries of cadets from 140 to 114.

I now come to the third part of my subject—that which relates to our policy in building and repairing ships. Our intention is to minimize the repairs and alterations, especially of old-type ships. It will be seen by the programme that we propose an increase in the number of men employed in building ships, and a considerable diminution in the number employed at repairs. In connection with the expenditure on repairs we have arrived at a resolution decidedly tending to economy. We have resolved that the length of time for which a ship will be commissioned shall be increased from three or four years to five years, proper provision being made for intermediate changes of officers or crews. The effect of that will be to very much reduce the amount of expenditure which is almost always incurred when ships are put out of commission. We intend to thoroughly overhaul our stock of stores in all parts of the world, and to re-cast, to some extent, our establishments. We propose to keep the dockyards at the point really required for economic efficiency, making the necessary reductions only gradually. We propose also to build in them vessels chiefly of the latest type; to employ the private trade as our adjunct—and that for the fabric of ships rather than for fittings, and not so much for ships of novel type as for those which can be specified clearly in contracts. We intend besides to propose to the House the repeal of the Naval Stores Act, by which, it is said, we now lose more than we gain, in order that we may be able to dispose of ships which cannot now be brought into the market except to be broken up. But before stating to the House our proposals for building, I will describe the work on hand, stating first the ships in the dockyards. First as to ironclads not yet completed—At Woolwich we have the Repulse, launched, but which will not be ready for sea till July; at Chatham, the Monarch, which will be ready for sea in May, and the Sultan and the Glatton, which will be three-fourths complete at the end of the financial year and ready for sea about July, 1870; at Pembroke, the Iron Duke, which will be launched in winter and will be completed in May, 1870. The iron-clad ships building by contract are—in the yard of Messrs. Laird Brothers, the Captain (turret), which ought to be ready in April, but will not, I fear, be before July; in Messrs. Napier's yard, the Audacious, which ought to be ready in July, and the Invincible, which ought to be ready in October; again in the yard of Messrs. Laird Brothers, the Vanguard, which ought to be ready in October; in Messrs. Palmer's yard, the Swiftsure and the Triumph, both of which will be half finished this financial year; and in Messrs. Napier's yard, the Hotspur, which will be all but finished this year. The unarmoured ships are these—at Woolwich, the Thalia, corvette troop-ship, which will leave Woolwich in September to be fitted at Sheerness; the Druid, corvette, which will be ready in July, and the Spartan, corvette, which will be ready in April. At Sheerness we have the Briton, corvette; at Portsmouth, the Dido, corvette; and at Devonport, the Tenedos, corvette,—all of which will be completed in the course of the present financial year. At Pembroke we have the Inconstant, frigate, which will be completed in May next. In addition to these ships we have two small gun-vessels which will be ready in a short period. We have building by contract only two large corvettes, the Active and the Volage, in the hands of the Thames Company, which will be ready for sea in June or July. The result will be that at the end of the financial year 1869-70 the only unfinished ships will be—at Chatham, the Sultan and the Glatton, which it will require three months to complete, and at Pembroke, the Iron Duke, which it will require one month to complete. The ships building by contract—namely, the Triumph and the Swiftsure—will require nine months, and the Hotspur one month for their completion. There will be no unarmoured ships in hand at the end of the financial year, except a small gun-vessel, at Chatham, and the Osborne, which was to have been built in the course of the year 1869-70, but the building of which has been postponed in consequence of the expenditure incurred in the repair of the Victoria and Albert. Having shown to the House what our work in hand consists of, and how small a portion will remain to be performed at the end of the financial year, I will now proceed to give them the particulars of the new ships we propose to lay down in the dockyards. I must here state that I think the greatest credit is due to the Controller and to the Constructor of the Navy for the pains they have been taking for some time past in drawing up the specifications for two new ships which I propose should be commenced at Chatham and at Pembroke Dockyards, at the beginning of the next financial year, and which, I do not hesitate to say, will be the most powerful vessels in the world. The two vessels of which I am speaking will be turret-ships, each of 4,400 tons and of 800 nominal horse power, working up to 5,600. They will have double screws and four engines, and their speed will be 12½ knots per hour. Their construction will enable them to carry 1,750 tons of coal, a quantity sufficient to last for ten days' consumption at a speed of 12 knots, and much more at lower speed. They will carry four 25-ton guns, two in each turret. Their freeboard will be 4 feet 6 inches, the base of the turrets being protected by a raised breastwork of oval form 7 feet high. Their armour on the sides and breastworks will be 12 inches and 10 inches thick, and 14 inches and 12 inches on the turrets; while the backing will be from 13 inches to 20 inches thick, having an inner skin of armour 1½ inch to 1¼ inch behind. Their decks will be covered by 2-inch and 2½-inch plates. They will have no masts, and therefore their turrets will be able to deliver an all-round fire. Their crews will consist of 250 men and officers, and the cost of each will be about £286,000, including their engines.

SIR JOHN HAY inquired what would be the draught of water of these proposed new vessels?

MR. CHILDERS: Their draught will be between 25 and 26 feet. We also propose to build, at Portsmouth, a third ship of the same kind, with some improvements, as the turret-ram Hotspur, proposed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Corry) last year. The difference between the proposed vessel and the Hotspur will be that the former will be somewhat larger, will have thicker armour, and will have a revolving instead of a fixed turret. The new vessel will be of 3,200 tons burden, of 700-horse power, working up to 4,200, with a speed of 12 knots, and will carry 350 tons of coal, sufficient for three-and-a-half days' steaming at 10 knots per hour. She will carry two 18-ton guns in one turret, her freeboard will be 1 foot 6 inches, and she will have a 7-foot high breastwork round her turret. Her armour-plates will be of the following thickness:—9 inches to 11 inches on the sides, 12 inches on the breastwork, 12 inches to 14 inches on the turret, and there will be a 2-inch deck-plating. She will carry fore-and-aft sails, with slight rigging without shrouds, and her crew will consist of 200 men and officers. Her cost will be £195,000, including the engines. The only other ships we propose to build in the dockyards will be one or two small vessels, like the Staunch, either at Portsmouth or at Devonport. The right hon. Gentleman opposite deserves great credit for that vessel, which will I hope be very efficient for harbour purposes, being merely a floating gun carriage. I stated just now that the building of the Osborne yacht at Pembroke had been postponed. In consequence of the repairs required by the Victoria and Albert, Her Majesty, with her usual consideration for the public interests, has expressed her approval of the proposal to postpone the building of the new vessel until the following year. And now, if I have not already wearied the Committee, perhaps I may be allowed to state, in a few words, what will be the state of the English Navy when the proposed new ships have been built. I am not aware that any such statement has been made for years past, and, perhaps, as we have now reached a turning point in our armoured fleet, it may be for the convenience of the House that they should have before them a succinct account of the actual state of the Navy of the country. We shall have then altogether 36 broad-side armoured vessels, carrying 555 guns; and these vessels I have, with the assistance of my naval Colleagues, classed in a way that I think will be intelligible to the House. The first class includes two vessels, the Hercules and the Sultan, protected by 6-inch to 9-inch armour, of a speed of $14\frac{1}{2}$ knots per hour, and carrying 18-ton guns, and others of smaller calibre. Class 2 consists of six vessels—namely, the Audacious, the Invincible, the Vanguard, the Iron Duke, the Swiftsure, and the Triumph. These vessels are protected by 6 to 8-inch armour, possess a speed of $13\frac{1}{2}$ knots per hour, and carry 12-ton guns and others. Class 3 consists of nine vessels—namely, the Bellerophon, the Lord Warden, the Lord Clyde, the Minotaur, the Agincourt, the Northumberland, the Royal Alfred, the Repulse, and the Penelope. These vessels are protected by $5\frac{1}{2}$ -inch to 6-inch armour, possess a speed of 13 to 14 knots per hour, and carry 12-ton guns and under.

Class 4 contains eight vessels—namely, the Achilles, the Royal Oak, the Prince Consort, the Caledonia, the Ocean, the Valiant, the Hector (the two last badly protected), and the Zealous. These vessels are protected by $4\frac{1}{2}$ -inch armour, have a speed of $12\frac{1}{2}$ knots per hour, carry 9-ton guns and under. Class 5 consists of four vessels—namely, the Warrior, the Black Prince, the Defence, and the Resistance, all, I regret to say, being badly protected. These vessels are protected by $4\frac{1}{2}$ -inch armour, have a speed of 12 to 14 knots per hour, and carry 9-ton guns and under. Class 6 consists of two smaller vessels—namely, the Pallas and the Favourite, protected by $4\frac{1}{2}$ -inch armour, having a speed of 12 to 13 knots per hour, and carrying 9-ton guns and under. Class 7 consists of two sloops—namely, the Enterprise and the Research, protected by $4\frac{1}{2}$ -inch armour, having a speed of $9\frac{1}{2}$ knots per hour, and carrying $6\frac{1}{2}$ -ton guns, and three gunboats—namely, the Viper, the Vixen, and the Waterwitch, protected by $4\frac{1}{2}$ -inch armour, having a speed of $9\frac{1}{2}$ knots per hour, and carrying $6\frac{1}{2}$ -ton guns. We shall also possess eleven turret and special vessels, carrying 43 guns, which are classed as follows:—Class 1 will include the two, of a new design, which I have just described to the House, protected by 10 to 14-inch armour, having a speed of $12\frac{1}{2}$ knots per hour, and carrying 25-ton 12-inch 600-pounders; Class 2 will consist of the Monarch and the Captain, protected by 7 to 8-inch armour, having a speed of 14 knots per hour, and also carrying 25-ton guns. Class 3 will consist of the Glatton, protected by 10 to 12-inch armour, having a speed of $9\frac{1}{2}$ knots per hour, and carrying 25-ton guns. Class 4 will consist of the Hotspur, protected by 8 to 12-inch armour, and the second Hotspur, protected by 10 to 14-inch armour, both possessing a speed of 12 knots per hour, and carrying 18 or 25-ton guns. Class 5 will consist of the Royal Sovereign and the Prince Albert, protected by $4\frac{1}{2}$ to $5\frac{1}{2}$ -inch armour, having a speed of 12 knots, and carrying 12-ton guns. Class 6 will consist of the Scorpion and the Wivern, protected by $4\frac{1}{2}$ -inch armour, possessing a speed of 10 knots per hour, and carrying 12-ton guns. The grand total of these figures will give us forty-seven armoured ships, carrying 598 guns, of which eighteen are 25-ton, nineteen are 18-ton, and 111 are 12-ton. Our unarmoured fleet may be described in general terms thus—We have at the present time, thoroughly fit for service, about twelve old line-of-battle ships and heavy frigates of the old type, including the Galatea and the Ariadne. (I omit a considerable number of less efficient old type wooden ships.) In addition to these vessels we have the Inconstant, heavy frigate, having a speed of 15 knots per hour, and carrying 12½-ton guns; the Active and the Volage, large corvettes, having a speed of 15 knots per hour, and carrying 6½-ton guns; 12 Blanche class corvettes, having a speed of 13 knots per hour, and carrying 6½-ton guns; two of the Druid class, having the same speed and armament; twelve gun-vessels of the new type, having a speed of 11 knots per hour, and carrying 6½-ton guns; and seventeen new composite gunboats, having a speed of 10 knots per hour, and carrying 6½-ton guns; besides others of the old type, including eight heavy corvettes. The total of our unarmoured fleet, therefore, will be about sixty-six efficient vessels, besides a number of old sloops and gunboats. It must also not be forgotten that the maritime defensive and offensive power of England will consist in the future not only of ships and guns, but also of torpedoes, to the importance of which the naval authorities of this country are fully alive. It is not an easy thing to make an accurate comparison between the strength of the Navy of this country as it will be at the end of the next financial year, and that of any other maritime Power. But I may say that in comparison with our forty-seven armoured ships France will have thirty-seven, besides eleven floating batteries for harbour use. She, however, has no vessels that can compare with our first or second-class broadside or turret-ships, although she is strong in the third class. Her old unarmoured class is in better condition than ours, but she has only two or three of new type to compare with ours. The United States possess no sea-going armoured ships, but they have an immense fleet of this character available for home defence. The value of their recent unarmoured fleet is very doubtful; some persons regarding it as utterly worthless, while others think that it is of the utmost value. For my part, I suspect the truth lies between these extremes; and I should doubt whether she has any unarmoured cruiser equal to our Incon- stant. So far as I can judge, only two of her ships of the Wampanoag class have succeeded; and the Piscataqua class are almost admitted to be failures. These are the facts in which I think the House may be interested with regard to the present state of the fleet, including those which are now being built, and those which we propose to build in the limits of the present year.

Let me say, in conclusion, that I confidently leave to the judgment of the Committee our acts and policy, which I have endeavoured to describe. As to the departmental arrangements, we have at least sheeted home responsibility for each division of business, and I have every confidence that under the able direction of Sir Sydney Dacres and Sir Spencer Robinson both the personnel and the matériel of the Navy will be well looked after. The Department is working thoroughly well; at least we are all perfectly satisfied with our relations to one another, and the progress of our business. With respect to the second subject which I have brought before the House, speaking on my responsibility, and with the entire concurrence of my naval advisers, I believe that what we have done, and what we propose to do in reference to the men and the fleet will not diminish, but will decidedly add to, the efficiency of the Navy. And with regard to the third subject, our ship-building, having laid before the country a distinct and positive policy, we propose to adhere to it. We believe not only that our proposals will be economical at the present moment, but that they will end in still greater economy, and on that ground we present them to Parliament. I move, Sir, that 63,000 Men and Boys be employed for the Sea and Coastguard service for the year ending the 31st of March, 1870, including 14,000 Royal Marines.

MR. CORRY: Sir, as I am suffering from a severe cold I must be as brief as possible in my observations. In the first place, I must congratulate my right hon. Friend (Mr. Childers) upon the very clear and able, and, I will add, very agreeable manner in which he has introduced the Navy Estimates to the notice of the Committee; and I can assure him that it is very gratifying to me, personally, that he should have been selected to occupy the office of First Lord of the Admiralty, not only from what I hope I may call our mutual friendship, but also because the attention he has paid for many years to naval subjects is a guarantee for the interest which he feels in the naval service. I must also thank my right hon. Friend for the honourable mention he has made of some portions of my naval administration—a compliment I appreciate the more, proceeding as it does from a political opponent. My right hon. Friend has adverted to the very considerable reforms which my Board had made in various branches of the service, and I will tell the Committee the amount of reduction which would have been effected if the Estimates for 1869-70 had been prepared by me. When I resigned Office I left in the hands of my right hon. Friend a Memorandum, describing the character of those reforms, and the reduction of expenditure of which they would have admitted. It amounted to £401,000, as compared with the Estimates of the current financial year. That was the saving resulting from measures which had been decided upon by my Board; but the Estimates for the ensuing year had not been considered in detail at Somerset House, where, as my right hon. Friend is aware, they always undergo considerable modifications, which would have made the total reductions considerably greater than the amount I have stated. I was unfortunately obliged to be absent on the Continent on account of ill-health till the middle of October. Upon my return, having been unable to join in the usual visitation with my Colleagues, I made a private visit to the yards which led to some material economies; almost immediately afterwards I was obliged to go to Ireland for my re-election, and on the day after my return I attended a Cabinet Council, at which the Government determined to resign. The Committee will thus see that I could not possibly have given a careful consideration to the Estimates. I cannot, therefore, say what would have been the precise amount of the reductions we should have effected over and above the amount set down in the Memorandum which I left at the Admiralty, except in respect of Vote 10, section 1, for the purchase of Naval Stores. I calculated the reduction of £401,000 on the basis of the rough Estimate placed in my hands by the Storekeeper General, which amounted to £31,000 more than what was granted for the current year. But I am authorized to say that, after having consulted with the Controller, he found that he could reduce his Estimate to £15,000 below the Vote for the current year. That would be a difference of £46,000, which, added to the £401,000, would make the total reduction £447,000, exclusive of such further reductions as would have been certain to follow a careful revision of the Estimates at Somerset House. But for the purpose of comparing my reductions—if I had proposed the Estimates instead of my right hon. Friend opposite—with those which he has been able to effect, I must make a considerable addition to the £447,000. In estimating the amount I should require for the service of the year, I calculated on the necessity of providing £337,000 for engines, and £515,000 for contract ships—total, £852,000—which the Controller had reported would be necessary, in order to meet existing engagements; and it was not my intention to lay down any new ships, armoured or unarmoured, during the year. In my opinion, sufficient had been done to put the unarmoured navy in a satisfactory state; and I did not think it would have been advisable to build more iron-clads until the applicability of the turret principle to sea-going ships of war had been fairly tested by the approaching trials of the Captain and the Monarch. But I was surprised to find that the Estimate of my right hon. Friend was only £295,000 for the purchase of engines, and £420,000 for contract ships, making together £715,000, as against my Estimate of £852,000. My right hon. Friend therefore asks for £137,000 less than what I should have required to meet existing engagements only if I had had to frame the Estimates. The explanation of the difference, however, is very simple. During the course of the autumn the revenue returns were so unsatisfactory that the late Chancellor of the Exchequer called a Cabinet Council, at which it was decided that, in order to avoid the risk of a deficiency, the heads of the great spending Departments should endeavour to make the largest possible saving upon their respective Votes. I thereupon consulted the Chief Constructor in the Navy—in the absence of the Controller who was then abroad—and the result was that I was able to undertake that, by withholding the payment of part instalments at the end of the financial year, which it was customary to make but to which the contractors had no legal claim, £190,000 of the Contract Vote should remain unexpended. But I understand my right hon. Friend intends to pay the part instalments as usual, during the present financial year, and is thus able to reduce the Vote for next year by the £137,000. If my Estimate for contract work had been prepared on the same principle, it would have shown the same reduction. It is a mere question of adjustment—that is, whether payments should be made on or before the 31st of March, or not till on or after the 1st of April; and, therefore, for the purpose of comparison with my right hon. Friend's Estimates, I have a right to add the further saving of £137,000 to that of £447,000 which I have specified, making a total saving of £584,000 as compared with the Votes for the present year. But this is not all. The Memorandum I left at the Admiralty did not notice Vote 17—the Vote for the Conveyance of Troops, as the War Office was not prepared to furnish us with the necessary data for an Estimate. The Admiralty has no control over that Vote. It has merely to provide for the demands made on it by the War Office. Last year the wages for the seamen and marines serving in troop-ships was provided for under the naval Vote, No. 1, and I had calculated my reduction on the supposition that they would continue to be so. But my right hon. Friend has transferred this item to the Army Vote, No. 17, and has thus reduced his naval Votes by the sum of £74,000. If my naval Votes had been relieved in the same way, they would have shown a further decrease to the amount of the £74,000, which, added to the savings already specified—£447,000 and £137,000—would have made a total of £658,000, as my decrease in respect of naval Votes, as compared with the decrease effected by my right hon. Friend. The total voted for naval services in 1868-9, exclusive of Vote 17, was £10,806,690. Deducting the supplies to other Departments,—£112,082—the net amount was £10,694,608. The total naval Votes for 1869-70, exclusive of Vote 17, are £9,680,293. The difference between the two years is £1,014,315, and if from this sum be abated my savings—£658,000—there remains £356,315, which is the amount of the decrease due in these Estimates to the right hon. Gentleman. His achievement, therefore, is not the reduction of £1,000,000 in the Navy Estimate, but only of £356,000. In one of the journals of this morning it is stated that the Government have saved on the Estimates for the Army and Navy £2,000,000 during the two months they have been in Office, being, it is added, at the rate of £1,000,000 per month. If they go on at this rate, the result by the end of the year will be remarkable. But it may be said that this large reduction of £658,000 was forced on us by public opinion—that we were compelled to be economical on account of the feeling of the country in favour of retrenchment. It has been asserted that the late Government had permanently increased the Estimates half-a-million a year. That is the greatest possible mistake. We never intended to increase the Estimates permanently. We increased them for special purposes. In 1867-8 my right hon. Friend near me (Sir John Pakington) increased them partly for the purpose of making provision for unarmoured ships, which had become indispensable to the maintenance of our foreign squadrons, and partly to increase the work on iron-clad ships, and last year I maintained the increase for the purpose of placing the armoured navy on, at least, as good a footing as that of any other nation. Those objects having been accomplished, the temporary necessity for increased expenditure ceased to operate, and we should have returned to Estimates very much of the same amount as those which were proposed by the Liberal Government before we came into Office. I should now like to show in what manner I proposed to effect the reductions in the Estimates as specified in the Memorandum I had placed in the right hon. Gentleman's hands. In the first place, I proposed to reduce the Marines by 700 men, for the reason I stated—that, the complements for iron-clads being considerably smaller than for line-of-battle ships, their number ought to be limited to that which would admit of their employment afloat with sufficient frequency to qualify them for the double purpose for which the force is intended. I find my right hon. Friend has given effect to my intentions in this respect, for which a memorial to the Queen in Council was prepared before I left the Admiralty. I had also carried out measures which enabled me to reduce by upwards of 1,000 the number of seamen-pensioners, and others, having charge of the ships in the reserves. These reductions effected a saving of £131,000 in the Votes for Wages and Victuals. Last year I abolished altogether the Steam Reserve at Chatham, which led to a considerable saving. This year I effected a further economy in the Medway by substituting one ship—the Agincourt—a first-class iron-clad, for the two line-of-battle-ships which had previously served as flag-ship and as guard-ship of the Reserve at Sheerness. I also placed the seamen's barracks under the charge of the captain of the Reserve which enabled me to dispense with the services of a captain, his staff and 200 men. But the greatest reform I have been able to effect has resulted from abandoning the old system of keeping up an establishment of ship-keepers—engineers, stokers, and servants on board each of the steam ships composing the Reserves. The greater number of these ships are now “locked up,” as it is termed—having no one living on board them—and are placed under the charge of small establishments of officers and men on board “divisional ships.” This reform is estimated by Captain Willes—the late captain of the Reserve at Devonport—to have reduced the annual charge on each of the larger ships from £1,000 to £200. I also proposed to effect a large decrease in the Votes for the Controller of the Navy. It was not my intention to lay down any new ship this year, and, in consequence of that, we should have been able to reduce Votes Nos. 6 and 10 by £195,000 below the Votes of last year, and the amount would have been still further reduced by £137,000, as I have already stated, if, like my right hon. Friend, instead of requiring the money to be re-voted, I could have paid part instalments, in accordance with the usual practice, out of the sums provided for the service of the present year. This would have made a total decrease on the Controller's Votes of £332,000. I also proposed to reduce Vote 11 by £44,000. The balance of increase and decrease would, as shown in the Memorandum, have been a decrease of £401,000, exclusive of any further reductions on a revision of the Estimates at Somerset House. But, as I have already observed, my naval Votes would, if prepared on the same principle with that of my right hon. Friend, have shown a decrease of £658,000. Looking at the Estimates before us, my right hon. Friend will forgive me for thinking that some of his reductions appear to have been made under some pressure—at all events, the first figures given in the general abstract would lead to that inference. The amount taken is £9,996,000, and if the figure six had been turned the other way it would have read £9,999,000. I cannot help thinking that my right hon. Friend was told by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, “You may have as many nines as you like in your Estimates, but on no account must the total begin with the figure ten.” My right hon. Friend effects a decrease, over and above what I should have effected, of £356,000, the difference occurring chiefly under Votes 1 and 2, for Wages and Victuals; Vote 3, for the Admiralty Establishment; Vote 6, for Wages to Artificers; Vote 10, for the Purchase of Stores; and Vote 11, for New Works, and, in my opinion, the greater part of these reductions are ill-advised. Vote 1 shows an apparent decrease of £274,000, as compared with the Vote of last year; but £74,000 has been transferred from it to the Army Vote 17, so that the real decrease is only £200,000; and of that £98,000 is due to the measures which I carried out, so that the amount of reduction due to the present Government is £102,000. My right hon. Friend opposite and his Friends, in the course of the speeches which they addressed to their constituents in the autumn, expressed their satisfaction that I, in some instances, should have followed their advice in the administration of the Navy. But I may now return the compliment, and I congratulate my right hon. Friend on having followed my example, and refrained from reducing the Marines by more than 700 men, although last year he proposed, and went to a division, to enforce the reduction of 4,000. However, we will let bygones be bygones, and I am glad to find that my right hon. Friend, under the responsibilities of Office, has not thought fit to reduce that branch of the service to a greater extent. The Marines are an invaluable body of men, and I hope the reduction now made will be final. I do not think the force ought at any time to be less than the 14,000 at which it now stands. Sir James Graham expressed the opinion before the Manning Commission that they ought never to be reduced below 16,000, and now they are 2,000 below that number. I was surprised to hear my right hon. Friend say that I had left him the legacy of having to reduce the number of officers. He says that I increased the number of officers while I reduced the number of men.

MR. CHILDERS: My right hon. Friend is under a slight misapprehension. What I said was that, during the year he reduced the number of men by 1,700, but he made no reduction in the number of officers.

MR. CORRY: It is true that last year, when a reduction was made in the number of men, there was no corresponding reduction in the number of officers; but this year, when I decided on a further reduction of 700 men, I called for a statement from the Deputy Adjutant General of the proper proportion of officers in reference to the reductions both of this year and of last year, and I directed the draft for a memorial to the Queen in Council to be prepared accordingly, which placed the Marines on the same footing as the other seniority corps in respect of promotion. With respect to the redundancy of officers on the Navy List, I was myself desirous of carrying out a scheme for relieving it by inducing officers to give up their pecuniary claims on the service on payment of a fixed sum; but the plan which I contemplated, although economical in the end, would have necessitated an increase of expenditure in the first instance, and therefore, in the existing state of the revenue, it could not be entertained. The subject is one in which I have always taken great interest; and, indeed, the Retirement of 1847, which reduced the standing of captains before they could obtain flag rank from thirty-eight to eighteen years—a difference of twenty years in the ages of officers on reaching flag rank—was prepared by me, and carried against much opposition within the walls of the Admiralty. My unfortunate illness last year prevented me from paying as much attention to this and other subjects as I should have wished. The scheme my right hon. Friend has indicated would be open to this objection—that officers in want of ready money would sell out, and having lost their capital by unfortunate investments, or otherwise, might appeal to the Admiralty for assistance, which, in many instances, it would be difficult to refuse. Such a scheme might produce great distress. At the same time, I quite admit that anything tending to diminish the number of officers would deserve the consideration of the Admiralty and of Parliament. The better plan, perhaps, is to limit the entries of naval cadets, and my gallant Friend (Sir Sydney Dacres) and myself worked with this view. My right hon. Friend proposes to save £102,000 on Vote 1, by a reduction in the number of stokers, in the number of boys, of the coastguard, and of servants. With regard to the stokers, I am afraid my right hon. Friend has made a mistake. I think I gave sufficient indication last year of my great anxiety to effect every proper economy in the management of the reserves; but I cannot approve of this item of reduction. On making inquiries I found that, although stokers in abundance could be obtained at any time, skilled stokers were very scarce. By skilled stokers I mean men who can keep up the steam at a proper pressure, and preserve a uniform speed; and the difficulty of securing the services of such men will be gathered from the fact that it is necessary to supply stokers from the steam factory at Portsmouth, when ships are to be tried over the measured mile, or the result could not be trusted. If we discharge our skilled stokers, what shall we do in the event of a war? We shall have to go into the market and take stokers where we can find them, skilled or unskilled, and the result, I fear, will be disastrous. With respect to the reduction in the number of boys, it should be remembered that their numbers should always be sufficient to supply the waste of men in the service. Before I left Office I called for a Return showing how we stood in that respect, and I ascertained, from a statement given me by Sir Alexander Milne, that the number of boys was about sufficient to meet the waste of men, but not more. I am rather surprised at the course my right hon. Friend has taken in this matter; because, in the able speech which he made in 1867, he said he was glad that the Admiralty had increased the number of boys by 418, and his only doubt was whether we had gone far enough. He even went further, and said that keeping up a large supply of boys could be justified on the grounds of economy no less than of efficiency. With reference to the coastguard, I must strongly object to any reduction in that service, because it is the only reliable reserve we possess. I have great confidence in the Royal Naval Reserve, and I know it to be an effective body of men; but the coastguard is a reserve composed of the best seamen in the world—almost every man in it is fit to be a petty officer—and they are bound to come forward in case of emergency, for they are all under martial law. It is not proper to regulate the strength of the coastguard by the number of blue-jackets as my right hon. Friend has done; they were never intended to take the place of the blue-jackets, but to provide petty officers for the merchant seamen, whose services would be required on an emergency. My opinion is that any reduction of that force will be attended with danger. The next saving is effected by means of diminishing the number of officers' servants, and supplying their places with 500 Marines. That was one of the questions which I had under consideration during the time I held Office; but objections were urged against it, in the strongest possible manner, by my two senior naval Colleagues, and the Deputy Adjutant General. I confess, therefore, I am surprised to hear the proposal made by my right hon. Friend, for I can scarcely believe that Sir Sydney Dacres now consents to it. It was represented to me that the proposed change, though it might be palatable to the men, was considered objectionable by the officers, who thought that it would derogate from the high position of the corps. On a question concerning the economy of ships-of-war, I thought I ought to pay great deference to the opinions of my principal naval advisers, and I therefore altered my intentions accordingly. At the same time, it is a subject on which much difference of opinion exists in the service. Some officers—and among others my gallant Friend and late Colleague, the Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay)—think the change will be an improvement. I shall only add that I hope it has been well considered, and has not been proposed for mere economy's sake. It would be a grievous error if, for the sake of a paltry saving, the efficiency of that magnificent corps should be endangered. A very serious question, on which my right hon. Friend has given us a clear statement, is as to the reforms in the departments at Whitehall and Somerset House, and elsewhere. That is a question into which I am not at present prepared to enter. It deserves very careful consideration. I confess my own impression is that a great many of the changes introduced by my right hon. Friend will not be found to operate for the advantage of the service. Perhaps, so long as there is no particular pressure upon the Department, no great inconvenience may be felt; but I do not think the large reduction in the number of clerks, and the throwing of an enormous amount of work on individual members of the Board, will be found to answer in times of emergency. I greatly fear that the Admiralty would be found, for the first time, notwithstanding all that has been said against it, unequal to the occasion, and that the navy would be exposed to the risk of misfortunes such as those which befel the sister service in the Crimean War. I think some of these reforms have been made rather hastily; but I should prefer to consider carefully what my right hon. Friend has told us as to his intentions and objects, and to discuss the subject on another occasion. I see in the Vote for Somerset House that many of the establishments are still under revision; and I hope before we are called upon to pronounce an opinion upon the proposed change the whole of the scheme will be before us. The reduction in the amount of wages to artificers in the dockyards is owing principally to the closing of Woolwich Dockyard, in respect of which I will only say, at present, that I think it has been premature. No doubt the Dockyard Committee, in the Report quoted by my right hon. Friend, unanimously recommended the closing of Woolwich Dockyard; but I think my right hon. Friend will find that that resolution was qualified by myself and others, who thought it would be time enough to close Woolwich when the extensions at Chatham were completed. That has not been accomplished yet; and it would be very unfortunate if, on the breaking out of a war, we found ourselves without an establishment on the Thames, or in its neighbourhood, where the engines of ships-of-war could be repaired. The mere power of re-taking the yard which my right hon. Friend intends to reserve would avail very little in a sudden emergency; because, as the docks and workshops would probably be occupied by ships and engines under construction and repair, a considerable time must elapse before it could be handed back to the Admiralty, and it could not be re-established for months, and probably not under a year. The reduction in Vote 10 section 1, I presume arises from the discontinuance of Woolwich Dockyard, and the consequent distribution of its stores amongst the other yards. I am not prepared to say whether the reduction of Vote 11 is a wise measure or not. The principal expenditure under that head, exclusive of the expenditure on the great extensions of the dockyards, is on account of repairs. There is an old saying, "A stitch in time saves nine;" and I hope my right hon. Friend's economy in this respect may not lead to a much larger expenditure by-and-by. I will not, on this occasion, enter into a further consideration of the Estimates, but will wait until the Votes are put from the Chair, when I shall be prepared to state my views and opinions upon them. There is one point, however, upon which I must not only express my decided opinion, but also give notice of an Amendment—I allude to the proposal to build the two larger turret-ships which my right hon. Friend has described. I have already stated that it was not my intention, if I had remained in Office, to lay down any armour-clad ships during the present year, because the Captain and Monarch are so near completion that I thought it better to wait until they had been tried, and the merits of the turret principle tested at sea. I have been very soundly abused about turret-ships; but I can assure the Committee that no one is more anxious for their success than I am. In 1865 I brought the subject specially before the House. I blamed the Admiralty for what I called its supineness in ascertaining by experiment the fitness of turret-ships for service as cruisers, and after that the two turret-ships, now nearly completed, were laid down. But whether I was right or not a year or two years ago, the matter is in a very different position now, when we are within two or three months of the time when the Captain and the Monarch will be tried. I do not care whether those ships fail or succeed—that makes no difference so far as this question is concerned. If they fail, there is an end of the matter for the present; if they succeed, a great number of alterations of different kinds will necessarily suggest themselves for adoption. And not only do I object to laying down these at present, but I am also very strongly opposed to the particular description of ships proposed to be built. They are to be deep vessels, drawing twenty-six feet water, with twin screws, and without masts. If I were at the Board of Admiralty nothing would induce me to build such vessels. Nothing would induce me to send a vessel to sea as a cruiser without masts. These ships, according to my view of the case, are therefore unfit for sea-going purposes, and it is thoroughly recognized by every authority, and it was specified in the Report of a Committee which sat on the subject, that no vessel for coast defence ought to draw more than sixteen feet water. These vessels, then, will, according to my view, be unfit for coast defence and for sea-going purposes. They are, indeed, to carry an enormous quantity of coals. But suppose anything were to happen to their shafts, or other parts of their machinery, they would lie on the water like half-tide rocks. I also think it very undesirable to build a deep vessel for twin screws. The result of recent experiments in that respect has not been satisfactory; and in a scientific point of view it has been ascertained that, although the twin screw may answer to a certain extent in vessels of light draught, it is not suited to those of a deep draught of water. Under these circumstances, I think it very indiscreet to build these ships at present. There is no person in or out of this House who has been more anxious to see the turret principle fairly tested at sea than I am, but I deny that it has been so tested, and therefore I think it most desirable that the Captain and the Monarch should be tried at sea before any more sea-going turret-ships are laid down. So strongly do I object to these two vessels that, though very sorry to make any Motion of the kind, I must give notice that when we come to the Vote for the purchase of Stores I shall move that it be reduced by £40,000, for the purpose of raising the question whether they shall be built or not. If my right hon. Friend tells me that the designs for these ships shall not be approved until the Captain and the Monarch shall have been tried, or if he says that the money shall be applied in some other way, I shall be content to withdraw my Motion. But if I receive no assurance of this kind, I must divide the Committee with the view of stopping the construction of these ships. With these remarks I shall conclude, reserving the

COLONEL SYKES said, he had been looking forward with considerable curiosity to the statement of his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty to see whether the pledges which he had given to his constituents would or would not be redeemed, and he did not hesitate to say that they had been satisfactorily redeemed. His right hon. Friend deserved the greatest credit for the moral courage he had displayed in undertaking his unpleasant task, as he knew he was exposed to the odium of his own Department and to the censures or sarcastic comments of part of the Press for what he proposed to do. Such a man was worthy of the confidence of his country and of his Colleagues. He was happy to say that among the reductions proposed to be carried out his right hon. Friend had not forgotten his own Department. Last Session he (Colonel Sykes) drew the attention of the House to the annual increase of the Vote for the Admiralty, and showed that for seven out of the last ten years there had been an annual increase for the Admiralty establishment. For 1867-8 there was an increase of £2,363, and in 1866 it was £7,352, the total increase in the seven years being £40,391. But now, for the first time within his memory, there was a diminution of such an amount as £13,000 in the Vote for the establishment of the Admiralty, and he hoped that was only an instalment of the £40,391. His right hon. Friend also deserved praise for the reduction of our squadrons dispersed over all the seas of the globe. Setting aside all consideration of expense, on grounds of humanity alone the reduction of the squadron on the west coast of Africa had been frequently advocated. His right hon. Friend had reduced the ships there very considerably, but as the slave trade had ceased, nothing was now to be done but to protect our trade, and he did not hesitate to say that for that purpose five ships would be amply sufficient. Last week he received a list of the names of the ships and their disposition in the China seas, and he made them out to be forty-two, including store-ships, instead of thirty-four as mentioned by the First Lord of the Admiralty. Of these, thirty-one were in harbour, and only one cruising, so that his right hon. Friend would see that a reduction might very easily be made in that branch of the public service. There was one thing in which he could not concur, and that was with regard to the protection of the Persian Gulf. That was an inland sea, and the whole coast, on the Arabian and Persian sides, was dotted with little independent Arab chiefs, all of whom were usually at loggerheads with each other. Formerly, when the local marine of India had charge of the Persian Gulf, the whole of the officers were acclimatized and were also qualified as linguists to communicate with the Arab chiefs and settle their differences for them. English post-captains certainly could not do that, and he was sorry that the Government had discarded the idea of having a local Marine force stationed in the Persian Gulf—a measure which would be better for the health of our officers and men, for our diplomatic relations with the petty chiefs, and also for the public Exchequer. In conclusion, he congratulated his right hon. Friend upon his statement, and trusted that he would go on treading the same path in which he had taken so great a stride on the present occasion.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, it appeared to him that in framing these Estimates his right hon. Friend at the head of the Admiralty had been guided by this consideration—In all probability the new Government when it came into Office found it absolutely necessary to do something, and consequently they “took a pen and wrote down quickly” the sum they wanted to cut down. It seemed as if the Estimates were to be kept below £10,000,000; and so, by cutting down here and cutting down there, they had been reduced to £9,996,000. The late First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Corry) had pretty conclusively shown that every reduction had previously been made which was conducive to the public service. With respect to the changes in the Board of Admiralty, he had himself brought before the House, in February, 1861, a series of Resolutions on the conduct of the Admiralty, and he would refer to those Resolutions to show that the present First Lord of the Admiralty, in his recent alterations, had merely taken a corner of the plan which was before the Committee in 1861, and which was well thought of by the House and the country at the time. He claimed no sort of merit whatever for those Resolutions, which had been drawn up by five or six men of the highest position in the Navy, and which, he believed, if fairly carried out, contained the solution of the question. The Resolutions declared, among other things, that, in order to obtain direct personal responsibility, it was essential to abolish the Board of Admiralty, and to substitute for it a Minister of Marine, with a Secretary in that House; that the Minister of Marine should be directly responsible to that House for the conduct and management of naval administration; that he should be assisted by a council of not fewer than four naval officers, whose opinion he might consult, but to whom he was not bound to defer; that the members of the council should be appointed for five years; that each department of the Navy should have a known or acknowledged head, appointed also for five years; that all promotions and appointments should be the act of the Minister of Marine in council, submitted to him through the proper heads of departments, but for which he was personally responsible, and that the following departments were of sufficient importance to require the special superintendence of separate heads—namely, the discipline and training of the navy and general superintendence of the fleet in commission, and the submission of the appointment and promotion of officers, the manning of the fleet, the construction of the navy, the victualling of the navy, the paying of the navy, the controller of the coastguard, the Royal Marines, the medical department, pensions and rewards, the store department, the department of works, the hydrographer, and the transport service. Now, the objection he took to his right hon. Friend's arrangement was that it must break down. The whole construction of the navy lay between the Controller and the First Lord. With all deference to his right hon. Friend, he was not a shipbuilder, and, with all deference to the Controller, he had built some very bad ships. If the whole construction of the navy was to rest between those two authorities the country would be in a dangerous position. At this moment he believed the pressure on the Admiralty was greater than it was during the Crimean War. Reductions had been made in the personnel, more especially in the Storekeeper's department, which had been presided over by a man of the greatest ability, but which was now left without a head, and how it was to be carried on he did not know. The whole superintendence of the Machinery department, on which the locomotion of the fleet depended, had been thrown on the shoulders of Mr. Andrew Murray—a man of great ability, but who also had the superintendence of the dockyards, on a miserable pittance that would not be accorded to the foreman of a ship-building yard on the river side. He looked forward to a break-down, and was convinced that the alterations at the Admiralty could not stand. In the Committee of 1861 the alteration of the Patent of the Admiralty was discussed at very considerable length, and the reason why the Committee did not report was because there were five Members who had been First Lords upon it. The right hon. Member for Droitwich was the most advanced of the five, and would have consented to some alteration, but the other four—and especially the late Sir James Graham—were opposed to any change in the wording of the Patent. That Patent on the face of it directed that no change should be made in the Board of Admiralty without the sanction of the Crown. What had drawn his attention to that matter was the issue of the most extraordinary circular which ever came out of a public office. There was in that circular an assumption of authority on the part of the first Lord which was entirely irregular; and he thought it was a great pity at such a time, when a new Parliament had met under such novel circumstances, that they should at once rush into that change. If the Admiralty had taken six months to reflect on the matter, and had come down with a well-considered plan, embodying such a scheme as was generally approved seven or eight years ago, he would have been prepared to support it. As to the general reductions in the service, he thought that in many cases they had been most precipitately and harshly carried out. The number of measures before the House, education and such like, requiring a large staff to work each of them, might have held the hand of Government until offices had arisen in which they could have placed those young men. He had seen more than one case in which young men with relatives dependent on them had been reduced to absolute destitution in consequence of being turned adrift on a very short notice. Then, it was an extraordinary thing that his right hon. Friend should have appointed a new man to an important office. No doubt the gentleman in question possessed great abilities, but his evidence before the Committee had been impugned in almost every important particular. He had carefully read the evidence with regard to Mr. Fellowes, and he found that when the Controller was examined there was hardly a point on which he did not contradict him in a most contemptuous manner, and yet this was the person who was to be appointed to an office the duties of which many young men were perfectly competent to perform. Again, the proposal with regard to Lord Camperdown was, in his opinion, most unconstitutional. Why should a Lord in Waiting be sent down to investigate the condition of our victualling yards? Lord Camperdown was, he believed, a very clever and promising young man, but what on earth could he know about pork or beef, or peas or suet, and the way in which those articles were stowed away in casks and packages, preserved, stored and issued? With regard to the proposal for closing Woolwich Dockyard, he might mention that he was a Member of the Committee which investigated the condition of the dockyards. The whole subject was then very carefully considered, and the Committee arrived at the conclusion that it was absolutely necessary to spend an enormous sum of money in making basins for the ships which, up to that period, used to be fitted out in the stream. The Committee recommended that large basins should be opened as speedily as possible to receive ships at Portsmouth, Chatham, Devonport, and Pembroke. That led to the prospective closing of Woolwich and Sheerness, but Deptford was to be retained as a victualling yard for the purpose of killing and curing beef for the navy, a process which, he was glad to say, had now been brought to considerable perfection. It never entered, however, into the heads of the Members of the Committee that the Government would discharge the men employed in those establishments without providing them with work elsewhere. As the Government paid little or nothing towards the poor rates in the towns where they dismissed large bodies of workmen periodically, they were bound to send those men to some of our colonies, or otherwise provide for them. The Government paid but the merest trifle to the poor rates of the various towns, they did not contribute to the schools, and in a word they did nothing more than an autocratic Government would do. In fact, he believed that, in a matter of this kind, the Government of Russia would act more like Christians than ours proposed to do. About twenty years ago widespread destitution prevailed in the Hebrides, and a society was formed to take measures to alleviate that distress, of which Sir John M'Neil was chairman; they raised subscriptions for the purpose of getting the suffering people out of the country. The Government of the day placed the Hercules, 74, at their disposal; she went to Campbelton Loch, in Argyllshire, shipped the emigrants there, and the people were conveyed in that vessel to New South Wales. The present Government ought to act as a paternal Government, and to adopt a similar course with regard to their discharged labourers. The increase of expenditure in the item of wages was owing to the increase which had occurred of late years in the price of provisions and lodging. People were called upon to pay more for their food, clothing and lodging than they were formerly, and the natural consequence had been an increased rate of wages. With regard to the proposed reduction in the number of our cruisers, he would point out the absurdity of attempting to survey the coast of China if the reductions he suggested were made. He knew the coast of China well, and that it was impossible for our wretched gunboats to make way against the monsoon. His hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) had asserted that the extent of the coast of China was 2,000 miles, but he was inclined to think that when the indentations were taken into account it was more than 3,000 miles. Then, it was a very rocky coast, fringed with ranges of islands which were complete warrens of pirates. The protection of a coast of that description would require a much larger number of small vessels than his right hon. Friend had any idea of. If the proposed reductions were made two or three British vessels would probably be cut off by the pirates, whereupon there would be a great outcry in this country, and in the end it would be necessary to send out a large number of additional cruisers. He confessed he hardly understood what the right hon. Gentleman meant by flying squadrons. If there were to be a flying squadron to cruize round the world no doubt that would be a good thing, as a number of officers would be kept in constant employment, and would find out what vessels were good for anything. In his judgment, it would be a very impolitic thing to discharge any of our stokers, who, he was convinced, ought to be classed as skilled artizans, and he fully endorsed the opinion of the late First Lord of the Admiralty respecting the measured mile. He would answer for it that the Controller of the Navy would not allow one of his ships to be stoked by a stoker from the shore. He agreed in all his hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen had said about the Persian Gulf. The officers of the Indian Navy were good surveyors and linguists, and they and the men under them, being thoroughly acclimatized, could carry on operations at any season of the year. He could not see why the Chinese and Indian Governments should not supplement the pay of the Navy. He wished before he sat down to say a word with regard to turret-ships. He was strongly opposed to a low freeboard out at sea. At the back of the Isle of Wight no vessel with that defect could be relied on. Vessels so constructed might get across the Atlantic; but for purposes of warfare they would be found perfectly useless in a seaway, and not one of them when she came into action would be able to keep the water out of her turrets. He also concurred with his right hon. Friend the late First Lord of the Admiralty in the opinion that we ought to have two strings to our bow in the building of our ships. If their engines were disabled—and the finest engines were liable to become disabled—then they might, if they had sails to set, get out of the difficulty.

MR. SAMUDA said, he had never listened to a speech from a member of the Board of Admiralty which presented such various and important matters for discussion as did the statement which his right hon. Friend at the head of the Department had made that evening. It was impossible to deal with those numerous and important topics on the present occasion. He must, however, express his satisfaction with the general plan which his right hon. Friend had sketched in respect to the economies which he had effected or proposed to effect. There could be no doubt that a vast amount of economy in manufacture must result from condensing the work in the dockyards. But then the dockyards which, in his opinion, we should maintain were those which were least likely to be disturbed in the event of an attack being made upon our shores. Now, Portsmouth did not come under that category, while Woolwich did, for the defence of the capital must certainly include Woolwich; and such a dockyard, as it were, in the very heart of the metropolis, in connection with the great engineering establishments of the country, was of the greatest importance. His impression, then, was that Woolwich, Pembroke, and Chatham were the three dockyards which we should find it most useful to maintain, and it certainly was, he thought, very undesirable to shut up places of which, under certain circumstances, we should have to avail ourselves again. Passing from the dockyards to the building of ships, he was glad to learn that a saving of a million was about to be effected, but at the same time he observed this was mainly attributable to undertaking much less; only three iron-clad ships were proposed, instead of the ten which were contemplated last year; and with respect to those three there were some matters to which he wished to call the attention of the Committee. Last year there was a general proposal to divide the building between private and Government yards, which, without having the slightest interested motive in the matter, he looked upon as a wise course to adopt. He was, he might add, extremely glad to find that his right hon. Friend proposed to turn his attention to the construction of turret-ships. But his right hon. Friend's mode of producing these turret-ships was wrong. Last year, after the Admiralty had for a number of years determinedly opposed the turret in favour of the broadside system, a submission was made to the principal shipbuilders of the country, who were asked to furnish their ideas of the description of vessel which they thought best adapted for the service of the country, and it was promised that, whichever proposal was approved of, the proposer should have the opportunity of building the ship at a fair and remunerative price. The builders responded, and the Controller of the Navy then issued a Report, the effect of which was to condemn all the turret-ships proposed, and thereby to set aside the majority of the proposals that were made by the builders. It finished, as almost every submission so made had finished, in the discomfiture of the persons applied to, the Admiralty building something of their own design instead. He had pointed out last year how impolitic was this rejection in favour of broadside vessels of a new type, not one of which was afloat. He had even gone as far as to propose in Committee the substitution of two turret-ships for the vessels proposed, and he believed that the present First Lord supported his proposal. Not six months had elapsed, and now the Admiralty, which prevented turret-ships from being built, when proposed by persons outside that Department, proposed to build three turret-ships themselves. It was not fair that plans, which had emanated from some of the most experienced builders in the country, should be rejected in this way, and the Admiralty were clearly open to the criticism of the hon. Baronet (Sir John Elphinstone), for building a turret-ship of 4,600 tons with 4 feet 6 inches of freeboard, when they had refused last year to build a vessel of 3,739 tons with 10 feet of freeboard, the proposed Admiralty ship being without any masts, while those planned by the private builders had masts which would have brought the vessel into port if the engines were disabled. The experiment which the Admiralty were now about to carry out was much greater than that which they had last year refused to try; and, therefore, believing this—though he approved the principle and had for years advocated the building of turret-ships, and wished particularly to guard himself against expressing any opinion on this new proposal at present—he called on his right hon. Friend not to build them of this exceptional class, and, as a matter of fair play towards those who had been called on by the late Board, to revise the schemes of the builders and adopt them if they were found useful and practicable, as no doubt they would be. It should be remembered that, whatever might be the talent at the Admiralty, the amount of talent outside could never be compared with, but must greatly exceed, that of a single individual there. Passing from this topic, he noticed with satisfaction the determination of his right hon. Friend, in building vessels by contract, to contract only for the fabric, leaving the fittings to be supplied by the Admiralty. This was the best division of labour; and, in a long correspondence with Sir Baldwin Walker in 1861, he had urged this very course as the only mode of obtaining vessels at a reasonable price, but his advice was ignored. In conclusion he could not omit to draw attention to the fact that not a single penny was to be voted for the construction of vessels in private yards, though those yards were in want of work. He did not regard that as wise, for on these private establishments the Government had always had to rely, and would again have to rely in times of difficulty, and no more erroneous policy could be acted on than the withdrawal of all patronage from those whose assistance in times of war the country could not dispense with, and he advised that the Estimates should be revised in that particular.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he hoped that the First Lord of the Admiralty, who had explained the Navy Estimates with so much ability, would take measures to do away with the restrictions as to period of office and as to rank now existing in respect to the appointment of the superintendents of dockyards.

MR. GOURLEY said, he was, in some degree, satisfied with the reductions proposed to be made, but he trusted that the House would see that the country got full value for the money that was to be expended. To ascertain this, he said, it was necessary to ascertain of what the navy was composed. There are 432 ships of all rates nominally, and 293 in commission, exclusive of those in the colonies; but of the 293, forty-one were steam-tugs, barges, and tenders, and a large number of wooden ships of but little use for actual warfare. The modern vessels were comprised in forty-seven armour-clad ships, twenty-four of which were broadsides; but it appeared from recent experiments at Shoeburyness that those broadsides would be of very little use. Not only were they incapable of being placed alongside a fort armed with modern artillery, but they could not carry more than ten days' fuel. With such a small quantity of fuel it would be impossible in case of war with a maritime State to send them with safety to any distant country. Such were the capabilities of ships for which large sums of money were voted. There was in the Estimates an item of £170,000 for fuel for the Navy, and he suggested that the steam vessels, not being required for hostile purposes in time of peace, should then be only used as sailing vessels. Thus, not only would fuel be saved, but the men on board would be made better seamen. With regard to the transports, he remarked that more men per ton were employed in those vessels than merchant vessels; these when employed by the Emigration Commissioners and the Admiralty were required to be manned with four men for every 100 tons burthen, whereas the Government transports are manned with eight to ten men for every 100 tons burthen, a larger number than what is actually required, costing for the four ships in India and the Mediterranean £200,000 for men, fuel, and provisions. The cost of the coastguard was £700,000, and as smuggling was detected, not by the coastguard, but by the officers of the Inland Revenue and policemen, he thought that a greater reduction of that force might be proposed. It did not appear to him that the reduction on the whole of the Estimates was so large as might have been effected.

MR. GRAVES said, he thought there was no point of more importance in the statement they had heard than that which related to the constitution of the Board itself. He had heard with a pleasure, which he believed would be shared by those who for years had considered a serious change was required in the constitution of the Board, that the right hon. Gentleman was moving in the direction of personal responsibility, and that there was to be much more direct responsibility than there had been under the old state of things. The responsibility which had been assumed by the right hon. Gentleman the Committee would claim from him as the representative of the Board in that House, and, if it appeared that the Department was not undermanned, they would have to thank him for a valuable change. It was one worthy of a fair trial; and he (Mr. Graves) would always support movements in this direction. He regretted, however, some withdrawal from the position the First Lord took some years ago with reference to boys. On that occasion the First Lord said he looked upon an increase in the number of boys for recruiting the Navy as one of the most valuable propositions before the House, because it would promote not only economy but efficiency. It was, therefore, with regret he (Mr. Graves) heard of the proposed reduction of 400 or 500 in the number of trained boys; and he was afraid that in making his calculation the right hon. Gentleman had omitted the drain that was going on among the boys, as well as the drain on the seamen. He understood that the drain of men was between 4,000 and 4,200, and that there were only about 4,000 to meet the drain. This was the more to be regretted, because high naval authorities held that the best mode of recruiting the Navy was by taking boys from the training-ships, and that a blue-jacket from a training-ship was better than any man that could be brought in through any other channel. Last year he had ventured to suggest that the Woolwich and Deptford Dockyards should be closed, and that Sheerness as well as Pembroke should be included in the reduction; but he did not meet with encouragement, and he was therefore the more pleased to find that to the extent of two yards a reduction had been finally decided upon. Giving full credit for what had been done in this respect, he regarded it only as a first step towards further reduction, which he advocated as an ultimate, but not as an immediate measure, because it was imprudent to make too large a reduction at one time. He was satisfied it could be shown that the expense of managing the yards was out of all proportion to the amount of work done in them. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Samuda) had pleaded for Woolwich with some force; but out of forty-seven armour-clad vessels we had only ten that could enter Woolwich for repairs, owing to the limited depth of the water and the size of the gates; and in case of an engagement in the North Sea, or accident there to even one of the smaller class of vessels, it was not to Woolwich, but to the nearest port on the east coast of England or of Scotland, that such a vessel would go for repairs. The proximity of the Woolwich Dockyard to London must make labour more expensive there than elsewhere. Whether the factories should be allowed to remain was a serious question for the consideration of the Government. He hoped, that in the course of next year, a proposition would be submitted for the closing of Sheerness, if not Pembroke. It was gratifying to hear the intention of the Admiralty with regard to shipbuilding this year. Although from time to time endeavours had been made to force the Admiralty to build turret-ships, somehow every conceivable class of ship had been tried in preference, more than one of which had been sent to the West Indies to get them out of sight. It was, therefore, with great pleasure he heard it announced that in the future construction of vessels there was to be a large adoption of the turret system. He presumed this was an indication of the fact that the First Lord was exercising a will of his own, and would continue to exercise a judgment upon all the questions which came before him. But if we were to have vessels drawing 26 feet of water, built on the twin-screw principle and without masts, we were again going on an experimental tack, for we had no instance of the twin-screw being tried in a vessel drawing more than 22 feet of water; and the single vessel of that draught was a failure, according to the testimony of the highest officers of the country to which she belonged. The French had tried the twin-screw principle in one or two vessels of 20 feet draught going to New York, and he believed in these instances it had been successful; but there had been very few instances of its adoption in our mercantile marine, and our shipbuilders were generally pretty wide awake in adopting practical improvements. He would strongly urge that no vessel on the twin-screw principle should be laid down until it had been tried with a greater draught. We have six now building on this principle; in a very short time it will be tested, and surely it would be most prudent to wait a little before rushing further into an untried experiment. We were told we had again come into the front rank of nations in the matter of naval strength; there was, therefore, no great reason for undue haste, and on that account he would urge the building of no more vessels on the twin-screw principle until we had satisfied ourselves that it was likely to be a successful one. He was glad to hear it was proposed that the new vessels should carry coal for ten days' steaming, for the want of carrying power had been one of the great blots on our system. The Hercules could carry coal for no more than fifty to sixty hours of full steaming, and she would be overmatched by a vessel of inferior strength and power which could carry double the quantity of fuel. At the proper time he should be prepared to enter more fully into this question.

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD said, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) had complained that India was not charged for the cost of a squadron stationed in the Indian seas. In the interests of the tax-payers of India he (Sir Charles Wingfield) wished to express his belief in the fairness and justice of the arrangement expounded that evening by the First Lord of the Admiralty—an arrangement by which an annual contribution of £70,000 would be levied from India.

MR. BROGDEN said, he had listened with very great pleasure to the speech of the First Lord of the Admiralty. The right hon. Gentleman had displayed a wise discretion in his endeavour to effect an economy in the service over which he presided—an endeavour which he (Mr. Brogden) regarded as an earnest of future results. The country would call for considerably larger reductions than the right hon. Gentleman proposed. In these times of commercial depression and heavy taxation, economy in all Departments of the State was an absolute necessity. In our dockyards especially reform was needed, and whenever the salaried establishment was out of proportion to the labour establishment such a state of things would be open to the suspicion that certain appointments were retained and filled more for the benefit of individuals than for the public interest.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, at this late hour I will not detain the Committee more than a few minutes, but there are one or two points on which I wish to make some observations. We have had a very clear, able, and interesting statement this evening from the First Lord of the Admiralty, and I most willingly join in the tribute which has been paid to him from all parts of the House. In the early part of my right hon. Friend's speech he adverted to the evidence given by me before the Committee on the Admiralty, in the year 1861. That evidence was given under circumstances of some difficulty, but I am bound to say that I have in no degree changed the opinions I then expressed; and my experience as First Lord of the Admiralty since that time has only confirmed me in the conviction that a Board is a bad system of machinery for managing so great and so important a Department of the public service.

My opinion is, that a Minister never acts under that degree of direct personal responsibility which is so necessary for the protection of the public interests when he forms only a member of a Board. I have no hesitation in expressing my approval of the changes which my right hon. Friend proposes to make in the organization of the Board of Admiralty, though of course at this early period it is impossible for me to pledge myself to the details, or to say that the changes which he proposes are those which in every respect I regard as the most desirable. With my right hon. Friend I regret that the Committee of 1861 made no Report, but it must be remembered that, at the end of 1861, the Committee closed its proceedings in the full belief that it would be re-appointed in the following Session, but its re-appointment, unfortunately, was not moved either by the Member at whose instance it was originally agreed to, or by the Member who had presided over its proceedings. But while I give my right hon. Friend full credit in the desire he has shown to introduce economy in the administration, I cannot help thinking that he has been somewhat too precipitate in some of these reductions. For instance, he has altogether failed to explain the desirability of the changes with respect to the clerks at the Admiralty. I myself am afraid that these changes have been made with something like harshness. I speak under correction, for all my information is derived from rumour and statements which have appeared in the newspapers. But if what I hear be true, some thirty or forty gentlemen who have obtained their positions under the competitive system, and who from long established custom have with some reason regarded their positions as affording them a provision for life, have been suddenly informed that their services will be dispensed with after the 31st of the present month. My right hon. Friend, indeed, appeared to think that he has treated these gentlemen with great consideration and kindness, because they were not told that they would not be wanted the next morning. My right hon. Friend, it is true, has told us that they will be re-appointed as vacancies occur, but will this remove the hardship? They will be in the meanwhile deprived of the incomes upon which they have been led to depend, they may have long to wait, and when they return I should like to know if they will receive the increased salaries to which they would have been entitled if their service had been unbroken. I admit that my right hon. Friend is perfectly justified in reducing the public staff if he finds that the work to be done does not require so many clerks, but such reduction ought to be made with a due consideration for the fair claims of those concerned. Such a change should, I think, be introduced more gradually, and be carried out with less harshness to individuals. About the prudence and propriety, moreover, of abolishing the office of Storekeeper General—an office of great importance and which has existed for a long period—I have considerable doubt. With regard to the flying squadron, I did not understand what the ships are of which it was to be composed, or where the squadron was to fly to. My right hon. Friend also stated that certain reserve ships were to cruise at Whitsuntide. I believe they are to go without coal; but I should wish for some further explanation with respect to them. I should like to know in what relation the flying squadron and what I may call the Whitsuntide squadron are to stand in as regards the Channel squadron, which I believe is now at Lisbon? My right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty did not advert this evening to the changes made at the Admiralty; but I understand that the abolition of the Coastguard Office, or the absence of the officer who was at the head of it, has led to much inconvenience. I want to know, therefore, whether the officer to be appointed to command the Whitsuntide squadron will assume the functions formerly exercised by the officer at the head of the Coastguard Office. There is one other subject to which I wish to advert. After what has passed to-night, I cannot help hoping that my right hon. Friend will further consider the question of the turret-ships. During the course of a long discussion I do not think any hon. Member has expressed approbation of that part of the plan of the Admiralty which has reference to those ships, though very strong opinions have been expressed the other way. I think the observations made on the subject by my right hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry) are unanswerable. In the various discussions on the merits of the turret principle I have always advocated as warmly as any one in this House the propriety of making a proper trial of that great invention. Now, I think my right hon. Friend at the head of the Admiralty will admit that the turret-ship, as a sea-going ship, has never been tried. No experiment has as yet been made of a powerful man-of-war on the turret principle as a sea-going ship. In 1865, when I was at the head of the Admiralty, I, in concert with my gallant Friend (Sir John Hay), resolved that Captain Cowper Coles, the inventor of the turret principle, should have an opportunity of building a turret-ship in accordance with his own opinions. He was allowed to select his own builder, and to have the ship constructed as he liked. He selected the well-known Birkenhead firm of Laird, and the Captain, which the Messrs. Laird had built for him, was nearly ready to go to sea. [Mr. CORRY: She is commissioned.] The Monarch also is nearly ready to go to sea. Would it not, then, be better to wait the result of experiments with the Captain and the Monarch, in order to see whether the turret principle was really suited to a sea-going ship, before going to enormous expense in building other ships of the same class? The value of the turret-ship as a coast defence has been established; but great doubt still exists as to whether the principle is adapted to a sea-going ship.

MR. CHILDERS, in reply, said, it was of great importance that the first two Votes should be agreed to that night. If the Committee passed them he would then move to report Progress. He thanked the Members who had taken part in the debate for the kind manner in which they had spoken of himself personally. As regarded the observations of his right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) in respect of changes at the Admiralty, he had in the first place to repeat what he said the other day, that he thought there could be no greater danger in dealing with the case of civil servants than to talk of their having any rights except those which they had clearly by law. [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: I did not use the word "rights."] He had certainly thought that his right hon. Friend had used the word "rights." He repeated that civil servants had no rights as against the Government but those which the law gave them. One of those rights was, when a reduction was made in a

Department and officers were affected by it, to receive the compensation provided for them by Parliament, and beyond that they had in this respect no right. But he quite admitted that, in carrying out a reduction which was for the public interest, the Government should act with every possible consideration towards the civil servants of the Crown, and every endeavour should be made to avoid as far as possible, dispensing with the services of any efficient gentleman who wished to stay in the service. As he had before stated, an inquiry was going on as to the manner in which the details of the reduction in the Admiralty Department should be carried out, and he believed that the result would be a very different one from that which was apprehended out-of-doors. He believed that the great majority of the gentlemen who wished to remain would be afforded an opportunity of doing so. The exceptions would be placed on the redundant list, and when vacancies occurred they would be re-appointed to offices of employment. As regarded the Storekeeper General, the head of the Store department would be subordinate to the Controller of the Navy, and not as now on an equality with him; but as the details of this change were being anxiously considered by him and his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), he hoped the Committee would excuse him if he did not on the present occasion go into particulars as to the exact relations which would exist between the departments. With respect to some remarks made by his right hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry) as to the reductions he had contemplated making, he (Mr. Childers) had purposely abstained from discussing intentions, which had never received the confirmation of the late Cabinet, or had been put into shape until the very last moment after the elections. For this reason he must decline to discuss the financial effect of postponing the contractors' instalments, though he was not much in favour of this kind of economy. His right hon. Friend had challenged him upon the reduction in the number of boys in the Navy, and he admitted that a few years ago he had argued that an increase rather than a decrease was required, but as he had shewn the proportion of boys to blue-jackets was now different. The fact was that, whereas in former years the number of boys rated to seamen was less than the annual waste in the Navy, the number of boys rated at the present time was greater than that waste. His right hon. Friend had during the year reduced the boys by 200, and he (Mr. Childers) only reduced them 200 more; so that the difference was hardly worth discussing. It was unnecessary for him to enter more fully into the question respecting the Marines after the observations with which he had interrupted his right hon. Friend. It was also unnecessary for him to advert further on that occasion to the turret-ships, seeing that the right hon. Gentleman had given notice of a Motion on Vote 6, which would raise the question respecting these vessels most distinctly. In answer to the hon. Member behind him (Mr. Gourley), he had to state that the whole cost of the Indian transport ships which this country had to bear was £10,000. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Samuda) had imported into the discussion the question whether Portsmouth and Sheerness Dockyards should not have been given up in place of Deptford and Woolwich, but he must leave the respective representatives of those places to defend them. For his own part, he had thought it safest to adopt the recommendations of 1864 upon that subject. In defence of the appointment of Mr. Fellowes, which had been attacked by the hon. Member for Portsmouth, he had to state that that gentleman had before the Committee of last Session shown such an extraordinary knowledge and acuteness in dealing with the dockyard accounts that he was well worth the salary he received; certainly no one of the reduced junior clerks could be compared with him. Having answered to the best of his ability the principal questions that had been put to him, he would now ask the Committee to pass the Vote for Men, Wages, and Victuals, and he would then move that Progress be reported.

MR. CORRY said, that he did not in the least blame the right hon. Gentleman for paying the instalments on the contract ships and engines as far as he could during the present year; but he himself had been placed almost under an injunction by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer not to pay them during the present year. Therefore, while the expenditure would have been less during the present financial year by these sums, the Estimates would have been larger by them next year.

(2.) £2,762,353, Wages to Seamen and Marines.

(3.) £1,172,268, Victuals and Clothing.

MR. CORRY asked whether the right hon. Gentleman could inform him whether he intended to take any more Votes before Easter?

MR. CHILDERS said, he was scarcely competent to answer that question, but he might say that no more Votes on these Estimates would be taken before that day fortnight.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he had on a former evening introduced a Bill to enable Lord Napier of Magdala to enjoy his salary as a member of Council in Bombay, notwithstanding his receipt of a pension from the Crown; but he now begged leave to withdraw the measure, inasmuch as he found that, in consequence of its being a money Bill, it must originate in the other House of Parliament.

MISSIONARIES IN CHINA.

QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: In putting the Question to the noble Earl at the head of the Foreign Office respecting Missionaries in China, notice of which has been on the Paper a few days, I wish to observe that the delay which has taken place is due to the rule recently adopted with regard to Questions. I think your Lordships are subjected to some inconvenience in consequence of there being no time set apart, as there is in the other House of Parliament, for the asking of Questions. By the present arrangement it is necessary to put on the Paper the Questions which would give rise to controversy. I do not object to that; but I think there should be a time at which Questions which are not likely to lead to debate may be put.

EARL GRANVILLE explained that the recommendation of the Committee was that Questions likely to lead to debate should not be put without notice, and before a quarter past five, as had frequently occurred previously.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: My Lords, I believe my Notice raises a very important question. In one of the Papers lately presented to Parliament relating to China, your Lordships will find it mentioned that there is a society called the China Inland Mission,—and I confess that when I found there was such a society, I was not surprised at what has followed. The society sent a missionary to the town of Yang-chow, not far from Nankin; an outrage occurred; the mob rose and great violence was committed. Then, in the usual course of things, a naval force was sent for and came; and after some little remonstrance the Chinese, as soon as they saw there was an effective force, gave way. I found it also stated, that when the consul came with the naval force the people received it willingly, and it produced a very good effect, but it produced that effect not on account of any feeling for the missionary, but because a great many dollars were spent in the town by the crews. Now, what I wish to ask is,—what right have we to be sending inland missions to China—what right have we to be trying to convert the Chinese in the middle of their country? It is well known that we cannot stand such a mode of proceeding in our own towns. If a preacher goes to Birmingham and proclaims his notions about Roman Catholicism or Protestantism, we all know what happens. First of all a mob breaks the windows, then they break each other's heads, the police and military are thereupon called in, and after a great deal of noise the two parties retire with their heads broken and their Christianity very much impaired. If that happens among a population so intellectual and so sensible that we call upon them to decide upon all questions of State policy and religion, what can be expected from such people as the inhabitants of Yang-chow? Why, of course they cannot stand what they regard as such a provocation, and they rise up and are furious. They must have remembered, too, what happened in their country twenty years ago. They were then visited by an adventurer calling himself a "Follower of Jesus," who raised a great mob, entered their towns by force, and killed men, women, and children in the most cruel manner. When I was at the Admiralty I saw many officers, who gave me an account of the state of the districts in China which had been overrun by these so-called Followers of Jesus, and it is impossible to conceive anything more horrible. It is no wonder that when these people found that there was again among them a set of foreigners calling themselves by the same name, they should become excited; and I say it is most unjust and unfair that the English naval power should be employed to support them. I find no fault with the despatch of my noble Friend the present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, or with the despatch of Lord Stanley, except that they do not go far enough: but I believe that we ought to adopt some more effectual measure in order to put a stop to these outbreaks. The English Minister and the French Minister insist on our treaty rights, and I believe it is more the wish of the French than of the English Minister that certain rights should be given to missionaries. The Chinese Minister, on the other hand, remonstrated that such proceedings would be productive of great disturbance of the public peace and of much misery. In fact, the papers represented him as using a very good argument. Whether he really used it I cannot say, but he is reported to have said—

“Here are you, the representatives of the most powerful and wisest nations in the world. You have come here as friends in everything else, but you differ in your Christianity. Now, as you are so wise and such good friends, why could you not settle among yourselves which is the true form of Christianity before you distract our country with your rivalry?”

It appears to me that the disciple of Confucius has in that way put a question to which it would be very difficult for either the English Minister or the French Minister to give a satisfactory answer. I have a decided objection to this system of supporting missionaries in the interior of China. I object to it because it is unfair to the Chinese, and I object to it because it places the commanders of our naval force in a most unfavourable position. Their business is to look after pirates, but a missionary is insulted, and, pending satisfaction from Peking, they are pressed to use their Armstrong guns and fire on the people, as the only way of saving the life or the property of the missionary. Now, a young officer thinks nothing of taking a Chinese town with a gun boat. He is delighted with the task; with fifty or sixty men he will take any Chinese town; next the dispute has to be referred to the Government at Peking. But these proceedings are calculated to break up our friendly relations with China, and those relations surely ought not to be allowed to depend on the discretion of a missionary or on the patience of a mob. My noble Friends, now in Office, wish to reduce the navy in China. Now, if you reduce your navy you must reduce your missionaries, for every missionary almost requires a gunboat. The fact is, we are propagating Christianity with gunboats; for the authorities of inland towns know perfectly well that if they get into trouble with the missionary a gunboat will soon come up. In pursuing a course towards a weak country which we could not possibly take towards a more powerful one, it seems to me we are entirely wrong. The Chinese, it appears from these Papers, dislike the French missionaries as much as they do the English; they turn the French missionaries out of the town, and they knock the English missionaries on the head; so that there is perfect religious equality. It is true we desire to advance Christianity in China: but my noble Friend (the Earl of Clarendon) is quite right in saying that Christianity can only go in the wake of civilization and progress. It is true you may easily get a certain class of Chinese to be converts to Christianity; there are plenty of Chinese who will be converts to anything in the shape of dollars; but really to make China a Christian country must be a work of time, and the way in which we are proceeding is not the way to do it. Why, what is the example we set? Suppose a Chinaman asks what effect this new religion has upon the people, and goes to Shanghai to see, what does he behold? Naval and civil officers who are acquainted with all the chief ports in Europe, America, and Asia inform me that, though seaport towns are not usually very moral places, there is no such sink of iniquity as Shanghai. And yet you expect that, having seen your example, and how you force Christianity on by gunboats and Armstrong guns, the Chinese will embrace Christianity! We ought, I contend, to recall these inland missionaries. My noble Friend, I am aware, is not responsible, for he gives very good advice; but that is one of those things which are readily given and hardly ever taken, and the missionaries do not take it. A missionary, indeed, must be an enthusiast; if he is not an enthusiast, he is probably a rogue. No man would go and live up one of those rivers and preach Christianity unless he were an enthusiast, and being an enthusiast he is the more dangerous. Now, I am anxious to know what chance we have of reducing these missions, or, at least, of not allowing them to go still further up the country. They have already got as far as Yangchow, and I am afraid they will go further up the country unless they are stopped, and the further they go the more it will be prejudicial to the interests of Christianity. It may, perhaps, be said that they go at their own peril; but this is not the fact, for if a riot occurs and a missionary injured or killed a naval force is called on to interfere, unless Pekin is so close at hand as to allow time for an appeal to the Chinese Government. Nobody is so much responsible for this mischief as the London Missionary Society, and that society had much better send its missions to some other part of the world, and leave China unconverted, than pursue their present course. He wished to know whether the Government would not adopt some more efficient and stringent mode of dealing with these missionaries, either by sending them out of the country, or by telling them that they should go no further and imperil our friendly relations with China by their proceedings?

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: I feel much obliged to my noble Friend the noble Duke for having brought this question before your Lordships, for it is one of growing and pressing interest, and it is right that the public should know exactly what is the policy of the Government, and how far we propose to deal with the present most unsatisfactory state of things. A blue book upon China, not being very attractive, I dare say very few of your Lordships have read the Papers which have lately been laid on the table, and probably the general public know still less on the subject than your Lordships. The interpellation, therefore, of my noble Friend is likely to prove useful, by enabling me to draw the attention of your Lordships and of the public to some passages in the Papers which have been recently presented. I cannot quite agree with the alternative proposition put by my noble Friend, that a missionary must be either an enthusiast or a rogue. That, I think, is rather too strong. I cannot help admiring the spirit which animates missionaries, and the fearless zeal which animates them in the propagation of religious truth. At the same time, I admit that that zeal often leads them to incur most unnecessary dangers, and creates a state of ill feeling, riot, and bloodshed such as ministers of peace and good-will among men should be the last to create, or to be responsible for. In truth the missionaries require to be protected against themselves, and should be induced not to prosecute their labours in localities in the interior of the country, where no consul resides, and where an appeal to the authorities for protection against a fanatical mob is likely to be unavailing. The London Missionary Society suggested last year that in any new treaty to be negotiated with China there should be an article empowering missionaries to purchase lands and reside in the interior. That was referred to a gentleman, whose knowledge and experience of China may be relied upon (Sir Rutherford Alcock), and who pointed out that, in the first place, such a clause is unnecessary, since the right exists under the French treaty, and, in the next place, that it would be very inconsistent with wisdom or prudence to insist upon it. My noble Friend has referred to one or two cases to show that it would be most unsafe to extend missionary establishments in that country. The fact is quite plain that, not only the authorities and influential persons, but the whole population of China are adverse to the spread of missionary establishments. It is not only most dangerous for the missionaries themselves, but it is much to be condemned with respect to the Government and people of the country. The course of things is exactly what my noble Friend has described. An outrage occurs, life is jeopardized, blood is shed, property is sacrificed, an appeal is made to the nearest consul, who straightway calls to his aid the nearest naval commander, and gunboats go up to exact reparation. The consequence is that we never know what tidings the next mail may bring us, and we are always on the brink of a war, not on account of the violation of any British rights, of any insult to the English Government or flag, or of any injury done to commerce, but on account of the protection of good but imprudent men, who cannot or will not perceive the natural consequences of their own acts. This is a situation of affairs which certainly ought to be altered, and I will call your Lordships' attention to one of the most recent Instructions with reference to the employment of gunboats, which was sent to Sir Rutherford Alcock on the 28th of January—

“ You will have seen by my despatches of the 30th of December and of the 13th and 14th of January that Her Majesty's Government attach the greatest importance to this point; and I have accordingly to instruct you to explain to Her Majesty's Consuls that the special purposes for which Her Majesty's ships of war are stationed in the ports of China, and employed on the coasts, are to protect the floating commerce of British subjects against piratical attacks in Chinese waters, to support Her Majesty's Consuls in maintaining order and discipline among the crews of British vessels in the respective ports and in cases of great emergency; to protect the lives and properties of British subjects if placed in peril by wanton attacks directed against them either on the part of local authorities or by an uncontrolled popular movement. As regard this last point, Her Majesty's Consuls must constantly bear in mind that the interference of naval forces, either on their representation or on the part of naval officers acting on their own estimation of facts before them, will alone receive the subsequent approval of Her Majesty's Government when it is clearly shown that without such interference the lives and properties of British subjects would, in all probability, have been sacrificed; and even in such a case Her Majesty's Government will expect to learn that the alternative of receiving them on board ship, and so extricating them from threatened danger, was not available. Beyond this the circumstances of the case must be of a very peculiar nature which would be held by Her Majesty's Government to justify a recourse to force. Her Majesty's Government cannot leave with Her Majesty's Consuls or Naval Officers to determine for themselves what redress or reparation for wrong done to British subjects is due, or by what means it should be enforced. They cannot allow them to determine whether coercion is to be applied by blockade, by reprisals, by landing armed parties, or by acts of even a more hostile character. All such proceedings bear more or less the character of acts of war, and Her Majesty's Government cannot delegate to Her Majesty's servants in foreign countries the power of involving their own country in war."—(No. 2, 1864; No. 24.)

Those instructions will be rigidly adhered to by the Government, and the Admiralty have sent similar directions to all the naval officers in command, not only in China but in different parts of the world. With regard to reducing the number of missionaries, my noble Friend must be aware that the Government is not precisely responsible in that matter, and that if missionaries chose to go or stay there our power of evicting them from China is small. My noble Friend having passed severe strictures on the London Missionary Society, I would call his attention to a letter dated the 5th of February, which was received from that society, and which I must say is a very proper one on their part, and evinces a disposition to co-operate with us, or, at all events, not to embarrass affairs. The latter part of it reads thus—

"The directors of the London Missionary Society would be glad to ascertain from your Lordship the views which Her Majesty's Government now hold of the range within which, according to existing treaties, missionaries in general may freely move. Because, while the opportunities for their usefulness have grown great and numerous, the directors are anxious that the operations of the missionaries of the London Missionary Society shall be so conducted as in no way to embarrass Her Majesty's Government, or even inadvertently to complicate the relations between the two Empires. That is the only ground on which they would venture to trouble your Lordship in the matter."

That letter evinces no disposition to embarrass the Government, but, on the contrary, evinces some of the spirit which my noble Friend is desirous to evoke. The society also asked what interpretation I should put on our treaty rights, and I had a reply sent in these terms—

"Lord Clarendon is not prepared to place any abstract construction on those treaty provisions. So much must always depend on the circumstances under which, and the grounds on which, treaty privileges are claimed, that specifically to define the practical extent of any such privileges would be more likely to mislead than serve as a sure guide for action. Lord Clarendon considers that in all cases of a doubtful nature, where a British missionary desires to receive counsel or directions, his safest course would be to apply to Her Majesty's Minister at Peking, and be guided by his advice. This course is more particularly to be recommended at the present time, inasmuch as it is clear that a strong feeling prevails among the authorities and people of China against the establishment of mission-stations in the interior of the country; and it would be highly imprudent in missionaries to persist in disregarding the opposition either of the Chinese authorities or people, and braving their animosity, however unjustifiable or misplaced. It is impossible for Her Majesty's Government to protect a missionary establishment in places where no consular authority is at hand to require the local authorities to exert themselves in its defence; and it is no less impossible to suppose that the feelings of Parliament would be enlisted in favour of measures of coercion to avenge a wrong done to missionaries, which, even if they did not end in war, would, for a time, at least, paralyse British trade, and might be open to much question in point of justice as between country and country. The London Missionary Society can, in Lord Clarendon's opinion, render no better service to their missionaries than by inculcating on them circumspection in regard to their own conduct, and the utmost consideration for the feelings and character of the people among whom they dwell. The missionaries will do well to follow in the wake of trade when the people have learnt to see in it material advantage to themselves, rather than seek to lead the way in opening up new locations. In the former case they will find people prepared to receive and listen to their instructions; but in the latter there is too much reason to believe that their proffered instruction will be rejected, and their persons exposed to indignity, and even danger."

I have now stated the policy which Her Majesty's Government propose in future to observe, and I trust that the advice I ventured to give to the London Missionary Society, coupled with the disposition they have manifested to avoid embarrassment to the Government, will be sufficient to prevent further difficulty.

If, however, it should turn out otherwise, the fault will not rest with the Government.

THE BISHOP OF ST. DAVID'S said, that to a certain extent he agreed with the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset)—namely, to the extent that the proceedings to which he had referred were not at all calculated to promote the interests either of Christianity or of England in China; but he thought the noble Duke had proceeded on a hasty assumption in one part of his speech. He (the Bishop of St. David's) could not admit that there existed among the Chinese population so general an aversion from the Christian religion, and so general a spirit of resistance to all attempts to propagate it, as the noble Duke had described. Unless he (the Bishop of St. David's) was greatly mistaken, and unless a bulky volume which he read some time ago was a tissue of fictions, there existed in China a flourishing Roman Catholic mission with a large number of converts, who lived very peaceably, and who, though they were continually extending their religion, met with no resistance, and excited no popular tumult. If so, he would appeal to the noble Duke whether it was not natural that the professors of what they believed to be a purer kind of Christianity should feel a generous and noble spirit of emulation, and desire to gain similar conquests for the Protestant Faith? It appeared to him that there was a very clear and broad line of distinction to be drawn in this matter, and which, as he understood, had been observed by Her Majesty's Government. We ought not, he thought, to attempt to impose any positive restraint on missionary efforts either in China or in any other part of the world. There were persons who were convinced that it was their duty, in obedience to our Lord's plain precepts, to preach the Gospel to all nations, and they were ready to make every sacrifice to that object; and, instead of being subjected to any restraint they should be simply given to understand that they must proceed at their own risk. All that the Government should say was, "If you choose to make the attempt you must make it at your own risk; you must not expect that you will be able to call in the secular arm to enforce or supply any deficiency in your missionary efforts." The missionaries, and still more the society to which reference had been made, had, in his opinion, incurred a serious responsibility, and, if not guilty of something worse than a mistake, were at any rate guilty of a very mischievous mistake if they had so misapprehended the proper field of their exertions as to excite the hostile passions and violence of a Chinese mob. He did not believe this could be in any case necessary for their purpose, but, on the contrary, that it must tend to defeat the object they had in view. He believed that with prudence and common sense it would always be found possible to save the British Government from the necessity of interference in such cases without at all neglecting, but, on the contrary, promoting much better than they now did, the work of the propagation of the Gospel.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH said, he rose to ask for an explanation of one or two expressions that had fallen from the noble Duke and the noble Earl, affecting, as it seemed to him, the position of all missionary societies and of all missionaries labouring in the less civilized parts of the world. The noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) had given a piece of advice to missionaries which he thought no missionary would accept—namely, to leave some particular parts of the world unconverted, or flee from attempts to convert them, because, forsooth, these attempts might prejudice the interests of British trade. The youngest and least zealous of missionaries would probably reply that, important as were the interests of British trade, there was something in his eyes more sacred even than that sacred opium trade for which Great Britain once thought it worth while to wage war—namely, obedience to the command of his Master to go forth and seek to convey the Gospel to every living soul, at whatever risk to himself or others. It was hardly generous for one in the safe security of their Lordships' House to taunt a man who voluntarily took his own life in his hand in encountering barbarians with imperilling the interest of English trade, for, whatever else he imperilled he had first imperilled his own life. He would like to learn what course the noble Duke would take with rebellious missionaries who might refuse to take his advice. Would the noble Duke, who was anxious for stringent measures, propose to save a Chinese mob the trouble of executing or expatriating the missionary, or would he, as a member of a Christian Legislature, maintain that by becoming a missionary he lost the rights of British citizenship, which he would retain if he became a trader? English subjects, as he understood, possessed rights under treaty, and provided they did not transgress the limits imposed by the treaty they were equally entitled to protection, whether they sold cotton or Bibles. It was surely unworthy of a Christian nation to say that if its subjects engaged in any trade, however demoralizing, they should be protected from the least infraction of their rights, or from the least insult, by all the might of Great Britain; but that, if they became missionaries and happened to displease the susceptibilities of the Chinese, they should be left to their fate, or saved from the mob by a forcible expatriation. He admitted, on the other hand, that it was not desirable, for the sake of the missionaries themselves, that they should go out with an army at their back, for that would make them reckless, unspiritual, and untrue to the spirit of their Master. It was one thing, however, to say what a missionary ought to do for the sake of the cause of missions, and quite another thing to say what treatment he should receive at the hands of his own Government, which was surely bound to maintain the rights of its citizens, whether missionaries or traders. He protested against the doctrine apparently laid down by more than one speaker that, because a man was a missionary, he was, therefore, to be deprived of his rights as a British subject. The noble Duke had advocated stringent measures towards troublesome missionaries, but had such a course been always and successfully pursued; had missionaries been always prevented from becoming "troublesome," neither the noble Duke nor himself would have been Christians at the present day. The noble Earl, the Foreign Secretary, had advised the missionaries to "follow in the wake of trade." Perhaps the noble Earl would mention the kind of trade in whose wake they were to follow? There happened to be trades carried on by British subjects, and protected with a high hand by the Government, which would make a most unhappy preliminary to the preaching of the missionary. Were they to "follow in the wake" of the opium trade, or to wait until the beneficial influence of fire-water had prepared the minds of the barbarians whom they were teaching, or were they to wait until the British traders had inoculated them with all their vices before they commenced teaching them the Gospel? Instead of waiting for this the missionary felt that he had a duty imposed on him by a higher Master to go forth and preach the Gospel. He did not defend the indiscretions of any missionary or society, but he earnestly trusted that he had misunderstood what had been said, and that it was not the notion of the noble Duke that the strong hand of Government should be used to suppress missionary exertion, nor that of the noble Earl that the missionary was to go nowhere until preceded by the British trader.

EARL GREY: I entirely agree with the right rev. Prelate that it would be most improper to lay down a rule that one principle should be acted upon with regard to the protection of missionaries and another principle with regard to the protection of traders. Both should certainly be treated alike. But the truth is that in neither case does the country stand with a clear conscience. The fact is that we have abused our superior force, and at one time forced on the Chinese the opium trade in a manner contrary to every principle of justice: we have also protected the abominable coolie trade, and under the shelter of our power we have allowed our merchants constantly and deliberately to infringe the laws of China, and to carry on smuggling and other practices, as well as to force their trade on the Chinese in a most unjustifiable manner. The simple rule that ought to be applied, both to trade and to missions, is that we ought not to attempt to protect English subjects if they choose at their own risk to carry their operations into places where they are likely to provoke riot or hostility. There are certain ports in China where our consuls can exercise authority, though that authority only extends to British subjects; but it is one thing to protect traders at the treaty ports, and it is a totally different thing to say every adventurer or smuggler who may go into the interior and there get into a quarrel with the authorities or the mob may appeal to an English gun-boat for protection. Such appeals are far too often made. I respect, admire, and revere those missionaries who go into barbarous and hostile countries and endeavour to diffuse the great principles of Christianity; but if by their own over zeal they incur danger in remote parts I would not protect them. Other people, we must remember, have feelings as well as ourselves. Suppose the Chinese, believing Christianity to be a great delusion and imposture, were to organize missions to convert us, were to establish missions at Wapping or at Birmingham, and other populous towns, and were publicly to preach against Christianity, would there not be a probability of disturbances? Well, should we think it fair and reasonable, if China were a more powerful nation than ourselves, that some collision having taken place, a Chinese force should come and threaten to destroy the town unless full compensation and reparation were made for insults alleged to have been inflicted on their missionaries, and further insisting upon our putting up an inscription saying that we had been properly punished? Yet that is just what we have been doing. What should we think of such a course of proceeding? The first principles of Christianity is to do unto others as we would they should do unto us; but have we acted on that principle in our dealings with the Chinese? I maintain that the system of supporting missions in China or elsewhere by force is entirely wrong, and I am glad, therefore, that the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) has brought the subject before us. Nobody can be more anxious for the success of the missionaries than I am; but I am certain that in relying on an appeal to force when their own imprudence has brought them into difficulties, they are doing more harm than good to the cause of Christianity. The instructions which the Government have sent out might, I think, have been a little stronger; but they lay down a wise rule, which more than twenty years ago, when I held Office, I had the honour of enunciating with regard to China—namely, that there should no appeal to force or recourse to arms without the express authority of the Queen. I remember that when an expedition went up the Canton river I consulted the Duke of Wellington, and he was most indignant, fully concurring with me as to the impropriety of our troops being used in that manner.

I accordingly sent out imperative orders that nothing of the kind should happen again, and in order to ensure obedience, I so reduced the forces at the station as to render any such expedition impossible. The most satisfactory statement made by the noble Earl (the Earl of Clarendon) was his intention to reduce the number of gunboats, for such is the pressure of British influence that if a strong naval force, is at hand it is extremely likely to be used; while, on the other hand, if we have not enough gunboats to bully the Chinese, both merchants and missionaries will show greater prudence, discretion, and fairness than if they saw themselves supported by a powerful force. I will only add that this discussion has shown the advantage of the rule that Questions likely to lead to discussion should not be brought forward without being placed on the Paper. There can be no objection to a Question on a mere matter of fact being proposed without notice; but if a Question requires a single preliminary observations or explanation notice of it should be given.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he agreed almost entirely with the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Peterborough). He had only risen, therefore, to state that those who had occasioned this fuss were a small independent body of men, acting under no central authority, and in no way connected with the great missionary societies of England, such as the Church Missionary, London Missionary, Wesleyan, or Baptist Societies; those great societies, which conducted their proceedings with the greatest zeal and judgment, should, therefore, be exonerated from the charge which had been justly brought against that small independent body.

CRIME (IRELAND).

ADDRESS FOR RETURNS.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE rose to move an Address for Copies of Correspondence between the Government and Magistrates of Tipperary relating to ejectments at Ballycohey, and Returns of Crimes furnished to the Judges of Assize by the Constabulary in each County in Ireland. The noble Marquess, having detailed the particulars of the dreadful occurrence at Ballycohey, when Mr. Scully, the landlord, having proceeded with civil assistants, escorted by police, to serve notices of ejectment on his tenants, was suddenly fired upon from a farmhouse, whereby two of the constabulary were killed, and four others of the party, including Mr. Scully himself, were wounded, proceeded to comment severely upon the conduct of the stipendiary magistrate in sending so small an escort of constabulary. Considering the character of Mr. Scully, the notoriety of the intended proceedings, and the known determination of the peasantry to resist, the insufficiency of the escort was calculated to provoke rather than ward off an attack. In contrast with the conduct of the magistrate in this case, he would refer to what was done in another case, when the magistrate not only gave an escort of sixty police, but accompanied them himself; the consequence being that no disturbance took place, and the law was vindicated, without bloodshed. He thought a case of greater indiscretion on the part of a stipendiary magistrate than the conduct which led to the attack on Mr. Scully and party never occurred. When the outrage was reported at Dublin Castle, rewards were offered, and additional police were sent down; but after a short time they were withdrawn, and there soon followed two other murders; one of a gentleman who was killed near his own house because of the decision he had given in an arbitration about a right of way, and the other of a man named Tracey, who was murdered on the highway. Since he had first given notice on this matter he had felt it to be his duty to move for another Return, because the state of Ireland presented the most lamentable condition as regarded crime that had been known for years. It was almost impossible to take up a newspaper without meeting with the record of some fresh outrage, and in very few, if any, instances did the perpetrators appear to be brought to justice. Their Lordships had probably all read of the outrage committed at Mullingar quite recently, in which a station-master was the victim. The disproportion of convictions to the number of crimes committed had lately been made the subject of official comment both in Meath and Tipperary. The want of respect for the law appeared to be confined to no particular county and to no particular locality, and it was therefore very necessary that steps should be taken to enforce the law. He could not help thinking that some of the opinions with regard to the land question expressed in certain high quarters had been attended with the most unfortunate effect. As an instance of the carelessness which characterized some of the remarks made upon this subject, he alluded to the circumstance that, at the late election, for Mallow a legal functionary promised the mob that the land question should be "immediately and satisfactorily settled" in the present Parliament. Such statements could hardly be too strongly deprecated, especially when they remembered what was the nature of a "satisfactory settlement" as viewed by the lower classes in Ireland.

Moved, That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies of the correspondence between the Irish Government and the stipendiary magistrate of Tipperary upon the aid to be given to the landlord of Ballycohey to enable him to serve certain notices upon his tenants, and upon the subsequent placing and the speedy withdrawal of extra police upon the townland of Ballycohey; also of any correspondence between the Government and the lieutenant and the magistrates of the county of Tipperary on the same subject: Also, to move for, Copies of the returns of crime furnished to the Judge of Assize by the constabulary of each county in Ireland, and of the criminal calendar of each such Assize.—(The Marquess of Clanricarde.)

LORD DUFFERIN: In reply to the observations of the noble Marquess, or rather in reply to his Motion, I can only state that, inasmuch as the correspondence which has arisen out of the unhappy events to which he has called your Lordships' attention is not completed, I do not think that it would be advisable to lay the Papers upon the table of the House. At the same time it is right I should state that, after due investigation, into all the circumstances of the case, it has appeared to the Government of Ireland that Mr. De Gernon, to whom my noble Friend has alluded as the stipendiary magistrate, certainly did misinterpret the letter of his instructions, inasmuch as he did not communicate the letter concerning the removal of the police to all the magistrates of the district. It is a fact that he merely communicated that letter to two or three gentlemen who happened to have been assembled on that day, and in so doing he certainly failed to comply with the instructions he had received. In consequence of this a very natural feeling of dissatisfaction has arisen against him in the minds of the magistrates of the district, and the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has thought it desirable to remove Mr. De Gernon from that neighbourhood. But, on the other hand, I think it fair to Mr. De Gernon to inform my noble Friend that he has been misinformed. When Mr. Scully applied for personal protection, Mr. De Gernon hesitated to give the protection asked for. I believe the grounds upon which he refused the protection could not be sustained, and the protection was afforded at the instance of the Government of the day in Ireland. As these matters, together with all the proceedings connected with them, occurred under the Administration of the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Abercorn) I do not propose to follow my noble Friend into the particulars to which he has referred; but I cannot sit down without observing how deep must be the humiliation of every one connected with Ireland on witnessing that country become the theatre of outrages from which for almost fifteen years she has been comparatively free. But, on the other hand, it is consolatory to notice that these offences appear to be very much localized, and to be confined to this particular district. I need scarcely say that the Government are fully alive to the exigencies of the situation, and that they will use all the means in their power to make law and justice respected.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN: I shall, my Lords, only say a few words upon this Motion, as I am placed at some disadvantage, owing to the absence of my noble Friend Lord Mayo, who is now in India, and therefore have not had the benefit of a consultation with him. But I think I am in possession of some information which will considerably modify some of the remarks made by the noble Marquess. As far as I understand him, the two points to which he principally refers are, first, the action of Mr. De Gernon in giving Mr. Scully insufficient support in serving the notices of ejectment; and secondly, the subsequent withdrawal of the extra police by the Government. Now, with the appointment of Mr. De Gernon we had nothing to do. He was appointed by a Liberal Government. We found him in Tipperary, and we left him there. I must, however, add that all I had heard, up to the time of this outrage, of Mr. De Gernon was to his advantage, and in especial that he had done good service during the time of the Fenian insurrection. The noble Marquess is right in saying that Lord Mayo granted protection to Mr. Scully in consequence of the danger which would probably attend his visit to Ballycohey; but the circumstances themselves are rather different from those stated by the noble Marquess. It appears that, on the day of this outrage, Mr. Scully proceeded with an escort of six policemen to inspect the lands at Ballycohey, and also with some intention, not very fully expressed to the officials, of serving notices of ejectment on some of the tenants. The report made by Mr. De Gernon states that Mr. Scully availed himself of the escort granted for his personal safety for the purpose of serving notices preliminary to an ejectment, and that he persisted in so doing in spite of the warning given him by the constable in charge of the escort, who informed him, when the conduct of Mr. Scully had collected a very large crowd of people, that the force at his command was insufficient for his protection. Mr. Scully notwithstanding entered a farm yard, for the purpose of serving a notice, when a fire was opened upon his party from the roof and walls of the building. It is evident, therefore, that the outrage arose from the rash and precipitate course adopted by Mr. Scully, who persisted in serving the notices in spite of the wishes and representations of the police. I think, therefore, no blame can be attached to the late Government in the matter. As the noble Marquess said, on hearing of the outrage they sent additional police, who remained there until they were withdrawn in consequence of the representation of the magistrates. The noble Marquess alluded to a letter from the Castle. It was written by the gallant gentleman who then filled the office of Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and I need hardly say that there was no more experienced or more able public servant than Sir Thomas Larcom in any Department of the public service. On receiving the communication from the magistrates the Government had no reason to think there was any dissent from it. Indeed, it was not for five months afterwards and two months from the time the late Government left Office the meeting was held at which it was stated that there had been dissent on the part of some of the magistrates. In justice to Mr. De Gernon, I must say that I think the opinion stated at that meeting may be regarded as an ex post facto one. The noble Marquess has alluded to other outrages which have taken place; but as these have occurred since the late Government left Office we cannot be held responsible. I must, however, remark that I think it is a great stretch of imagination to suppose that the withdrawal of half-a-dozen policemen could have any effect whatever in leading to outrages at a distance of twenty miles from the place where those policemen had been stationed. Again, I think no one can accuse the late Government of having condoned outrages or having failed to assert the law. I am sure that if the Papers for which the noble Marquess has moved were laid on the table of the House your Lordships would come to the conclusion that the late Government were not only justified in the course which they took, but that it was the only course they could have taken.

EARL GRANVILLE: As the noble Duke has alluded to the course taken by the late Government in respect of the repression of crime, I may observe that though the present Government are anxious to do all that can be justly expected with a view to conciliating the feelings of the people of Ireland, that does not at all diminish their determination to support the law, to put down crime, and to take every means to bring home punishment to offenders. In their efforts to improve the condition of Ireland the Government look to the people of Ireland to help them; but I think the Irish people must feel how much such deplorable outrages as those which have been alluded to this evening must tend to create in the minds of the community at large an indisposition rather than a willingness to attend to their representations.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS—NOMINATION DAYS.

QUESTION.

MR. BRYDGES WILLYAMS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the attention of the Select Committee, appointed to inquire into the present modes of conducting Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, will be instructed to take into their consideration the expediency of abolishing Nomination Days at Parliamentary Elections?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, it would be one of the objects of the Select Committee to inquire into the question of nomination days and the expediency of continuing personal nomination.

GIBRALTAR CONVICT PRISON.

QUESTION.

MR. HIBBERT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the statement contained in the Report on Prison Discipline in the Colonies (1867-8), respecting the Imperial Convict Prison at Gibraltar—namely, that—

“The building does not admit of separation. The wards, when full, give only 176 cubic feet per head, the hammocks then almost touching. There are but fifteen separate or punishment cells for the 800 prisoners. The water is very impure. The visitors have visited only eight times in five years;”

whether any enlargement or alteration of the Prison has since been effected; and, if not, whether it is intended to continue such Prison as a place of detention for Convicts?

MR. MONSELL said, in reply, that the statement in the Report on Prison Discipline in the Colonies (1867-8) conveyed rather an erroneous impression with respect to Gibraltar. It would be quite true that if there were 800 prisoners in the convict prison there would be only 176 cubic feet of air per head, but at the time at which the Report was made the maximum number of prisoners was only 390, and the average was 304. The number had now, however, been increased, and there were 525 prisoners. In the last Report made by the surgeon he stated that the health of the convicts was very good, only about 3 per cent being on the sick list. The water, no doubt, was very impure, which was the case generally at Gibraltar; but a Sanitary Commission had been sitting for some time, and they were now boring for water, not only for the use of the convict establishment, but of Gibraltar generally. At the time the Report was made a very unsatisfactory account was given of the way in which the visitors discharged their duty, but new visitors had been appointed, who attended every day, and the last despatches received contained an expression of the Governor's entire satisfaction with the way they discharged their duties. There were no material alterations or enlargements made in the prison, because it had been intended two years ago to get rid of the convict establishment at Gibraltar; that project had been given up, and it had been felt that the Colonial Office had no proper staff at their disposal for the regulation of the establishment. It, therefore, would be handed over to the Home Office, and it would be their duty to consider the requirements of the present establishment and to make whatever alterations they considered necessary in the prison.

IRELAND—THE FENIAN CONVICT MACKEY.—QUESTION.

SIR THOMAS BATESON said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether Captain Mackey, the Fenian convict, who is reported in the Freeman's Journal, the organ of the Government in Ireland, to have received an unconditional pardon from Her Majesty's present Advisers, is the same individual who last year killed a police-constable at Cork, who attacked and set fire to a police barrack at Ballyknockbane and seized the arms of the constabulary belonging to that station, who also attacked and rifled the Martello Tower at Fota in December 1867, and who was implicated in other outrages at Castle Martyr, Knockadoon, Kilmallock, Kilcooley Wood, and elsewhere; whether the said Captain Mackey had, in 1866, been arrested by order of Lord Kimberley, under a Lord Lieutenant's warrant, and had been discharged in the month of April following on his solemnly pledging himself in writing not to return to the United Kingdom; and, finally, whether this man is the criminal who, for these repeated outrages, was, on the 20th of March last, sentenced by the present Lord Chancellor to twelve years' penal servitude—a sentence which the convict admitted to be a most just and lenient one?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: Sir, I am not aware that the Government has any organ, as the hon. Member has stated, in the Irish Press; but with regard to the Question of the hon. Baronet I can only say that the statements contained in it are substantially correct, with one exception, and that is the assumption that the prisoner Mackey has been discharged. The fact is that there has not been the slightest intention of remitting the punishment inflicted on Mackey, and the hon. Baronet will not find his name in the Return which has been already presented to the House.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, he wished to know when the Return will be in print?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he hoped it would be in a few days.

SICK POOR ASYLUMS.—QUESTION.

MR. M'CULLAGH TORRENS said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, When the Return, ordered on the 19th February, regarding the cost of Sick Poor Asylums in the Metropolis will be presented to the House?

MR. GOSCHEN said, in reply, that the part of the Return which related to the number of medical officers, their salaries, and the cost of medicine for the last three years could not be obtained without communicating with several Boards of Guardians, and therefore there had been some delay in collecting that information. It would probably be in the hands of Members next week. The other part of the Return he would endeavour to place in the hands of Members the day after to-morrow.

INDIA—THE AMEER OF AFFGHANISTAN.

QUESTION.

MR. BECKETT DENISON said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that the Indian Government have subsidized the Ameer of Affghanistan with money and arms; if so, whether the subsidy is to be an annual one, and what conditions are attached thereto?

MR. GRANT DUFF said, in reply, that, in compliance with a request for assistance from the Ameer of Affghanistan, the late Viceroy gave him a sum of six lacs of rupees, and sanctioned the payment to him, somewhat later, of a like amount, the greater part of which had no doubt before this reached his treasury. The late Viceroy also sent him some muskets and ammunition. No formal conditions were attached to the gifts. They were intended as a pledge of good-will, and as the expression of a hope that a strong Government was about to be established in a long distracted country. The words "subsidy" and "subsidizing" were not appropriate to the circumstances. Sir John Lawrence never contemplated a subsidy, and the Government considered itself entirely unfettered as to the amount and kind of assistance to be rendered to the Ameer.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he wished to ask, Whether it is intended to proceed with the Endowed Schools Bill on Monday next? He asked the Question because it had created a good deal of feeling in the country.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, in reply, that he hoped to proceed with it on Monday, when it stood for the first Order of the Day.

PARLIAMENT—THE EASTER RECESS.

QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, What arrangements are contemplated with regard to the Easter holidays?

Mr. Goschen

MR. GLADSTONE said, in reply, that the arrangement as to the holidays, which he hoped would be agreeable to the House, was that on Tuesday, the 23rd, he should move the adjournment of the House to the Thursday in the following week. The answer just given by his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Board of Education was substantially correct; but inasmuch as Monday would probably be the day on which the House of Lords would appoint a joint Committee of both Houses to consider the arrangement of the business between the two Houses, it would be convenient if a similar proposition were made in that House on the same day, in which case he should move the postponement of the Orders of the Day till after that Motion was disposed of.

REAL ESTATE INTESTACY BILL.

LEAVE.

MR. LOCKE KING said, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill for the better settling the Real Estates of Intestates, that the law which he proposed to alter was one which had its origin at a very early period of our history. The law to which he alluded was then found expedient with a view to sustain a great system of military organization, and subsequently, when that was no longer required, it was felt convenient to maintain the law then in force in order to uphold a small body of great and powerful territorial proprietors. No very great alteration was made in that law until after the confiscation of the lands of the monasteries in the reign of Henry VIII., when, for the first time, land was allowed to be alienated by will, under certain conditions. When the late Sir Samuel Romilly introduced his Bill to make freehold estates assets for the payment of debts, he remarked that this country from being a feudal had come to be a great commercial country, and certainly it was much more commercial now than it was then. Distinguished Law Officers of the Crown had frequently expressed their opinion that the transfer of landed property ought to be as simple as that of money in the funds, and he thought it was desirable that they should show their earnestness by assimilating the descent of real property as much as possible to that of personal property. He cared not whether they looked at that question from the point of view of the small holders or the great holders of land. If they looked at it from the point of view of the former, they would find that familiar as the small holders of the soil were with the law of personal property, they could scarcely be made to believe that there was such an injustice in the law of real property that if they happened to die intestate all their land would go to only one of their sons; and when their attention was called to that injustice they almost universally made a will, in order that there might be a fair distribution of their property among their children. But, on the other hand, there were cases where the dislike to make a will led persons of that class to postpone doing so till it was too late; and then, under the present state of the law, the injustice to which he had referred resulted from their neglect. He had lately heard a case of this kind of very great hardship. A farmer possessed of several acres had an eldest son, who went away from his father's home and led a very dissolute life. The second son conducted the farm with the father, and the father always told him that he intended to leave him the property, charging it with a certain sum for the dissolute son. The father, however, died suddenly, without making a will; the property came to the eldest son, who took it as heir-at-law, and in course of about a year or so he squandered the whole of it; while the younger son was left entirely destitute. He would next look at the matter from the point of view of the great landholders, and he was prepared to say this was not a question which affected them to any great extent, for they were not only conversant with the law themselves, but their attorneys would tell them of the danger they ran in not making wills. But, further, their real estate was almost universally settled, entailed, and tied up in such a way that it very rarely happened that their eldest sons took it as heirs-at-law without settlements. The great holders of land might therefore well assent to that reasonable measure, which was asked for on behalf of the small owners of real property in this country; and they ought not to resist such a change when it was in their case only a prejudice that was offended. It was said that he wished to introduce the French law into England; but that was an entire mistake. He did not by any means approve the French law, which interfered with the parent's power of willing away his property. In England there was a most fair and just law in regard to personal property. When the husband being a father died intestate one-third of his personalty went to his widow and two-thirds to his children or next of kin. But in the case of freehold land, where there were sons and daughters, the whole went to the eldest son, and there was no provision whatever for the rest of the family. That was a state of things which it was impossible to call other than unfair and unjust. Moreover the whole system was full of anomalies. Long leaseholds, dating perhaps as far back as King James II., and for 10,000 years, which were as good as freeholds, were treated by the law as personal estate; but if the leases were leases for lives, then they descended as freehold estate. They had now a Government which was decidedly a Government of progress; and the country looked forward to its expressing an opinion on that Bill at the very earliest stage. Many Members of that Government had voted in favour of the Bill on previous occasions, and even the name of the present Solicitor General had appeared on the back of it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the President of the Board of Trade had not only repeatedly voted (but spoken in its support most strongly. He therefore felt that the time had arrived when the Government must come forward and not refuse any longer to do an act of justice to the small holders of real property. The hon. Member concluded by moving for leave to bring in his Bill.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE congratulated the hon. Gentleman on the history he had given of his Bill, but in that history there were some omissions. On the last two occasions on which the hon. Gentleman brought forward that Bill, once in 1859 and again in 1866, he was defeated on a division in the first case by 271 against 76, and in the second by 281 against 84, so that although he had made eight converts in seven years, he had increased by ten the number of those who resisted his proposal. Among the opponents of the Bill on a previous occasion was the Attorney General of that day (Sir Roundell Palmer), who felt so strongly on the matter that he came down to the House in his legal garments and made a most telling speech from the front Treasury Bench against it. From the same Bench a speech was also made against the Bill by the present Prime Minister; and the measure was likewise opposed in 1859 by one of the wisest, most philosophical, and most moderate of statesmen, the late Sir George Lewis, who said its effect would be to extinguish that class of persons who were denominated as heirs—a pretty trenchant expression, especially from one so much accustomed to weigh all his words. And so little did the hon. Gentleman opposite trust his own arguments, that he appealed to the House ad misericordiam just to accept this Bill and then limit it to little properties of £1,000 or £2,000 value. The hon. Gentleman had that night given them a touching anecdote; he always gave them a touching anecdote. Last time it was the story of a young woman, now it was the story of a prodigal son. But his latest anecdote only proved that the old father was a stupid fellow for not making his will. Even if the hon. Gentleman's Bill had been in force, that prodigal eldest son would have had half the property, and the small estate would have been cut into two. An infinite amount of distress would be caused by the splitting up of estates into plots of three or four acres. He had watched the results of such a system in Kent where it existed as gavel-kind, and should be very sorry to see it extended to England. The small pauper proprietorships with joint rights so created, of which one owner might be in the union and another in America—he was speaking from books—were a simple nuisance, both to the community and to the unfortunate persons themselves. As he intended to oppose the second reading of the Bill, he would not say much more on the present occasion. He would simply remark that he did not oppose the measure from any feudal or sentimental motive, but from a desire to preserve the security and money value which land at present possessed, but which would be much diminished in the event of the proposed change taking effect.

MR. STAPLETON said, he thought the House would make a great mistake if they were to pass the Bill. He entirely agreed with the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr.

Mr. Beresford Hope

Beresford Hope), who opposed the measure from a Conservative point of view, whereas he opposed it altogether from a Liberal point of view. The hon. Member for Surrey (Mr. Locke King), asked the House to change what he described as the most ancient law in this country, and his demand was based on a personal grievance. On the present occasion the hon. Member had only drawn attention to one grievance, but nine years ago he had alluded to a long string of grievances of a similar kind. He presumed, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman had on his notes a number of other grievances with which he had not troubled the House to-night. It was, however, incumbent on the hon. Gentleman to demonstrate, first, that these grievances really resulted from the present state of the law; and secondly, that they were so numerous as to warrant the great change he proposed in so important a law. He had, however, never done anything of the kind. The whole argument of the hon. Member laboured under this weakness—that he failed to show that the grievance complained of would not have existed just the same even if his Bill had been law. It was mere matter of conjecture to say that this man or that man would have made a will, for in many instances it would, no doubt, happen that he would not have made a will. The hon. Member had stated that the owners of small estates were ignorant of the law, and fancied that on their decease their estate would be divided like their personal property. Now, nothing could be more self-evidently wrong than such an assumption on the part of the hon. Member. These small estates were often the most ancient in the kingdom, and in the north of England there were freeholders whose property had descended from father to son for many generations. How, then, could the holder of such an estate, who had himself inherited to the exclusion of his younger brothers, be ignorant of the fact that his elder son would inherit it to the exclusion of his younger sons? If the present measure became law, the probability was that many persons who now died intestate, would be put to the unnecessary trouble and expense of making wills. It must be also borne in mind that there would be grievances on the other side of the question. It would happen, for instance, that the eldest son would naturally be regarded as the successor to the estate, and would consequently be left without any other provision. His sisters might have had their portions, and his younger brothers their advancements, and yet if the old man should forget to make a will, the property would be divided into equal portions, and the eldest son would get no larger share of the property than the others. Indeed, the grievance would sometimes be intensified, because it might happen that while his younger brothers had been building up their fortunes elsewhere, the eldest son had been expending all his energies in improving this very farm, nearly the whole of which would, under the provisions of the present Bill, be taken away from him. But, even according to the hon. Member himself, the Bill would only bring about an infinitesimally small amount of good, and we should be acting like the inhabitant of China who burnt down his house for a culinary purpose. One of the complaints frequently made was that the land of this country was in very few hands. The hon. Gentleman the Member for East Surrey admitted, however, that the greater portion of the land was under settlement, and consequently it would be in no way affected by the passing of the Bill. For all the grievances referred to there was an obvious remedy, which, however, he did not propose, and which had not been proposed by the hon. Member for Surrey. It was simply that the children who had not received advances in their father's life-time should, on his decease, come next after creditors, and have a claim on the ancestor's estate, no matter in whose hands it might happen to be. For what could it matter to a child who had been left destitute whether the estate were real or personal, or whether it were in the hands of a devisee or of the heir-at-law? Although the hon. Member disclaimed any political object, he knew very well that the object of those hon. Gentlemen who would give their support to the measure was to increase the number of small landed properties in this country; but he ventured to say that, instead of accomplishing that object, the Bill would tend directly to defeat it. The large estates under settlement would not be immediately affected by the Bill, which would, therefore, only touch small estates. Now, supposing the latter were divided great expense would be incurred, much money would go to surveyors and attorneys, and a good deal of land would be wasted. In a vast number of cases, however, the estate would not be divided, but sold, as every attorney would advise his clients to sell the land for two reasons—first, because it would be the best advice he could give; and, secondly, because it would be most to his own interest to give that advice. Well, if the land were put up for sale, it would of course be purchased by the great landed proprietor in the neighbourhood, who would always be able to give a higher price than anybody else. Those who were acquainted with the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland were well aware that a change of this kind was constantly going on, and that the small freeholds were being gradually absorbed in the estates of Lord Lonsdale and of Mr. Marshall, formerly a Member of that House. Now, hon. Gentlemen on that side ought to remember that they owed a great deal to the small freeholders, who, before the passing of the Reform Act of 1832, were the people who returned Liberal Members to the House of Commons. The late Mr. Cobden once said that the great effect of this Bill would be to set a fashion, and that people following the fashion would by degrees give up settlements, so that in the end the great estates of the country would be divided. In his opinion that was a wild speculation. There had been for hundreds of years two lines in which property descended—the line of the Common Law or tail general, and the line of the male entail, which applied to nearly all the land under settlement, and yet the fashion of the Common Law had not destroyed the male entail. Yet surely nothing could be more painful to a dying man than the reflection that his estate would go to his brother, his uncle, or possibly even to some very remote relation, though he left a large family of daughters inadequately provided for. Why, then, should it be supposed that the moral effect of the measure under discussion would be to destroy the practice of entailing estates? It appeared to him that the Bill was a bad one, because it would frustrate the very object it was pretended to promote, like the Septennial Act, which, as everybody knew, was passed for the purpose

MR. GOLDNEY said, he thought the question which the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Locke King) had brought under the notice of the House should be dealt with, if at all, as a whole, and not be made the subject of patchwork legislation. The Commission, of which the late Lord Campbell was the head, in their Reports, dealing with that and other kindred questions, had recommended that if any Act was to be founded upon the suggestions which they made it should proceed on the footing of taking them as a whole and effecting a complete and systematic reform. If the law of inheritance were at once done away with, as was now proposed, the result would be the creation of great anomalies. Let him, for instance, take the case of a widow with a son. Should that widow marry again, the son, under the operation of the Bill of the hon. Gentleman, might not get a farthing of her property. If she died without a will all her personal property would vest immediately in her husband, who might prevent her from making a will, and thus grasp the property of the child. To take another case, if the distribution of a man's property was to follow his domicile, the distribution of property in this country might have to be made in accordance with the law of France. He objected, therefore, to such piecemeal legislation as the hon. Gentleman proposed to support, merely because it bore on the face of it the appearance of being a sort of clap-trap justice.

MR. WALTER said, he was anxious to take the opportunity which the present discussion afforded to vindicate himself from charges which had been brought against him not very long ago by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Bright). The right hon. Gentleman accused him, when his qualifications for the position of a Boundary Commissioner were in question in that House, of being a "fanatical admirer of the territorial interest." The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that the opinions which he had attributed to him on that occasion disqualified him from being appointed to so important and responsible a situation, and under those circumstances he felt assured the House would allow him to offer a few remarks in explanation of those supposed opinions. He would, he thought, be doing the right hon. Gentleman no injustice when he stated that the only possible knowledge he could have of the existence of the fanaticism to which he objected must have been derived from a conversation of some five minutes' duration which he had with him about fourteen or fifteen years back, when the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Locke King) had brought forward a Bill of the very same character as that which he had just submitted to the notice of the House. It had been his lot to vote on more than one occasion, he believed, against the proposal of his hon. Friend, and to speak against it once; but he was neither going to vote nor speak against it that evening. He desired merely to state in a few words the reasons which influenced him in arriving at that which might appear to be a change of opinion on the subject. He had always attached the slightest possible importance to the law of primogeniture, thinking that it would make little practical difference whether it was abolished or retained. What he did attach importance to, however, was the handle it afforded those who wished to throw odium upon the landed interest. It was made a handle for statements on public platforms both in this country and the United States, which were calculated to create an unjust prejudice against the owners of land. If the House would permit him, he would read a passage from the work of an American gentleman who had passed some time in England, and who gave the following description of the general condition of landed property in England. It was often said of Frenchmen that it was impossible to make them understand the law of England, and when he had read the passage to which he had just referred, the House would, he thought, be of opinion that the remark applied with not less force to our American friends. Professor Hoppin, the gentleman from whose Work he was about to quote, was a professor of Yale College, and had written one of the most agreeable books on "Old England" which he had ever read. Speaking of what he had seen in the neighbourhood of Malvern, the Professor said—

"In the distance, upon the Hereford side of the Malvern Hills, rose the monument or pillar of the Somers family. This is one of those proud memorials, the one responding to the other over hill and dale, which remind us of the well-known fact that England is divided up chiefly among twenty or thirty great families. Those rich and powerful families give the law to everything."

That was a fact which was certainly new to him, and, he believed, to every other Member of the House. It was, however, the conclusion at which an American gentleman of the highest education, who had the best possible opportunity of making himself acquainted with the facts, and who mixed in the most intelligent and influential circles in England, seemed to have arrived. But Professor Hoppin proceeded to qualify his remarks in the following manner. After using a few complimentary remarks with respect to our modern legislation, he said—

"Even the rigid old law of primogeniture is not so rigid as I, for one, had supposed. I notice Sir John Barnard Byles, now of the Court of Common Pleas, stated to a friend of mine, in conversation, that the entail of all the entailed estates in England could be cut off when the eldest son coming of age consented, except in four cases. . . . The Justice, furthermore, stated that no property could be entailed for any period longer than a life or lives in being, and twenty-one years."

He had called attention to those passages because they showed the sort of impression which seemed to exist among well-informed and intelligent Americans, as to the way in which landed property in England was held. Almost all those, he might add, in America, with whom he had come in contact, appeared to entertain the notion that there was some law, some fatality, binding on the landed proprietors of England, which compelled them, as a matter of necessity, to leave their property to the eldest son. He recollected talking to a gentleman who informed him positively that every nobleman and landed proprietor in England was bound by law to leave his property in that way, and upon his venturing to dispute the accuracy of that statement, and pointing to the sale of the Duke of Buckingham's property as an illustration of his argument, the reply was, "No doubt you mean to speak the truth, but Mr. Bright says it is as I tell you, and he must know better." The right hon. Gentleman was, no doubt, responsible for a good deal of the misconception which prevailed in the minds of Americans with respect, at all events, to the influence of the law of primogeniture. What the popular feeling in other countries generally was on the subject he hardly knew; but he supposed the idea prevailed among some persons that, by law, all the landed property in England must go from the father to the eldest son. Now, the only case bearing on the point at issue, which came within his personal knowledge, was that of a friend of his own, who lived in Sussex, who had landed property, and who died intestate. He had a small estate near Eastbourne, and the personal property went in accordance with the Statute of Distributions, but the real estate went to the youngest son by a second marriage, in accordance with the law of Borough English. He did not stand up in that House to defend the law of primogeniture in the abstract. He thought it far better that the law, in cases of intestacy, should make such a distribution of a man's property as might be deemed most advantageous for the general good. He, for one, would not maintain that the devolution of landed estate on the eldest son, where no provision was made for the younger children, was anything but a flagrant injustice, and he was of opinion that the hon. Member for East Surrey was perfectly right in calling on the Government, not only to express an opinion on the subject, but to undertake the conduct of legislation with respect to it. A matter so serious as the alteration of the descent of real property ought not to be left to a private Member, but ought to be dealt with in such a manner as to suit, not only the abstract notion of justice, but the habits and general views of the people of this country. His experience led him to the conclusion that there was not the slightest desire in England to see old estates roughly broken up, or old families dispossessed of the power to make disposition of their property. He, for one, would not think it worth while to hold an acre of land if he had not the power to dispose of it as he liked; while he was also of opinion, that if a man went out of the world without having made a will, there would be no right to complain of any disposition which the law might think it expedient and just to make of his property. Such were the "fanatical opinions" which he held on the subject of territorial possessions, and he would commend them to the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, who, he hoped, would acquit him of any wish to see the landed interests unduly favoured or vested with any privileges which they ought not to possess.

MR. HADFIELD said, it was a monstrous thing that because one son was born before the others, he should therefore be entitled to the whole of his father's freehold property. Very little property used to exist in this country except real estate, but now the value of personal property in the country was equal to that of real estate, and no one could understand why this distinction between realty and personalty was maintained. The sense of the country was entirely opposed to it, and when he was in practice he had met with instances in which, upon intestacy, the heir-at-law refused to take the realty to the exclusion of the rest of the family, and divided the property among them, reserving his own share only. He supposed that this question would only be settled, as many others had been, by means of pressure from without; but, sooner or later, the result must inevitably be that victory would be obtained on the side of common sense, good policy, and sound administration of the law. This was such an important matter that he trusted the Government would take it in hand, and endeavour to frame a measure which would ensure a more satisfactory state of things than the present.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, there was a growing custom in the country to accumulate large landed estates, the great bar to which was the law of entail, which prevented such estates coming into the market and being divided. If the hon. Member (Mr. Locke King) carried his Bill he would certainly be furnishing facilities for the sale and division of those estates, and by doing so the desire for accumulating large landed properties would acquire a fresh impetus. In his opinion a man should have the right of leaving and settling his property in the manner he pleased; and it appeared to him that the greatest tyranny was to tell a man that he should not leave his estate as he desired. He trusted that the Bill of the hon. Member would not be allowed to progress, especially under existing circumstances, when there were so many important questions to discuss.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that if he rightly understood the wish of the House,

gathered from the speeches of hon. Members on both sides, there was no intention to divide against the introduction of the Bill. It appeared to be the general sentiment of the House that there was, at any rate, a case for legislation of some kind upon this question, more or less in the direction pointed to by his hon. Friend (Mr. Locke King), and hon. Members seemed inclined to give to the principle of the measure that sort of qualified assent to which they should be understood to give by voting for the introduction of the Bill, independently of those—and, no doubt, there were many—who were disposed to embrace the principle fully and absolutely. Regarding that as quite a reasonable state of things, he only rose to notice the appeal made, or, at any rate, the opinion expressed, by an hon. Member opposite, by his hon. Friend (Mr. Walter), and by several other Gentlemen, that this was a subject which had better be placed in the hands of the Government. He was not prepared at all to demur to that proposition, though until he saw the measure, and it had been carefully considered, he did not know that it would be possible to give a definitive opinion upon either the question whether this was capable of being dealt with as a simple, unconditional proposal, or whether it would require to be dealt with in a more developed and elaborate manner, and with more careful reference to a variety of details arising out of the present state of the law. If, however, he refrained from giving any pledge on the part of the Government that they were willing and disposed to direct their attention to the subject, with the view of introducing such a measure as they might deem upon the whole to be the best, it was only because he thought it was not the duty of a Government to charge itself at any given time with more than a certain number of subjects, and that, in choosing those subjects, it must have regard to its probable opportunities of obtaining for them full discussion and consideration at the hands of both branches of the Legislature, and, if they were approved, of passing them into law. Upon that simple ground he was not able—he wished he was—to give a pledge on behalf of the Government, which perhaps it might be desirable that they were in a condition to give. That being so, he was glad that the Bill of his hon. Friend should be introduced; and if, as his hon. Friend (Mr. Beresford Hope) said, he (Mr. Gladstone) had in June, 1866, taken part in opposing the second reading of this Bill, it was not because he thought that the present law was defensible in all its parts—for he was bound to say that he concurred in much that had been said by his hon. Friend (Mr. Locke King) as to the effect of the present law of intestacy upon the descent of real estate—but because, considering the late period of the Session, he did not think, in 1866, that the labours of his hon. Friend could be brought to a practical conclusion. At the present time he knew not whether the circumstances would be more favourable to the attempt of his hon. Friend, who had, at any rate, one great advantage in proposing this measure in March instead of in June, so that several months were available for its discussion and consideration. He (Mr. Gladstone) agreed with his hon. Friend that the proposition was one which it was material for the House to embrace—that the provisions of this Bill would have but a very limited direct effect upon the descent of the larger properties in this country. His hon. Friend himself allowed that the Bill was mainly to be judged by its probable results upon the smaller properties of the country; and what between the different causes of intestacy—such as pure accident and carelessness, the strange effeminate or capricious dislike which some persons had to consider the contingency which made a will necessary, and the casual errors which, even when persons had been discreet enough to make a will, rendered it informal—the law ought to be the subject of scrupulous care in providing for cases of intestacy. What should be the precise disposition of landed property under the law he did not undertake to say. But he felt that the present law, so far as it concerned real estate, was not the best that could be devised, and, being very much disposed to agree with his hon. Friend, he should vote for the introduction of the Bill.

MR. HENLEY said, he hoped the title of the Bill would be altered, and would be made to read “A Bill for the Confiscation of all the 40s. Freeholds in this Country.” The owners of 40s. freeholds hardly ever made wills, and if one of these freeholds had to be divided among the children, it must be sold, and would fall into the hands of the neighbouring landowner. In this way all the 40s. freeholders would in time be snuffed out, or if they fell into the hands of lawyers and conveyancers, there would be little left for division among the family.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for the better settling the Real Estates of Intestates, ordered to be brought in by Mr. LOCKE KING, Mr. BOUVERIE, Mr. HINDE PALMER, and Mr. HEADLAM.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT, in moving that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the Laws affecting the Registration of persons entitled to vote in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament for Boroughs in England and Wales, and to report whether any and what amendments are required therein, said, that he was afraid that the subject of which he had given notice would be found somewhat dry in its details, but it was not uninteresting to a great number of Members in that House; and a strong desire prevailed that the law in respect to it should be placed on a sounder and better footing. The evils of the existing system were very well known. The question he intended to raise was not calculated to excite party feeling. It was entirely removed from all matters of controversy which affected the basis of the suffrage. Both sides would probably agree that whatever franchise was established every facility ought to be given for all classes of voters to be placed on the register at the smallest amount of trouble and expense. The importance of the question could not be denied. Indeed, ever since Sir Robert Peel's famous aphorism that the battle of the Constitution must be fought in the registration courts it had been admitted that this matter lay at the root of our political system of government. The battle-field of the Constitution was, however, at present in a confused and embarrassed condition, reminding him of the story in Hindoo mythology, according to which Heaven rested on the earth, the earth was supported by an elephant, and the elephant by a tortoise, but what the tortoise was supported by nobody had been able to say. So the English Government was understood to stand on the House of Commons, and the House of Commons on the constituencies, but what the constituencies depended on was by no means clear. As far as he could understand the matter, they appeared to stand on the overseer, who made out the list of persons to elect Members for that House. The overseer's office was very ancient, and he might say antiquated, and the machinery at his disposal was not adapted to the present condition of affairs. He was not a person necessarily conversant with the law, and instructed in the manner in which the list of voters should be made out. Some boroughs were divided into different parishes, and different overseers might happen to act on different principles in the several parts of the boroughs; so that there would be no unity of principle or uniformity of action. The overseer made out his list from the rate book, which was an imperfect and incorrect document for the purpose of a political register. The rate book was kept for the economical purpose of collecting the rate and not for the political object of ascertaining the constituency. The result was that the list made out by the overseer contained names which ought not to be in it, and was deficient in other names which ought not to have been omitted. Then, in order to correct the list, the expensive machinery of the registration court was put in motion, and, after all, a very indifferent list was finally obtained. All this arose from the fact that the rate book from which the list was taken was constructed not for a political but an economic purpose. It might be said, why should not the overseer be compelled to keep the rate book more accurately? Why, at present there was a law and a penalty to compel him so to do, but the law was wholly inoperative, and he believed that any law with a similar object would be equally ineffectual. These considerations led him to the conclusion that, in each of the boroughs of England, there should be an officer whose particular duty should be to pay attention to the making out of the list of voters, and who would discharge the functions of a registrar of voters. That was a plan adopted with great advantage in Scotland, where the system of registration was extremely satisfactory. For example, there was only one man to attend to the whole register of the borough of

Glasgow, and he was informed that he performed his duties admirably. He should be sorry to throw any additional burden on the borough rates; but it was probable that the cost of paying such an officer would not be greater than the charges incurred under the present system. The first requisites, as the basis of the register, were accurate street lists of the occupiers of boroughs. It had been suggested that those street lists might be made out through the intervention of the Post Office as an assistance to the registrar, and he understood that the head of the Post Office, without committing himself to the details or principle of the plan, was not unwilling to give instructions in order to see whether such a thing could be conveniently done through the intervention of that establishment. That would materially diminish the labour of revision, and, instead of crowding claims and objections into a few weeks in autumn, he would suggest that they might be sent to the registrar at any period of the year. In that manner we might get a prima facie good list of the voters. If that were the case, he hoped we might, to a great degree, dispense with the expensive machinery of registration associations. The registers being so deficient, he admitted their existence was almost indispensable, and, at the same time, the temptation became too great to give money to voters to enable them to be placed on the rates and to attend the registration courts. Nevertheless he considered that these registration associations were productive of serious mischief. The consequence of their establishment was at once to scatter objections broadcast over the constituents, and this system had gone to such an extent that the House must feel itself bound to provide a remedy. It seemed to be thought that in politics, as in love and war, everything was fair, and objections were recklessly issued by thousands by the representatives of both parties. He believed that both sides were equally unjust and unfair in that practice, and that objections were made on the unfair speculation that a number of good voters would lose their votes simply because they could not attend to support them. The injustice was great, because it fell the heaviest on those who depended for their subsistence on their daily wages, and to take such men away from their work to attend the Revising Barrister's Courts for one, two, or three days, was to destroy the maintenance of himself and family. The consequences were most mischievous in their results, because this system inflicted on them a pecuniary fine for which they endeavoured in some way or other to recoup themselves in money, and it thereby became an absolute premium on corruption. Parliament should see that each voter was put upon the electoral list without expense to himself or to others, for if others were at the expense of putting him on the register or of keeping him there, they would as a matter of course claim his vote, and, in most cases, would get it. And all these considerations had greater weight when viewed in the light of the recent ruling to the effect that expenditure upon an election contest by a registration society of money paid to it by a candidate was not an expenditure for which the candidate was responsible. Presuming that to be the true reading of the law, the sooner it was altered the better. As a remedy he suggested that all the objections to the first list should be made within as early a day as possible, and that the claims should be delivered a fortnight afterwards; it would then be possible to remove all merely formal grounds of objection, and to cast upon the objector the responsibility of sustaining the objection if he could. He also recommended that the practice of compelling the objector to specify particularly the grounds of his objection should be adopted in the boroughs as well as in the counties. Vexatious objections could be prevented by making the objector pay costs in cases of failure, and find security for those costs before he was heard. The voter would then stand in as fair a position as a successful candidate; he would be placed upon the register by a competent authority, as the registrar of voters would be, and if not absolutely secured against frivolous objections, it would be in the power of the court to award him compensation for loss of time in cases where he stood his ground on his right to vote being challenged. Some alteration, too, was required in the law regulating the registration of lodger claims. Under the present law the lodger franchise had been almost a dead letter, because the lodgers could not tell whether their claims would be objected to or not unless they attended at the Revising Barrister's Court. He could not understand why the lodgers should not be placed in the same position as any other voter, by having his name put upon the first list, which would entitle him to notice of objections. A great deal of caution would be necessary in dealing with all those matters, as it would be impolitic to discourage objections to such a degree as would lead to impunity of errors in the register; and having said so much he would pass to the revising authority. That was rather a delicate matter for a person in his profession to deal with. Sydney Smith once said in reference to a Bishop that the greatest punishment that could be inflicted on him was that he should be preached to death by wild curates. It was a dangerous position for a man to do anything to bring down upon him the wrath of the class of Revising Barristers. He had no disposition to pass any censure on that tribunal; but he begged to point out that if they got their primary list in better condition there would be much less for Revising Barristers to do, and he should hope that many of the trivial details they had now to correct would be removed, and they would only have to deal with questions of law, which were sent by appeal to the Court of Common Pleas. Fewer Revising Barristers would then be required, and they would be able to pay them a higher remuneration and thereby to secure the services of persons of greater weight in the profession. Another amendment was required in the matter of appeal. At present there was no power to compel an appeal from the Revising Barrister, and a strong feeling existed throughout the country upon this point. In the north of England thousands of voters had been disfranchised by a decision of the Revising Barrister, from which all appeal had been refused. In the most trivial suit at Common Law the subject had a right to tender a bill of exceptions to the ruling of the Judge. What reason, then, could be urged against making the same rule in the case of decisions by Revising Barristers? To show that greater powers of amending the list should be given to Revising Barristers than they had at present, he instanced the case of a man, resident in Oxford during the last twenty years, who had been struck off the list simply because he had moved from one street into another during the previous twelve months. and the overseer had omitted to enter the two addresses on the list. The Revising Barrister had in that case no power to amend the description, although he knew the man had as good a qualification as any in the borough. These were a few of the points on which the law required amendment; probably if the Committee asked for were appointed, others having more experience than himself would suggest many more. The noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord Enfield) had suggested that the question of county registration should be included in the order of reference; but he had purposely omitted to include counties because they stood in an entirely different position; the qualification was different, and in consequence of the area of the constituency the machinery of registration must be different. He believed, however, county Members would do good if they had a Committee composed of some of their own number to inquire into the subject of county registration. He would venture, in conclusion, to say that an improved registration system was an object in which they would all concur. Everyone must desire to diminish that increasing cost which had become a scandal to our Parliamentary system, to make the franchise free from much of that corruption which now attended it in consequence of our defective registration, and to give the electors the enjoyment of their rights without vexation and without expense. He hoped that a wisely considered scheme would place our Parliamentary government upon a more just and satisfactory footing than that upon which it stood at present. He begged to move for a Select Committee.

MR. RATHBONE, in seconding the Motion, said, that the present state of the law was such as to offer an almost overwhelming temptation to revision agents to make a large number of speculative objections without any foundation, but upon the bare idea that a great many of those objected to would not be able, or would not take the trouble, to come up and defend their votes. At the last revision court for Liverpool, out of some 40,000 names on the primary register, no fewer than 15,000 had to be separately considered by the Revising

Barristers, who took three weeks in going through the lists. About 9,000 were objections, and 6,000 claims. Out of the 9,000 objections no fewer than 4,700 failed altogether, 500 fines were imposed for frivolous objections, and more than 1,800 fines would have been imposed if the objections had not been withdrawn when it was seen that the Revising Barristers were doing their duty. Of 4,600 householder claims no fewer than 2,000 were good, or, in other words, 2,000 names that had a right to be on the lists had been omitted by the overseers. As he was anxious not to overstate the case, he must deduct from the 9,000 objections 1,400 which were made on both sides, and which related to persons who were dead, but that left no fewer than 7,600 men who were called away from their daily occupations to defend their votes in the borough of Liverpool. And that did not include the county registration. In other words, about one person in eight of those entitled to vote had been subjected to the inconvenience of which he complained. Nor was that all—because a very large number was struck off because they were unable to attend to sustain their claims, the objections being in many cases altogether without foundation. There was only one point on which he would venture to correct the hon. and learned Gentleman who had made this Motion. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said that this hardship pressed most on the poorer classes. In his opinion it would have been more correct to say that it pressed most heavily on the industrious classes who were least able to spare time to defend their votes. With foremen and others whose work was of a really responsible character it was not a mere question of the loss of a day's wages, but of offending their employers by not attending to some important business, and thus losing their situations. There was one safeguard in addition to those mentioned by the hon. and learned Gentleman that he would suggest, not upon his own authority merely, but upon that of some of the most experienced registration agents in the north of England; and it was this—that a person before making an objection should be compelled to state, either before the Registrar or a magistrate, the prima facie grounds upon which the objection was based. The figures he had quoted proved conclusively the necessity of some entirely new method of forming the primary lists. It appeared to him that the House of Commons was bound to give the electors of this country that protection to which the greatest rogue was entitled, for he could not be compelled to appear before any Court until a prima facie case was made out against him.

Motion made, and Question proposed.

MR. COLLINS said, that upon reading the Notice he was very much surprised that the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Harcourt) had not included the counties in it, because the registration in counties was as defective as that in boroughs. The registration in boroughs was very simple, and he doubted if it could be materially improved. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members might exclaim "Oh, oh!" but that did not disprove his statement, but rather showed that they were not conversant with the system. The registration in boroughs was taken entirely from the rate book, and it was the duty of the overseer of the parish to take the rate book on the 1st of August, look through the rates made during the previous year, and if he found that the persons named had been on during the whole of the twelve months he was bound to place them on the register for the following year. The system was therefore self-acting in boroughs. The hon. and learned Gentleman was somewhat inaccurate when he stated that the owners, and not the occupiers, were on the rate book. Since the passing of the Small Tenements Act the contrary was the case. He did not think there was a small borough in the kingdom in which the overseer was not bound to put the occupier's name on the register, and he believed it was done. Otherwise, how could the overseer collect the rate? Overseers were not, of course, infallible; no more were registration officers. An overseer might not know whether a man entered upon his occupation on the 1st of August or the 10th of August, although if the man entered on the former date his vote would be good; if on the latter his vote would be bad. It was obviously impossible always to tell whether an occupation began on the 30th of July or on the 2nd of August. But having seen something of the working of the union assessment committees, and knowing how very accurate they were, as far as the north of England was concerned, he believed there was not a single borough there where care was not taken to have the occupier's name brought upon the rate book. The law very properly required a man's qualification to be stated for the whole of the previous twelve months, and if he had lived six months in one street, and another six months in another street, the two houses he had occupied in succession ought to be placed against his name. Surely there was no hardship in calling upon the man who wished to protect his vote to give the public information where he had lived for the entire year. That had been the law of the land ever since the first Reform Act; there had been decisions of the courts upon the subject; and it was perfectly well known and understood. With regard to the right of appeal, he thought the Revising Barristers were, if anything, rather too ready to grant a case for an appeal. They must judge whether they could grant a case or not; and they would not refuse one if there were any grounds for giving it. Their duty was just the same as that of magistrates at quarter sessions. It was said that lodgers ought not to have to claim their votes, but should have their names put down like other people's. But how was the overseer to get at the lodger, who paid no rates and was not on the rate book? The overseer collected money from the occupiers—a very substantial mode of knowing them; but he had no dealings with the lodger, who must be made to show that he had lived in his lodgings for the requisite period to qualify him. They surely could not say that a lodger once upon the list was to remain on it always, without having proof that he was entitled to be there. In the case of the counties, however, there were one or two points really requiring to be dealt with by legislation. In the counties at present they had two occupation franchises—that of the old £50, or—as he might be called—the Chandos occupier, and that of the new £14 occupier, and the consequence of that was that, as almost every £50 occupier was at the same time qualified also under the £14 occupation franchise, the Chandos occupiers were put on the list twice. That was a needlessly cumbrous arrangement, and it would be better to put those Chandos occupiers on under the £14 clause. In that way they would cure the evil of having a Chandos occupier, as sometimes happened, remaining on the list for perhaps six years after he had left his farm and gone away. In conclusion, if the Government thought there was scope for a Select Committee, of course he would have no objection to it; but he would certainly prefer that the subject should be dealt with by a Bill, and that the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Harcourt) should sketch out in it the alterations which he deemed desirable.

MR. CANDLISH said, the question immediately before the House related to the boroughs, not to the counties. The hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. Collins) stated that the Revising Barristers would always give an appeal to parties when they made out a fair case for it. Now, he knew a borough in the north of England where a Revising Barrister, by his own interpretation of the law, struck out 2,000 voters from a register comprising a total of some 5,000 voters; and that Revising Barrister refused an appeal against his decision. That fact alone, he thought, would justify the appointment of the proposed Committee. The thanks of the House and the country were due to the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Harcourt) for bringing the subject before them, and also for the remedies he had suggested. He wished that before proceeding to amend the mode of making up the electoral register, the grounds on which that register reposed were changed, and the connection between rating and voting were cut at as early a date as possible. The principle of making the vote depend upon parochial rating could not stand as a basis of the franchise, beset, as it was, with so many difficulties. There were other executive defects in the Reform Bill. In many boroughs in the counties of Durham and Northumberland, there were several tenements under the same roof. In Tynemouth all tenants of such houses were struck off; whilst at Shields the same class of tenants were retained. But in Sunderland, which he had the honour to represent, the Barrister compounded the matter by retaining some and excising the rest. Until there was some degree of uniformity in the definition of a house, the working of the Act must be defective. Men of the same social rank were enfranchised in one section of the borough and disfranchised in another. The Assessed Rates Bill, which had been introduced by the President of the Poor Law Board, would do much to get rid of some of the evils of the Reform Bill, but it would fail to touch the question as to what persons were rateable. In conclusion, he trusted the Government would grant a Committee with enlarged power, so that everything connected with the subject, all matters of detail not involving matters of principle, might be brought under its consideration.

VISCOUNT SANDON thanked his hon. Friends opposite for having brought this proposal before the House. The system of registration in Liverpool, the borough with which he was connected, led to very great and serious evils, and the party he was associated with was as anxious as his Colleague who sat opposite that the law on the subject should be altered. It had been said that the present registration system pressed very hardly on the poorer classes of the community; but in his opinion the House ought to consider the matter not as one affecting one particular class, but all sections of the community, and there could be no doubt that all alike—the merchant, the clergyman, the professional man, the tradesman, as well as those technically known as the working classes—were subject to much unnecessary annoyance in this matter. With all due deference to the hon. Member for Knarborough, the objectors to the present system did not rest their case on the fact of the law not being clear, but on the ground that it was vexatious and oppressive. He could fully endorse the opinion expressed by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), and he would venture to suggest that it would be satisfactory to both sides of the House if the Government should see fit to refer this difficult question to the judgment of the Committee on Municipal and Parliamentary Elections, which was shortly going to sit under the direct management of the Government. When he sat in the House, some ten years ago, it was considered undesirable to multiply Committees on kindred subjects, and it must be obvious to every one that the most experienced Members of both parties would be taken up by their attendance on the Committee already appointed, so that this matter, one of no little delicacy and intricacy, and of perhaps as great importance as those entrusted to the Committee on Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, and certainly nearly allied to them, would have to be dealt with by men of far less experience and knowledge in such affairs.

MR. DILKE said, that in many of the larger boroughs the lodger franchise was the most important franchise. In the whole of the old metropolitan boroughs the total increase of voters on the register under the Representation of the People Act was only about 15,000, and the increase consisted of lodgers. But the form for claiming the lodger franchise was technical in the extreme. There were two forms in use, one containing two signatures, the other three; and the Revising Barrister admitted one of the classes to the register only on the condition of his decision being subjected to an appeal to the Court of Common Pleas. But, owing to want of funds, or other cause, the appeal was not tried, and the uncertainty therefore remained. Again, the Revising Barrister sat in the day instead of in the evening, as might be done with convenience to the working classes. The lodgers, unlike other classes of voters, were required to send in a fresh claim every year. The collectors might be made to leave at all lodging-houses notices to the lodgers. As the law stood at this moment, an occupier who occupied two or more houses in succession within the same borough, provided he had not left it, might claim for the houses in succession, but in the case of a lodger there was no such provision. If there were two joint occupiers of a house, each might be placed on the register under the old law, if they paid together more than £20, but no such privilege was given to the lodgers. He contended that the same privileges ought to be given alike to lodgers and occupiers. The result of this state of things was that, whilst in the metropolitan boroughs there were between 200,000 and 300,000 male lodgers of full age, as a matter of fact only 15,000 of them had succeeded in getting on the register. Turning to another point—it could not be questioned that the omissions from the lists in London had been wholesale. In portions of the borough which he had the honour to represent, out of every 100 houses, twenty-five were omitted from the list, on the ground that they were empty or were occupied by women; out of the remaining seventy-five occupiers only forty were placed on the register. From inquiries he had made he found that something similar was the case in the whole of the metropolitan boroughs. Of the thirty-five occupiers omitted, only ten were omitted from any fault of their own; the other twenty-five were left off the register entirely by the negligence, he would not say of the overseers, but of their subordinates. It was a singular fact that the Representation of the People Act (1867) made no provision of a form of claim for enabling occupiers whose names had been omitted through the negligence of the overseers to claim their votes. In Paris there was an excellent system of registration in force, established, not by law, but by authority of the municipality, which might possibly be introduced into this country. Cards were prepared bearing the name of the voter, his residence and profession. When those cards were shuffled into alphabetical order they formed the register, and when into streets, the street lists of the entire borough. Clerks, at a certain period of the year, went round and inquired at each house whether the voter still lived there, and whether there were any other persons who ought to be on the register. From these inquiries the lists were made up, and then subjected to a revision. That system somewhat resembled one he had seen in operation in Australia, under which the rate-collector was directed to leave, at every house in his district, a form of claim enabling persons to get upon the register. Instead of the revising court he was convinced that there should be some efficient person appointed who should be made responsible for the registration of each electoral district.

MR. BRUCE said, that whatever doubts his hon. Friend the Member for Boston (Mr. Collins) might have entertained as to the existence of a grievance upon this subject, those doubts must have been removed by what had come out in the course of the present discussion. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) had made out a good case; but by the time the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) and the hon. Member who had just addressed the House (Mr. Dilke) with so much force and knowledge on the subject had concluded their speeches he must have been quite satisfied that there existed in our system of registration very grave imperfections which required to be removed. When it was stated that in Liverpool there were thousands of voters whose names never appeared upon the list, and that in Chelsea and in other places, out of seventy-five occupiers whose names should have been on the list, only forty appeared there, and when it was stated that numbers of voters were struck off the list on the most frivolous objections, it was impossible to deny that great defects existed in the present system of registration. And it was no wonder that such should be the case. There had been an immense expansion of the suffrage, and the machinery they had endeavoured to apply to the increased pressure consequent upon that expansion was imperfect. In fact, there existed at the bottom of the whole system this great defect—namely, that this system was intended for fiscal purposes, and was unequal to the discharge of political functions. The overseer was good for the purpose of the rate; but he was bad for the purpose of a political register. The hon. Member for Boston had said nothing could be better than the register. They knew, as a matter of fact, that, whatever might be the responsibility of the overseer, his first interest was for the rate. He liked to see who paid the rate. Now, in many cases the rate was paid by the owner, and the occupier's name never appeared in the rate book, and this was one of the reasons why the omissions complained of in the register occurred. A suggestion had been made that the inquiry should not be limited to the boroughs, as there existed grievances of the same description in the counties. He recollected when he was on a Commission of Inquiry some years since very grave imperfections were found to exist, and the remedies recommended by that Committee were very similar, if not identical, with those proposed by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford. He also recollected that they recommended that there should be an officer whose special duty it should be to look after the registration, and it was suggested that the clerk of the peace should be intrusted with that duty. Again, with respect to the objections, they recommended that strong measures should be taken against those who objected to votes on frivolous grounds. In Scotland, which had so frequently led the way in a great many useful reforms, hardly any of those difficulties existed. There they had to deal with the question of boroughs in which a good valuation list had been drawn up, and that was found to be a record upon which trust might safely be reposed. The consequence was that all those omissions, all those grievances, all those expenses, to which the unfortunate voters were exposed in this country, were altogether unknown in Scotland. He was not sure, indeed, whether they had even such an institution as a Revising Barrister in Scotland; but, if it existed at all, it was deprived of all the inconveniences which were attendant upon it in this country. He thought enough had been said by himself, and if not by himself by others, to show the necessity of such an inquiry as was proposed; and he agreed with his hon. and learned Friend that there would be advantage in limiting that inquiry to boroughs. If they could succeed in establishing a good and perfect system, the counties would not be long in following their example.

Mr. PIM said, he hoped that the scope of any inquiry which might be entered upon would be extended to Irish boroughs as well, where similar evils existed, though not to the same extent.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, to inquire into the Laws affecting the Registration of persons entitled to vote in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament for Boroughs in England and Wales, and to report whether any and what amendments are required therein."—(Mr. Harcourt.)

And, on March 19, Committee nominated as follows:—

Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, Mr. LEFEVRE, Viscount SANDON, Mr. RAYBONE, Mr. COLLINS, Mr. DILKE, Mr. BOURKE, Mr. MOWLEY, Mr. WHEELHOUSE, Mr. CANDLISH, Mr. PEMBERTON, Mr. WENTWORTH BEAUMONT, Mr. GOLDNEY, Mr. HODGKINSON, and Mr. HARCOURT:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

REPRESENTATIVE PEERS (SCOTLAND AND IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Mr. STAPLETON, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to alter the mode of electing Representative Peers in Scotland and Ireland, and to enable the Crown to summon such Scotch and Irish Peers as may not be Representative Peers to sit in Parliament for life, said, he would state to the House that the object which he had in view was to introduce in the electoral system, by which Representative Peers were permitted to sit in the House of Lords, something of that principle which was sought to be introduced, and which in some instances had actually been introduced into the election of Members of that House, by what was generally known as the minority clause. Another object which he had was to give power to the Crown to summon Peers to Parliament from Scotland or Ireland by their Scotch or Irish titles. With regard to the first of those points, so far as Scotland was concerned, he proposed that at the general election of Representative Peers for Scotland no Peer should have more than ten votes; he did not make any proposal with regard to by-elections of Scotch Peers following therein the precedent which was set in the minority clause as applied to the Members of that House, an illustration of which they had just seen in the election for the City of London consequent on the death of Mr. Bell, where the minority clause became inoperative, there being only one Member to elect. Then, with regard to Ireland, he proposed that the Irish Peers, who were elected at present only one by one as vacancies occurred, should henceforward be elected in batches of three, and that at those elections no Peer should have more than two votes. Of course, it might be said that by the election of Irish Peers in batches of three the practical effect would be to diminish the number of Peers by two, inasmuch as it would be necessary to wait until there were three vacancies. But he wished the House to bear in mind that there was another measure contemplated, under which it was proposed to release four Irish Bishops from their attendance in the House of Lords; and therefore if it should be thought desirable to increase the number of Irish Peers, it would be very easy to do so by adding two to their number. Even without such an addition he thought his next clause would prevent any injustice being done. The next clause, and the last, was one which he thought the House would entirely agree with. It was that the Crown should have power to summon the Scotch and Irish Peers in Parliament either by their Scotch or Irish titles, the Peers so summoned to be Peers of Parliament for life and for life only. In applying the operation of the minority clause to the election of Representative Peers, he felt confident that if that House passed the Bill it would be accepted by the other House, which it more especially concerned; because it would be in the recollection of everybody that the minority clause came down during the last Parliament from the House of Lords to that House; and therefore he thought that they would not object to apply that principle to their own House. With regard to the objection which was made to the operation of the minority clause, so far as Members of the House of Commons were concerned, it did not hold good with respect to the election of Representative Peers, because the argument which was made use of, that the minority of one constituency might prove the majority of another, had no force when they were speaking of the election of Representative Peers. Then with respect to summoning Peers by their Scotch or Irish titles. He was quite aware that it was always in the power of the Crown to confer an English Peerage on a Member of the Scotch or Irish Peerage, and he did not see any reason why they should not have the same chance of being made Peers as an English country gentleman. Yet that hardly met the case, because an English Peer must be an hereditary Peer. Some time ago, when he was looking over the list of Peers in Dod, in reference to that matter, in order to see how many were on one side, and how many on the other, he came to a title formerly borne by a friend of O'Connell's, an Irish Peer, who had been created a Peer of the United Kingdom, the present holder of which was put down as a Conservative, this showed that conferring English titles on Irish Peers was a blundering and awkward way of redressing the balance. Moreover, when such Peers went into the House of Lords, they went into it not as Scotch Peers or Irish, but as English Peers, and they had precedence only according to their title in the English Peerage. Take, for instance the Duke of Argyll. He was a very great man in Scotland, as they all knew. He was the Macallum More, and yet he sat in the House of Lords merely as one of the Barons, and only had precedence as a Baron. It was difficult to obtain precise information as to the political opinions of some of those Peers who were not in Parliament. He (Mr. Stapleton) would only say that, so far as his own opinion went, the minority in each case consisted of about a third, so that it would be five Scotch, and ten Irish Peers, or in all fifteen. Of course, upon a division in the House of Lords that counted for thirty. He was anxious to have it understood that he brought forward that question, not in the interest of the Scotch and Irish Peers, but in the interest of the community at large. He could not conceive anything more dangerous than a collision between the two Houses. He sat there as a strong Liberal; but, at the same time, he had an earnest desire to preserve the institutions of the country. He would go as far as any man in that House in the direction of reform but not of revolution. But the mode of election of Representative Peers being what it was, if there was any collision between the two Houses, unless the majority of the House of Lords upon the question was more than thirty, the whole collision would arise, not out of any misunderstanding between that House and the hereditary Members of the other House, but out of a misrepresentation, or rather an inaccurate representation of the two subsidiary Peerages; and it might be, unless the Bishops redressed the matter—and they had been told by the Archbishop of York that they were the Liberals of the House—that a majority of twenty hereditary Members of the other House might be in accord with the Members of that House, notwithstanding which a great crisis might arise which would be entirely attributable to the misrepresentation of the Irish and Scotch Peerage. He trusted therefore that he should be permitted to bring in the Bill; for he was quite sure it would meet with the approval of the other House. At all events, they would have the opportunity of making any Amendments to it which they might think proper. In conclusion, the hon. Member moved for leave to introduce the Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I do not perceive any disposition on the part of the House to refuse leave to the hon. Member—to my hon. Friend if he will permit me to call him so—to introduce this Bill, and I hope he will not think I am taking too great a liberty in the suggestion which I am about to make. I think the argument in favour of the principle for which he contends is irresistible; it is impossible not to see that the arrangements for the election both of Scotch and Irish Representative Peers are unsatisfactory and require re-consideration. The case has been stated in the speech of the hon. Member sufficiently, though very briefly, to develop the irresistible strength of the general proposition that there should be a change in this respect. And yet if I might give a recommendation to my hon. Friend, it would be that he should be satisfied with the introduction of the Bill, and that he should not attempt at the present time to press it further. I should not certainly venture to make any recommendation of the kind in a manner implying the slightest derogation from the title of any Member of this House to introduce a Bill, or of this House to pass through all its stages a Bill affecting the constitution of the House of Lords. The House of Lords has at all times exercised its unquestionable right of passing and of modifying or rejecting measures affecting the constitution of this House. The rights of the two Houses in this respect are incontestable. At the same time, as a matter of policy, I think my hon. Friend will agree with me that it is desirable that the initiative should be taken by the House of Lords itself in legislation of this kind. Any decided attempt on the part of this House or of any party in this House to modify the constitution of the House of Lords, particularly at this special period, and with the questions that are likely to come before the House of Lords during the present Session, might produce an effect which, for the time, would be injurious. I think my hon. Friend must also feel that it would be judicious that some time, at any rate, should be afforded to the House of Lords to consider the state of its own subsidiary arrangements in detail, after the very great change that has taken place in the representation of the people and the constitution of the Lower House. And until we come to the conclusion—which I hope we shall not come to—that there is no likelihood that an effort will be made by the House of Lords itself to improve the existing arrangements, we ought not, I think, to show too great an eagerness to take the matter into our own hands. That is the recommendation which I venture to make to my hon. Friend, with great respect and deference. He will understand that it rests on grounds of general prudence, and that it is not offered by way of derogation either from his purpose or his argument, but, on the contrary, in furtherance of that argument and of the cause which he has at heart. If he is disposed to accede to that suggestion, he will probably find that the fruits produced by the efforts which he now makes will be beneficial and without any admixture of dissatisfaction or inconvenience.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to alter the mode of electing Representative Peers in Scotland and Ireland, and to enable the Crown to summon such Scotch and Irish Peers as may not be Representative Peers to sit in Parliament for life, ordered to be brought in by Mr. STAPLETON, Colonel FENNER, and Colonel STURGEY.

SALE OF LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 29.]

(Mr. O'Reilly, Mr. Pim, Mr. Peel Dawson.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. O'REILLY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that he would not trouble the House with any lengthened statement with regard to it. He must, however, make a few remarks, as notice had been given of an Amendment for the rejection of the Bill. Great interest had been for some time felt respecting the limitation of the hours for the sale of intoxicating liquors in Ireland. Three years ago, in consequence of the representations made to him, he undertook to bring in a Bill on the subject, which he did as a tentative measure. This measure, which was similar in its object to the present Bill, although unlike in its provisions, passed a second reading. It was then ordered to be referred to a Select Committee; but July having arrived, it was too late to begin to take evidence, and the Order was discharged. Last year he again introduced a Bill, which was read a second time and referred to a Select Committee, who examined a number of witnesses, upon whose evidence the present Bill had been drawn. He would now point out how far the authority of the Select Committee might be quoted in favour of the Bill. The Select Committee proceeded by Resolution, and they first resolved that—

"The hours for the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday, and the other days enumerated in the Bill be from two p.m., to seven p.m., except in the towns to be hereafter defined."

They next resolved that in other towns to be afterwards defined the hours to be from two p.m. to nine p.m. These Resolutions were passed unanimously. They had then to define what constituted a town under the second Resolution—whether a population of 2,000 or 5,000—and after a division the latter was carried. The evidence conclusively proved that it was desirable to diminish the hours for the sale of intoxicating drinks, and that these hours could be shortened to the advantage not only of the consumers, but of the sellers. All the witnesses, with two exceptions, were in favour of a limitation of the hours. They consisted of stipendiary magistrates and others, and ministers of religion, although he would not rest his case on the evidence of the latter class, as they might be supposed to be prejudiced in favour of sobriety. Mr. Ralph, President of the Association of the Spirit Grocers of Dublin, was in favour of limiting the hours even more than was proposed by the Bill. The Mayor of Cork, a gentleman largely engaged in trade, was of opinion that the public-houses might advantageously be closed at an earlier hour in the country, and that even in Cork they might be closed at eight or nine o'clock. Mr. Barry, President of the Cork Vintners' Society, assented to the hours being fixed at from two to nine on Sunday. Two witnesses, indeed, stood out against any diminution. One was Mr. Cary, President of the Licensed Victuallers of Dublin; and, even he, when pressed with the question whether the hours might not be safely reduced, replied that he thought if there was to be any alteration it would be the best course. As to the other adverse witness, Mr. Porter, an ex-police magistrate, as he was against any restriction whatever on the sale of liquors on Sunday or on any other day, his testimony would probably not be considered of much importance. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Murphy), in opposing the measure of last year, took this ground—he considered it undesirable to make any change in the hours of selling intoxicating drinks in Ireland until the system of licensing houses for the sale of intoxicating drinks had been altered. Now, he (Mr. O'Reilly) believed all who had studied the question were agreed that the whole licensing system, both in Ireland and in England, was in a very unsatisfactory state, and he had urged the Government to bring in a Bill to re-organize and regulate that system. But he protested against its being said that they should not diminish the hours of selling intoxicating drinks on Sunday in Ireland until the very large and complicated question of licensing had been settled. At the same time, if the Secretary for Ireland gave him the assurance that he was in a position to grapple with that question, and desired that this Bill should be postponed until he could deal with it, he would at once accede to the suggestion. His present proposition was only to diminish the number of hours for the sale of intoxicating drinks by two hours in the evening in towns and by four in the country. The last two hours in the public-house were useless for the labouring class, who required to be early at work the following morning; and those hours were also the most productive of drunkenness. Public opinion in Ireland was strongly in favour of the Bill. Only two petitions had been presented against it, one from Cork and the other from the City of Dublin. The petition from Cork was signed by 700, but of these 500 were publicans, leaving only 200 to represent the general community. There had also been a petition from Cork, signed by 700, presented in its favour. He confidently appealed to the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether he was not aware, as the result of his large experience, that public opinion there was greatly in favour of the principle of the Bill. If the principle were affirmed by the second reading, the Bill could not go into Committee before the middle of May; and in the meantime those who were interested in the matter would have ample opportunities for considering its particular clauses.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. O'Reilly.)

MR. MURPHY, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, that, if the measure had been a simple one to close public-houses in Ireland at nine o'clock on Sunday, and would have been made applicable to the country parts as well as to the towns, although it might have aggravated, under the present system of licensing, the evils complained of, he should not have moved an Amendment to it. He reminded the hon. and gallant Member (Mr. O'Reilly) that neither the Bill of last year nor the Bill previous to it passed a second reading as a matter of course, but were referred to a Select Committee, before whom a considerable amount of evidence had been taken. Now, one of the main reasons for my agreeing to the appointment of a Select Committee on this subject was the expediency, and indeed necessity, of inquiring into the general system of licensing, with a view to the correction of the abuses which it is believed that system has engendered; and the hon. and gallant Member must no doubt recollect the opinion expressed by me, and the appeal I made to Lord Mayo, then Chief Secretary for Ireland, as to whether the Select Committee then to be appointed had scope or power enough to deal with the subject and report thereon. The noble Lord's opinion was that the Committee would have such a power, but the result, however, disclosed the contrary, and in fact the Committee did not report at all on the subject. However, amongst other witnesses who had been examined before the Committee was the Chief Commissioner of Police in Dublin, who stated that the legitimate business of the public-houses in Ireland had been trenched upon by the beer-houses and spirit grocers' establishments, and who gave it as his opinion that any alteration of the law in the direction indicated by the Bill ought to be accompanied by a considerable change in the licensing system. He did not admit that the Committee had agreed to the principle of limiting, pure and simple, the hours of keeping open public-houses in Ireland, and he, therefore, differed from the construction which the hon. and gallant Member had put on their Resolutions in that respect. He had last year consented to the second reading of the Bill solely upon the understanding that it was to be referred to a Select Committee, which should inquire into the whole system of granting licenses, and he was very strongly of opinion that such a Bill should not be agreed to until some legislation had taken place with respect to licensing. He was quite convinced that, until some alteration was effected in the licensing laws, it would be perfectly useless to restrict the hours for the sale of liquor as was now proposed. It would be better, therefore, he thought, to wait until the whole subject could be grappled with by the Government than to deal with it by means of bit-by-bit legislation, which could only aggravate the evil which it was intended to remedy. Independently of this consideration, however, the Bill contained a principle which he could never sanction, and that was what was called the permissive principle. This, if carried into execution, would enable two-thirds of the ratepayers to dictate to the minority in the matter of drinking, which was an infringement of the liberty of the subject he could not sanction. The Bill would in short restrict no less than 5,000,000 of the population of Ireland to the hour of seven o'clock in the evening as the hour at which the public-houses should be closed. In his opinion this legislation was useless and irritating, and believing that it would be better to relegate the whole subject to the Government and let them deal with it, he moved, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. STACPOOLE seconded the Amendment.

MR. DAWSON said, he regretted that the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Murphy) had continued his opposition to this Bill, which was calculated to do much good. He was in hopes that the hon. Member, after listening to the evidence given before the Select Committee on this question, would have come to the conclusion that a measure of this sort was necessary. The provisions of the Bill appeared to be of a most harmless character, and to embody legislation which was loudly called for. A most moderate restriction upon the sale of liquor was proposed, and in the interest of morality and order he hoped that that restriction would be agreed to. There was reason to fear that drunkenness was on the increase in Ireland, especially in large towns, on the Sunday; and as the interests of travellers and the general convenience were consulted by the Bill, which enlisted the support of Presbyterians and Catholics alike, he hoped that the opposition to the second reading would not be persisted in.

MR. BREWER said, that the medical profession and the justices of the peace had testified that the great amount of ardent spirits which was consumed tended largely to the increase of disease, pauperism, and crime, and thus indirectly to the increase of the public taxation. That being the case, it was time that the House interposed with some legislation on the matter. It had been said that such a measure as this ought not to be introduced until the licensing system was remodelled; but if they did so they would then be told to wait until some restriction was proposed upon the opening of the licensed houses. It was the old story of Lord Chatham waiting for Sir Richard Strachan, and Sir Richard waiting for Lord Chatham. If Parliament were responsible for the punishment of crime, there was no harm in their trying to prevent crime, and on that principle he should support the second reading.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that two points had been clearly established by this discussion. One was that the present licensing system was seriously defective and gave rise to well-grounded complaint; the other, that there was a widespread desire in Ireland in favour of some further restriction upon the sale of intoxicating liquor on Sundays, that feeling not being confined to one class or creed, but being shared, as the hon. Member (Mr. Dawson) had stated, by the Presbyterians of the north as well as by the Catholics of the south. These statements were true, whatever effect they might have upon the ultimate fate of the Bill, and they both supported the appeal which he should make to his hon. Friend (Mr. Murphy) not to reject the Bill at its present stage, but to allow it to go forward to Committee. As to the licensing system, he did not know that he could reply in very definite terms to the appeal of his hon. Friend (Mr. O'Reilly); still, when he, sitting on the Treasury Bench, admitted that the present state of the law was unsatisfactory and mischievous, this was a tolerably plain acknowledgment that it was incumbent upon the Government, in due time and at the proper opportunity, to deal with that system. Without going any further at present, he should be glad of time to look into the matter and see whether he could, upon a subsequent occasion, state his opinions more definitely to the author of the Bill and the House. As to the strong feeling which existed in favour of the Bill, that was also a reason why his hon. Friend (Mr. Murphy) should give the people of Ireland further time to look into the provisions of the measure and consider them before the House finally decided respecting them. Although his hon. Friend was not sanguine of any good to be effected by restrictions upon the sale of drink on Sunday, until the licensing laws were placed on a better foundation, he did not refuse his assent to a certain amount of restriction in this direction. There being, therefore, evidently some room for a compromise, and the proper time to deal with such a compromise being in Committee, he would recommend his hon. Friend to allow the Bill to reach that further stage.

MR. MURPHY said, that, after the appeal just made to him by his right hon. Friend, he would withdraw his Amendment.

(Lord Robert Montagu, Mr. Selwin-Ibbetson.)

Order for Second Reading read.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he rose to move the second reading of the Bill. It had not been his intention to detain the House with any statement upon this subject, but he had been reminded that this was rendered necessary by the number of new Members recently returned to Parliament, who could not be supposed to be familiar with the legislative action that had taken place in former years. He had introduced the Bill thus early in the Session because, judging from the divisions which occurred last year, he believed that the opinion of the House was not against the principle of the measure. Since his Bill had been laid upon the table the Government had hastily framed and introduced a measure which they had not previously contemplated; or which they had considered and cast aside as unnecessary. The energy which they had evinced since his Bill had been printed, and the rapidity with which the Government scheme had been concocted, in order "to cap" his Bill, had excited his wonder and even admiration. Some were under the delusion that he intended to run his Bill against that of the Government. That, however, was not the case; for the two measures related to different branches of a great question, and in nowise did they trench upon or interfere with each other. They did not profess to cover the same ground or aim at the same end. The Government Bill dealt with the movement of cattle inland; his Bill dealt with the arrival of foreign cattle. Their Bill was directed against the existence of diseases in this country; his was designed to prevent the importation of new disease. The rules of the House prevented him from discussing the two measures together, but he hoped they would both be referred to the same Committee, and then they could be considered together, and they could be made to harmonize with each other and form one measure. Some had taken upon them to assert that this was a question of the interests of the producers of stock against the interests of the importers of stock; and that all attempts at legislation respecting foreign cattle were made in the interests of the home producers. This he emphatically denied; the contests of twenty-four years ago were not to be revived; his measure was introduced in the interest of every class of the community. But let those who had the hardihood to make such an assertion, and to oppose the Bill on that ground, consider for a moment the meaning of their assertion; let them contemplate what a support of the foreign cattle trade, against the English cattle production, amounted to. There were in this country, according to a late Return, 45,500,000 acres under cultivation or bearing stock; and calculating the capital employed at the low rate of £4 an acre, we had £185,000,000 employed in agriculture. This was a large sum as compared with the capital engaged in the importation of cattle; the capital employed in the whole cattle importing trade did not probably amount to more than a hundredth part of it. The assertion to which he had alluded, then, amounted to this: the smaller interest was to be supported to the detriment of the larger; the interests of the foreigner were to over-ride the interests of this country. Formerly farmers had been of little account and their wishes had been little heeded, because they were scattered and separate; they had no unity, no organization. Chambers of Agriculture had now, however, changed this state of things; the farmers had the amplest opportunities given them to discuss their position and interests; and their wishes had been so strongly and so unitedly expressed in favour of the Bill under consideration that it would not be becoming in the House to refuse to give the Bill its most earnest and careful consideration. The numerous attendance in the House so early on a Wednesday was a sign that the pressure of these Chambers of Agriculture was already felt. Let him warn the House how they resisted the pressure, because these Chambers were so young; they were an infant Hercules in the cradle. When the cattle plague first broke out two systems of legislation had been inaugurated. The aim of the first was to stamp out the pestilence, and consisted entirely of internal regulations; the most stringent restrictions were placed upon the movement of cattle, accompanied by a wholesale slaughter of all infected beasts. The farmers had made up their minds that these serious losses were necessary, and they bore it all with patience. The aim of the second system was the prevention of an access of new disease. The first of these systems was now in abeyance, for the plague had been stamped out; but the second was not, and could not be in abeyance, because the danger of disease being imported from abroad was ever present; nay it was increased by the increase of railway communication with the east of Europe. The Bill of the Government was founded on the first system; it was with this second system that his Bill proposed to deal. The two Bills therefore did not clash; they did not meet on the same ground; for the second system was entirely overlooked by the Government measure. He did not, by any means, oppose the Government measure; he desired that both Bills should pass, in order that we might have a whole, and not a partial legislation. For what had been the result of the combination of the two systems of which he had spoken. Not only had the plague itself been stamped out, but also three other cattle diseases of foreign origin, had been reduced from a proportion of 42½ per cent to 1 per cent. These three diseases had, however, increased to 30 per cent since the restrictions upon the movement of home cattle had been removed. That was a proof that there ought to be strict regulations enforced even now with respect to the removal of cattle from one part of the country to the other; and farmers said, "We are ready to submit to your restrictions on the free movement of our cattle, but we hope you will deal justly with us, and prevent the access of new disease to our shores; put equally stringent restrictions on the importation trade; then each trade will be on the same footing, and our cattle will be preserved." They did not murmur at the harsh sanitary regulations at home; but they demanded to be made secure against a re-introduction of the plague from abroad. Indeed, that Bill would be most unjust which imposed home restrictions, while it permitted a constant influx of disease ab extra. What measures had already been sanctioned by previous Governments in order to attain this security? Lord Palmerston's Government totally prohibited the importation of cattle. That failed, and compulsory slaughter of all beasts at the water-side, together with the option of quarantine was tried; but quarantine had totally failed; only one quarantine ground had been established; and that had never been used, because a beast was found to be not worth the additional expenditure after having been in quarantine twenty-eight days. The result was that only one town had applied for a license, and that was Southampton, where in only one case was the quarantine used, and that was in the case of two beasts sent as a present to the Prince of Wales. While he was at the Privy Council Office, on the 11th of October, 1867, a new system was devised to give facilities to trade—that of separate markets. The principle on which this system rested was that the only security against contagion from foreign cattle was to prevent contact between foreign and English beasts. The prevention of that contact was of the most vital importance; for no other means of security, no plan which would absolutely prevent infection, and be a bar to a fresh access of disease, could be devised. And yet how urgent the necessity! Every year railways extended further into the east of Europe, where the cattle plague was chronic; every year foreign countries competed more with us for meat, and every year we had to extend the range of our trade; every year, consequently, the danger of importing the disease increased. If the disease declared itself immediately, the danger would be comparatively slight; but the period of incubation was variously described as from five to twenty-three days, and by the most scientific and authoritative witnesses, had been put down at from ten to fourteen days. During that time an animal might have the disease, during that time it might be continually affecting others, and yet not even the most experienced veterinary inspectors could possibly detect it. Now, a diseased beast might start from the east of Europe, and arrive in London in six days,—long before the period of incubation was over. Or an infected beast might arrive in Munich or Berlin, and there mix with healthy beasts on their way to England; these formerly healthy beasts would arrive in England in three days, with the germ of the disease in their systems, and before it showed itself the herd would be scattered throughout the country, and the mystery of the case would be increased, when it was known that those beasts had never come from the east of Europe or from any infected district. The only preventive against this was the creation of separate markets, which would give free scope to both the foreign and home trades. If a town desired to have both trades, then let it; but let the markets be separate; let all contact be rigidly guarded against. That was the principle upon which we had devised the system of separate markets. Some of the smallest seaports chose to have only an English market; larger towns required two markets, an English and a foreign market, and had found only convenience and benefit to result. But the largest town of all had only one market. That is to say, the system had been adopted throughout the country with the exception of London. There it was found impossible to force into motion an inert Corporation, which did not care sufficiently for the good of the surrounding country to expend those funds in forming a market which it loved to lavish on banquets. We had no means of forcing the Corporation, and could not forbid the foreign importation altogether; the trade was too large for that, and the demands were too urgent. We had, therefore, to content ourselves with the cumbrous metropolitan regulations as the only means of preventing contact between foreign and English beasts. Yet these metropolitan regulations were bad in two ways—first, they were of no avail for carrying out the vital principle of non-contact; and, secondly, they were, on the whole, a most useless as well as costly and cumbrous machinery. The size of the metropolitan area was 117 square miles. Cattle were landed from abroad chiefly on Saturday; they then remained on the wharves during at least twelve hours for inspection. The inspection was necessarily hurried, and consequently imperfect. Those beasts which were found to be diseased were slaughtered at the landing-place; this was a great inconvenience, from the want of proper slaughter-houses and the absence of any market or buyers; the remainder were passed from the docks to the metropolitan market; two-thirds of these were sold and then driven through the streets back to the vicinity of the place where they had been landed; the remaining third were sold and scattered throughout the whole metropolitan area to the various private slaughter-houses. This arrangement did not prevent contact between foreign and English cattle; it was of no avail whatever in this respect: the cattle were driven through the streets, they passed dairies on their road where the cows poked out their noses to smell the passing herd and take the disease, and their manure was sent out into the country to infect the cattle on any farm where it might be used. It was by this means that the disease was first carried into Hertfordshire, in 1865. Beside this, a foreign beast might be driven from the market to a meadow half in and half out of the metropolitan area, and by merely walking across the field it would be on ground from which it might lawfully pass all over the country. Moreover, the traffic manager of the South Western Railway had stated in evidence that foreign cattle were constantly sent down his line. Foreign sheep, too, might go all over the country if they had not been imported in the same ship with cattle. And it was well known that they were a means of carrying the contagion of cattle plague. So the disease might break out at any time; there was, in fact, no security whatever against a new access of disease into the country through the metropolitan market. In fact, this had already occurred, only nobody became aware of it. In May, 1867, Mr. Gebhart imported forty beasts from Galicia, Hungary, or Podolia, or some neighbouring principality, he knew not whence; they were fine-looking animals, and sold for a good figure to graziers or butchers within the metropolitan area. After a week one of the buyers returned to him and said that one of the beasts had proved to be diseased; and, on inspection, it was found that these beasts had introduced a new type of cattle plague; not the Steppe Cattle Plague, to which we had become accustomed, but the Galician Plague. The result was, that 200 head of cattle had to be slaughtered to stop the disease which these forty had introduced. Three things were to be remarked in this case—first, the importer did not know where the cattle came from, whether from Galicia, Hungary, or Podolia; secondly, they had passed through Berlin after inspection—and a certificate of the Prussian veterinary inspector had been shown at the Privy Council Office in proof of this; and, thirdly, they were passed by our own inspector as healthy, and had been in the country a week before the mischief was discovered. If that occurred once, might it not occur again? The metropolitan restrictions, therefore, were of no avail whatever to secure us from a fresh access of disease. The same witness, in speaking of an importation of sheep, said the sheep had been put into a field adjoining "his valuable herd," and in saying so he let slip an ejaculation which showed that he recalled the fear and emotion which he had felt on that occasion. He said—"Damn it, they put the sheep in the field next to mine." I stopped him, and asked the cause of his alarm. He said that the sheep had come from abroad, and for aught that he knew to the contrary they might be infected. There was another case, which happened while the cattle plague was in the country. There being at one time an imminent danger of its breaking out in Friesland—because some symptoms of infection had been observed—immediate measures were taken to sell the infected cattle in the English market. Steamers were telegraphed for to take the cattle over to England, and they came in very large numbers. After a week the Dutch Government telegraphed to the Privy Council Office to take care, because cattle plague had broken out in Friesland. But by that time the harm had been done. There were other examples, but he would not detain the House by dilating on them. What he had said was sufficient to show that there was no security afforded by the metropolitan regulations. He would not on the present occasion show how cumbrous they were, nor what inconvenience they caused, for no benefit; this he had done last year. But he would remind the House that this inconvenience was very useless. Why should these foreign beasts go to the metropolitan market at all? Two-thirds of them went there at great expense and trouble and injury to the beasts, only to return again to Whitechapel and the East-end, so that two-thirds of the foreign trade was inconvenienced for the convenience of the other third. An absurd regulation! These metropolitan regulations being in every sense utterly futile, what substitute can be proposed? The Vice President of the Council had said that they would stop the importation of cattle from infected places. It would be utterly impossible! You will not know that a place is infected until the mischief has been done. In this Friesland case, for instance, the cattle had come over first, and a week afterwards the Dutch Government telegraphed to us to take care—when it was too late. We could not have intelligence in sufficient time, and therefore there was no security in the world that we could keep out infected cattle by saying we should exclude those that might come from such and such places where the infection prevailed. But even if we could know in time, still it would be impossible in the nature of things. The cattle from abroad were shipped at two ports; but they mostly came through one port—namely Geste-munde. From Prussia, from Silesia, from Galicia, from Hungary, from Bohemia the cattle arrived on the quays at Gestemunde and were shipped, so as to arrive in London on the Saturday for the Monday's market. Thus cattle were brought together from every country of the interior, without the least attempt at separating or classing them. Now, he would ask, how were we to separate the cattle coming from the infected places from those which came from the uninfected? It would be utterly impossible, and if it were possible it would be of no avail, for the rest would be infected. But suppose it were possible; suppose the cattle coming from Bohemia, for example, were to be slaughtered at the water-side, then they would be slaughtered either where there were no slaughter-houses, no market, no buyers, no conveniences whatever; or else the local authorities would be asked to make, for a few cattle, a market which would, in the long run, have to be supported by rates and tolls; and in that case the few cattle would not make the market pay the interest on the outlay of capital. The Vice President of the Council, the other night, seemed to think it would be quite sufficient to forbid importation at the time when there was any disease prevailing, and to leave the trade free at all other times. The objection to that was that a very great shock and consequence disturbance to trade would be occasioned. We had a great importation from Holland; suppose that we heard that the plague was there, and we issued a prohibition that no more cattle was to come from that country; yet people must eat; the same amount of cattle must come from somewhere. Some fine morning you issue your edict forbidding the importation of the thousands of cattle from Holland. On the instant some other place must be found where those thousands of cattle can be procured. Where, then, should we get our cattle from? A great shock or jar and disturbance to trade would thus be occasioned, and did we suppose that the wheels of trade could run smoothly all the while? Even a great iron steam-engine is injured by being checked suddenly or suddenly put out of gear; and do you expect that you will not injure so delicate a structure as a trade, with all its credit and fears and sympathies? It would be a great deal better to say at once—"We will allow the trade to flow on for ever and ever in a certain channel," and have no more shocks and disturbances; because then it would be found that the trade, which was a most elastic thing, would accommodate itself by degrees to the altered circumstances. But if on a sudden we were to turn back some 80,000 or 100,000 cattle from a particular country, we might go far and wide without being able to find another from which so many could be obtained, and the people of England would have to do without them. Besides, we could not have a separate market unless it was to be a permanent market. A market requires a site, and a system of drainage, and buildings, and appliances, a quay and landing-places; for all of which capital must be sunk. Will this be undertaken for the time during which you may please to forbid importation? They might as well ask him to believe that a man would build a house upon a three years' lease. If Government were to ask the local authorities to make a market they must undertake that it would be permanent. These were his objections to the two plans at which the Vice President seemed to hint the other night, and which his party had devised, and so vehemently supported, as their conceptions of what the policy of the nation should become. The next question then was, was there any danger? He need not address himself to that question, because the Government confessed it, otherwise why bring in a Bill on the subject? why desire to le-gistrate for it? why maintain any restrictions whatever? Well, then, he would ask, would they weaken the present safeguards, or keep them as they were? If they weakened them, and the plague came in, then the Government would have incurred a serious responsibility, for they would have wantonly injured the country for the sake of the prejudices and prepossessions of their party. But if they were to maintain the safeguards, then they would, in fact, be making them permanent, which was the very thing he desired. It was true that he desired something more; but what he desired would make little difference to all the outports; for in them the system was already established. And that little difference would be a sensible benefit. It would be a benefit to the seaport towns financially, because it would make the markets permanent, and it would be worth while to expend money upon them. In the next place, what were called separate markets were not in the legal sense markets at all; they were merely confined areas with sale licenses. But the Bill would make markets in these places, for the market clauses would apply; and it would enable the local authorities to make all the regulations that they thought desirable, and they would have power to impose tolls and market rates, and thus pay off the expenses of the market. Besides, under this Bill they would have most extensive borrowing powers. To all the outports, therefore, it would be a great advantage. With regard to the metropolis, it would have to provide separate markets for foreign meat; or, in other words, instead of having a metropolitan area of 117 square miles, the local authorities would have to provide one or more — six or seven areas, if they liked—for the landing and slaughtering of cattle, instead of the many private slaughter-houses which could not be under control, and had long been condemned as nuisances and serious injuries. The local authority need not have the expense of constructing these markets even; they may confer their powers on one or more persons or companies, who would then have the same power as the authorities of the outports. Then we should no longer have a third of the foreign cattle wandering over the town to private slaughter-houses spreading infection as they go. Those private slaughter-houses had always been regarded as a great nuisance, and in 1854 an Act was passed to abolish them in twenty years—that was, in 1874. If anybody would like to know what a nuisance those private slaughter-houses were he had only to compare them with the abattoirs in Paris. The abattoirs were as clean as possible, there was no smell there; the manure was all saved; the meat was kept hung up pure and sweet; in fact, one might go into them as into a drawing-room. But let them visit the private slaughter-houses of London. In the most densely-populated places, they would find behind the dwelling-houses a filthy dirty place, stinking and reeking enough to taint the meat and pollute the neighbourhood; this was used for the slaughter-house which supplied your table. Besides, part of the blood was lost, the manure was lost, and there was loss everywhere. Moreover, the cattle must now be driven through the streets to these private slaughter-houses, and everybody knew what a nuisance that was. The Corporation of London wanted to get rid of the nuisance of driving cattle through the streets, and had expended large sums of money on a dead meat market. It had been argued that these small slaughter-houses were a convenience; but one of the witnesses who appeared against the Bill last year told the Committee that twenty-five of the large wholesale butchers had their slaughter-houses in one immense place in the east of London, which, he said, was the greatest convenience and benefit to the locality, because persons came from a distance of four or five miles to buy meat at wholesale prices, thus dispensing with the middleman. So that it appeared from the evidence of this witness against the Bill of last year, that it was of the greatest benefit to have slaughter-houses congregated together. Whether in the case of the outports or in the case of the metropolis the question was the same. The question was, what were we to do with the foreign fat cattle in the few days between the landing and slaughter? Ten days were now allowed instead of six, as formerly, but the cattle were seldom left to live so long, because the beast lost so much in weight and deteriorated so much in quality—becoming “muddled” (as the butchers term it) that it was the interest of the butcher to kill them as soon as possible. The question then was—Where shall the beasts be killed? Shall they be killed in private slaughter-houses all over the town, or in an abattoir at the water-side? Should we send only the available parts inland, and leave the guts and hides in the east of London, where there were manufactories to consume them; or should we carry the animals inland, at the risk of spreading infection, and afterwards send back the guts and hides, at increased expense and inconvenience, to be consumed? He had paid the greatest attention to the objections which were urged before the Committee of last year, and to all the objections which had since been started in the public Press; and all that appeared to be of the slightest weight seemed to come under one head—namely, “If you have separate markets, you will raise the price of meat.” Now, if anyone proved to him that it would raise the price of meat to the poor man, he would not proceed further in the matter. Why should it raise the price of meat more to send only the available parts inland than to send the entire animal inland, and then have to send back the guts and hides again? Some people answer, “Because meat will not travel.” He denied it altogether. Folkestone was now supplied with dead meat from London, so were Brighton and most of the towns in the south; the same might be the case with towns on the east and west. The very best meat we had in London was brought as dead meat from Aberdeen, a distance of 500 miles. A late Member of that House who now adorned the House of Peers, and who had been a Cattle Plague Commissioner, had told him that he regularly got his meat from Tiverton, because it was cheaper and better. Besides, fish could travel, and fish was much more perishable than meat. Fish was at its best the moment it was caught, and every moment afterwards it deteriorated; but meat was not at its best until five or six days after it had been killed, and it was not until after that time that it began to deteriorate. And yet fish could be sent hundreds of miles to London; a fortiori, so could meat. Moreover, dead meat travels better than live animals. Beasts sent by rail from Aberdeen lost £5 per head in value, to which loss must be added the amount of freight. After a long distance the flesh got what the drovers called “muddled”—that is, feverish, and the meat of such animals would not keep so well as the meat of beasts which had been killed at the other end of the journey. Therefore the mere sending of foreign cattle in the dead state would not raise the price of meat on the ground that meat will not travel, for meat did travel, and would travel better than the live animal. Hence the Bill would not tend to confine the foreign supply to the seaports; for it could be sent inland, and would arrive in a better state for being killed beforehand. Therefore the proposed measure would not, from this cause, raise the price of meat at all. Well then, how could the price be raised by what he proposed to do? It must be either because fewer cattle would come from abroad, or because the price of meat would be artificially raised in this country. He would first deal with the latter alternative. During the cattle plague, when all beasts were slaughtered by the water-side, was the price of meat raised? Separate markets were established on the 11th of October, 1867, and what was the result? Was the price of meat raised thereby? When he was at the Privy Council Office he obtained the prices of meat at various places—Liverpool, Birmingham, Southampton, and the metropolitan market—for he regarded these as “prerogative instances” of the prices of meat; and he would give some of the figures. In Liverpool, in 1863, the highest wholesale price of meat was 7½d., the lowest 5d. Meat rose throughout the country in 1864, even before the arrival of the cattle plague in the autumn of 1865, and was at the highest for the first nine months of 1866; it then fell, and remained steady during 1867. Well, the highest price at Liverpool was 9d., the lowest 5d. After the establishment of separate markets in Liverpool the price actually fell, and in 1868 the highest was 8d. and the lowest 4d. The price was somewhat lower in the inland towns than in the seaport of Liverpool. In Manchester in 1866 the highest price was 8½d.; in 1868 the highest was 7½d. At Birmingham in 1866 the highest price was 8½d., and in 1868 it was 7½d. Throughout all the towns the prices ruled highest until October, 1866, when there was a fall. He spoke of the wholesale prices alone, for a reason which would presently be apparent.

With regard to the metropolitan market, in 1864 the highest price was 9*d.*, the lowest 5½*d.* On the 24th of March, 1866, an Order was issued that all foreign cattle should be killed at the water-side, and meat fell in price, the highest being 8¾*d.*, the lowest 5½*d.* On the 27th of April, 1866, foreign cattle were no longer killed at the water-side, but were allowed to go to the metropolitan market alive. At once prices rose; the highest price was 8¾*d.*, and the lowest 5½*d.* During the rest of the year the highest price was 7¾*d.*, the lowest 4¾*d.* Well, that proved that the separate market system had not had the effect of raising the price of meat. But he would tell the House what had. It was the butchers. It was they that put on enormous profits and made meat dear. How was that? The reason was, that there was a forced sale of cattle in London. The London butcher only could compete as a buyer in the metropolitan market; for the country butcher could not remove the beast alive out of the metropolitan area, and he had nowhere to kill it. The butcher then hung back; he would not give the price, yet the beast must be killed within a limited time, and the farmer was obliged to come down. The London butcher took the beast home and killed it, and then came the competition. The Dover man, and the Brighton man, and the Folkestone man, all bid for the meat, and the London butcher, though he bought the animal cheap, because there was no competition there, could sell it dear, because there was competition after the beast had been killed. It was that which gave the retail butcher or middleman his large profits. In support of that opinion he would quote the authority of Dr. Trench, of Liverpool, in a letter to Dr. Williams of the Privy Council Office. Dr. Trench said—

“I do not consider that the importation has affected the price of meat to the consumer in the slightest degree; but, indeed, during the whole of the cattle plague the price of meat has never been regulated by the relative amount of supply and demand. I know that when cattle from Knowsley and other parts in the neighbourhood of Liverpool, and from the whole of Cheshire, were sent in overwhelming numbers, and at the very lowest price, to Liverpool, and when on account of the heat of the season meat could not be kept nor safely sent to other towns, yet the butchers absolutely increased the price to the consumer under the pretext of the existence of cattle plague. But though the importation of foreign cattle has not

It was not the farmer's interest but the butcher's which raised the price of meat. If farmers obtained a higher price, other producers would step in to compete—that is, a foreign trade would at once be attracted. But if the English producer receives a low price, the foreign trade is repelled. The high price which the middleman obtains does not affect the trade, because you shut out the competition of other middlemen. What destroyed the foreign trade, then, was that there was too little remuneration for the producer, and what made the poor suffer was that the consumer had to pay such a high price to the retail butcher. Moreover, if they allowed foreign beasts to get inland alive they would raise the price of meat; in the first place because of the risk. Farmers felt, as had been testified in evidence, that there was a risk in rearing cattle, and ceased to do so. Secondly, if cattle plague were re-imported, the numbers of animals which would be lost would greatly raise the price of meat. And, thirdly, the cost of transit of the guts and hides must come out of the price of the meat, and thus increase the price of it. So much then for the artificial raising of the price of meat in this country. He now turned to the investigation of the other alternative. Would fewer cattle come over from abroad? Would prices be raised by a diminution of importation? He must remind the House that prices did not depend on importation, but importation depended on prices. That was the very A B C of political economy; and yet, the case of those who opposed the Bill last year rested on the assumption that the price would rise because the importation would become less under the Bill. The foreign producer learned the price of beasts in England, he knew the price abroad, and calculated whether the price which he would receive in England would not only cover the cost of the freight but give him a profit. If it did he would export, otherwise he would not. If the farmer here received a high price for his cattle the foreign exporter would therefore be induced to send foreign cattle over. That was stated by a Prussian witness before the Committee in answer to Question 6880. That question was—

"What guides you in exporting to Belgium or France, instead of England?—It depends upon prices; I send where I can get the best return."

"When prices fall in England, you send to France or Belgium?—Yes; I send wherever the prices are best."

It would follow from this that whenever there was a fall in the wholesale price of meat they would see a diminution in the number of cattle imported. This corollary was fully borne out by the facts. For instance, in 1861 the price was 5*s.* a stone, and 107,096 head were imported. In the autumn of that year the price fell to 4*s.* 8*d.*, and in 1862 only 97,887 cattle were imported. There was a rise in price during the autumn of 1862 to 5*s.*, and in the succeeding year, and so 150,898 head of cattle were imported in 1863. There was a rise again the year following 1864 to 5*s.* 6*d.*, and 234,686 were imported, and then came the abnormal years of cattle plague. In the autumn of 1866, and in 1867, there was a serious fall down to 4*s.* 10*d.* a stone for prime beef, and as low as 3*s.* 4*d.* for inferior beef, and the importation declined to 117,620. It must be borne in mind that these were the wholesale prices, not the middleman's prices. With respect to mutton, the case was still more apparent. In 1861, when the price of mutton was 5*s.* 10*d.* a stone, 312,923 head were imported. During that year the price fell, and in 1862 only 299,472 head were imported. During 1862 the price rose from 5*s.* 4*d.* to 5*s.* 10*d.* in 1863, and the imports rose to 430,788 head. The price rose to 6*s.* 9*d.* in 1865, and the imports rose to 914,170 head. A fall in price to 6*s.* was followed by an importation of 790,880 sheep in 1866. And a further fall to 4*s.* 10*d.* in 1867 caused a falling-off in importation to 534,788 head. Hence he said generally that importation depended upon prices. He said "generally," because a proviso must be added. If something comes between the supply and the demand, then the balance is disturbed; if there is a third grasping hand between the price and the trade, the general rule may not hold good. In 1845, the energies of the House were directed to destroy Protection, which was the third grasping hand of the Government. In the trade of the present day the third grasping hand was that of the middleman. It is the middleman who makes the price high to the consumer and low to the producer; it is the middleman, therefore, who repels trade. In the meat trade the middleman is the retail butcher. His exorbitant profits are the cause of the dearness of meat, which every one in this House knows to his cost. If these prices were not grasped by the middleman's hand, but flowed on to the producer, then trade would be stimulated, competition would arise, and the prices would be forced down to the normal level. But the middleman grasped large profits in his great butcher's fist, and the producer got only what he let slip through his fingers; so the foreign trade became dead; the forced sale destroyed competition; and all suffered except the butcher. Well, then, what cared he when he heard—as he had heard vociferated often enough,—“This Bill would destroy the retail butchers?” All the witnesses that came before the Committee last year said, “Your Bill will ruin the 5,000 retail butchers in London.” He acknowledged it; but this would cheapen meat to the consumer; because it would destroy the grasping hand which came between the producer and the consumer, and that would be gone which now purloined the profits and deadened trade. The price to the consumer would be less, and the price to the producer would be higher by the amount of the middleman's profits. And then trade would be stimulated and prices would fall. Now, the question reduced itself to this—the Bill could not lessen the number of home cattle in the whole country, it could lessen the supply then, only by turning the trade into another channel. It could do this, if it did so at all, only because either the freight was cheaper or because there were no middlemen to get large profits in the country to which the trade was turned. In other words, the trade would be turned only if the producer found a higher remuneration elsewhere. But this Bill could not affect the freight in one way or another. The only manner in which it could effect the price would therefore be by getting rid of the middlemen, which he had shown it would do. But the argument against the Bill was that it would raise the wholesale price of meat. Yes; it would do that; and therefore it would make it better worth while for the foreign producer to send over his cattle. That is to say: this measure would draw trade to England, while it also increased the supply of home cattle in England; or meat would become more plentiful. This Bill, therefore, would not injure trade. That which injured the foreign trade was distress among the working classes; or the reduction of the number or pay of the hands in mills and manufactories. Whenever there was great distress among the working classes there was injury to the foreign trade, because there was less consuming power here. That had been proved before the Committee by the evidence of Mr. Thomas Rudkin, the chairman of the City Markets Committee, who was examined by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Vernon Harcourt). Mr. Vernon Harcourt, having extracted from the witness that "the great distress, and because the poor people of London were very badly off from want of work" caused the falling-off in the foreign cattle trade, asked (Q. 6278) "The consuming power of the population is very much less?—No doubt of it." The poor had less money to spend last year, and that it was which had injured the trade. In support of what he had stated, he hoped the House would allow him to quote a few figures. He would first show that, as a matter of fact, the slaughtering Order, and the separate markets had not had the effect of diminishing the foreign supply. France and Holland had no imports of cattle; Belgium had; but France exported very few cattle annually. The exports of cattle from Holland to the United Kingdom during 1867 amounted to 20,360. Separate markets were established throughout the kingdom on October 11, 1867, and did that injure the trade? Did we get fewer cattle from Holland in consequence? Not at all, for in 1868 our importations from that country amounted to 32,590. With regard to sheep, in 1867, we imported 116,260 sheep from Holland, and in 1868, 182,440. Then, again, the exports of cattle from Belgium, which were nearly all to the United Kingdom, were in 1867, 11,096, and in 1868, they were four times as many, or 45,759. In 1866-7, for every two oxen which Belgium imported, she sent one to the United Kingdom; but in 1868, for every three which she imported, she sent us two. So, in 1866, out of every two sheep which Belgium imported, she sent us one; and in 1868, for every two, she sent more than one to us. It was clear, therefore, that the separate markets in the United Kingdom had not injured the foreign trade. The right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam) opposed his Bill, but the petition he presented, showed that he and his constituents were not agreed on the matter; for the complaint of the people of Newcastle did not arise from their having a separate market, but from their having that separate market so far off—a very different story. The right hon. Gentleman's constituents had reason on their side. In 1866-7, the weekly average of cattle imported into Newcastle was 797, taking the twenty-seven weeks from the middle of August to the 17th of February. In 1867, the separate market was established in Newcastle, which he supposed caused a slight disturbance of trade; for in the same twenty-seven weeks of 1867-8 the weekly average fell to 634; but in 1868-9, when the separate market had got into working order, there was an enormous increase, for it rose to 1,117. Again, in the sheep trade for the same periods there had been a constant increase—the figures for the three periods being 5,128, 7,717, and 10,210. Hence, the separate market, established in October, 1867, so far from decreasing, had increased the total supply. The Vice President of the Council had picked out the case of Hull as one—the only one—in which the importation had been very large before the establishment of the separate market, and smaller afterwards. It was true that the importation was much larger at Hull in the year before the cattle plague than it was last year; but the reason for that, as shown in evidence before the Committee of last year, was that the former importation was abnormal; it consisted of store stock, which had been introduced as an experiment, but they were the means of introducing the cattle plague into Yorkshire; after which the importers would have nothing more to say to store stock, and imported only fat stock. Besides foreign store stock have always and everywhere found to be a loss and failure. He would next refer to the effect of the Order of August 20, 1868, which condemned imported sheep to be killed at the water-side. The arrivals of foreign sheep in London during the week ending February 1, 1868, were only 311 head; in the same week of 1869, they were 821; in the week ending February 8, 1868, they were 144; while in the same week of 1869, they reached 1,239; in the week ending February 15, 1868, the number imported was 33, and in the corresponding week of 1869, it was 2,442. In the week ending February 22, 1868, the number was 1,848; while in the same week of 1869, it was 4,407. That showed that the slaughtering Order had not diminished the foreign supply. He had made some extracts from the reports of the metropolitan market with regard to the imports of sheep after the issue of the slaughtering Order, which took effect on September 1, 1868. Among the extracts were these—

“End of September.—We continue to receive a fair supply, and as many as 7,000 were collected at the water-side on Monday last.

“End of October.—Notwithstanding that prohibitory measures against the removal of foreign sheep have continued in force, fair supplies are still forwarded from the Continent, the arrivals during October having amounted to nearly 18,000 head, the whole of which, after being slaughtered at the water-side, have been sent to Newgate and Leadenhall markets for disposal.”

“End of November.—Although the regulations compelling the slaughter of foreign sheep at the place of debarkation are still in force, foreign graziers have not been deterred from sending their stock to this country, and the arrivals during the month have amounted to 18,162 head, the whole of which have been killed at the water-side.”

That was a plain proof that the order for slaughtering sheep at the water-side—a thing much worse than a separate market, because there were not the conveniences to the buyers of such a market—so far from diminishing the importation of sheep, had been followed by a very large increase of the trade; and, a fortiori, a separate market would not have the effect apprehended by its opponents. He had been considering the foreign supply only. Now, he would consider the total supply of meat, dead and alive, foreign and British, first for London, and then for the United Kingdom. He might mention that the following calculation had been made by Mr. Algernon Clarke, the Secretary to the United Chambers of Agriculture. Adding together both the home bred and the foreign cattle, sheep, and pigs sold in the metropolitan market, and reducing them to tons weight, he found that in 1867 the total quantity was 97,033 tons, of which 37,055 tons were foreign. Similarly, in 1868, 108,885 tons of meat were sold in the metropolitan market, of which 29,495 tons were foreign. Hence, although the foreign supply had slightly diminished throughout the year, yet they had a larger total supply of meat; and he begged the House also to observe how very small the foreign supply was in proportion to the home supply. Adding to the live animals the amount of dead meat brought to London from abroad, and also from the provinces, he found that the total consumption of London in 1867 was 180,861 tons, of which the foreign animals were only 37,000 tons, or one-fifth of the whole. In 1868 the total consumption of London was 192,713 tons, of which the foreign animals were only one-seventh part. It followed that the total supply of meat to the metropolis has increased; and, secondly, it must be felt how much more anxiously we should guard against the destruction of the home supply, than against that paltry percentage of foreign trade. This was fully borne out by an undoubted authority. For Mr. Caird, in his pamphlet on Our Daily Food; its Prices and Sources of Supply, gave the proportion of foreign beef and mutton to English as only one-ninth of the entire supply, for the United Kingdom. Another most competent authority—the hon. Member for East Norfolk (Mr. Read)—had made very minute calculations, from which it was shown that the total production of dead meat in the United Kingdom was 1,222,048 tons in the year 1868; that 53,968 tons of this were imported alive from abroad, and 10,680 tons were imported dead; so that the total foreign supply was 64,378 tons, and the total consumption of both foreign and British meat in the United Kingdom was, 1,286,426 tons; of which, therefore, only 5 per cent was imported from abroad. Allowing for the inferiority of the foreign meat, the proportion in money value of foreign to British meat was $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Why, even if anybody were mad enough to exclude the foreign importation altogether they might easily increase the home supply to a greater extent than $4\frac{1}{2}$ or 5 per cent. They would do more than this by decreasing those diseases, by which they now lost a greater proportion of their flocks and herds than that. He would in the next place advert to the dead meat trade. The dead meat trade was growing, and it was a great blessing to the people that it should be gradually supplanting the trade in live animals. In 1853 the total supply of live and dead at Smithfield was 155,328 tons; of which the foreign was 15 per cent, and the dead meat from the provinces $24\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. In 1863 the total supply of live and dead at the London market was 228,656 tons, the foreign being $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and the dead meat from the provinces 30 per cent. In 1867 the proportion of dead meat to live animals had risen to 45 per cent; or, taking the fourteen years from 1853 to 1867, the arrivals of dead meat in London from the provinces had increased 73 per cent, while the importation of foreign animals had increased $57\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. In the metropolis two-thirds of the animals which came to the metropolitan market were killed for the dead meat markets of the metropolis; that is to say, the consumers went to the dead meat market to supply themselves with this amount. This is leaving out of account the dead meat which came from abroad and from the provinces. It is two-thirds of that which has been enumerated, in the foregoing calculations, as live animals, which are disposed of in the dead meat markets. Since the new Smithfield market has been opened, the proportion which was disposed of as dead meat was probably far greater. The dead meat trade had therefore an evident tendency to increase. This tendency should be encouraged. It is for the advantage of the people; it will diminish the nuisances, it will decrease the risk of infection. The Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council (Mr. W. E. Forster) was an excellent Bill as far as it went, but it dealt with only one part, and that not the most important part, of a great subject; and he warned the Government that if they rejected the system proposed by his (Lord Robert Montagu's) Bill, they would incur a very great risk of bringing the cattle plague or other diseases again into this country. This Bill, if it were even to injure trade, could possibly only touch 5 per cent of the total supply. He was sure that it could not even touch that. But, on the other hand, let the House consider the enormous loss to the country from the cattle plague as compared with the importation of foreign animals. The total number of cattle slaughtered, and of cattle that died, from, or on account of, cattle plague in the years 1865, 1866, and 1867 was 290,527. Now, the total number of cattle imported into the United Kingdom from 1842 to 1867, both years inclusive, was 2,590,296—that was to say, in two years they lost from cattle plague more than one-eighth of the cattle imported within the twenty-five years previous to 1867, including the three years of extraordinary importation during the cattle plague. In conclusion, then, if the Government rejected a Bill which had for its object the security of the country from cattle disease in future, and passed only a Bill for restricting the movement of cattle within the country, they would incur a heavy responsibility, and be guilty of a gross injustice to the agricultural interest. All he asked was that his Bill should be read the second time in order that it might be referred to the same Committee of the Whole House as the Government measure. The two Bills deal with separate systems or methods of security; they do not cover the same ground. Why should the House not have the opportunity of considering them as a whole and amalgamating them together? Let the memory of a great disaster and the effects of the suffering of two years of cattle plague deter the representatives of that people which had suffered from rejecting a Bill which would place them in a position of security for the future.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord Robert Montagu.)

MR. HEADLAM said, he was sorry that the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) had thought it necessary to press this Bill; because his doing so placed him (Mr. Headlam) in a position that he was not at all desirous of assuming, that of apparent antagonism to many of his hon. Friends who represented rural districts. He really believed there was no substantial difference of interest on the part of the different portions of the community in relation to that subject. Whether as consumers or as producers they were all anxious to prevent any new danger of disease breaking out among their flocks and herds. Such a national calamity was to be avoided by every reasonable and proper precaution; but they must look at the question in a large way, and not allow their precautions to be the means of stopping for all future time the admission of a most material part of the food of the people. Having taken all the precautions that were reasonable and necessary, they must put their trust in Providence, and hope that health, and not disease, would continue in future to be the normal state of beast as well as of man. The noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) said his Bill did not trench on the same ground as the Bill of the Government, which, the noble Lord alleged, applied only to the stamping out of the disease among home-bred cattle. That was an entire misapprehension, for the Bill of the Government dealt, whether rightly or wrongly, with the whole subject; and, considering that that was not in any way a party question, surely when the Executive Government undertook to legislate on the matter, the natural and ordinary course would be for hon. Gentlemen on both sides to unite in an endeavour to make their Bill as perfect as possible. The introduction of a rival Bill, and the reference of the two Bills to a Select Committee, could only produce delay, and, perhaps, would altogether prevent legislation on the subject that Session. There was nothing to hinder the noble Lord from proposing his clauses as Amendments in Committee on the Bill of the Government, and having them fairly discussed. An exceedingly anomalous and uncertain state of the law would arise if they adopted the noble Lord's Bill, for it sought to perpetuate the existing Acts relating to the diseases of animals, which were not only numerous, but complex, and left the law in a condition in which it was most difficult to discover what were the precise provisions applicable to a particular trade. By enacting, as he proposed to do, that all those existing Acts—some nine in number—should be made perpetual so far as they were in force at the time of the passing of his Bill, and yet that they should be subject to the provisions of his Bill, the noble Lord would render the present law still more confusing and uncertain than it was already. On the other hand, the measure of the Government gave a clear and complete code, showing what was the law on the whole matter; and any improvements in its provisions which hon. Members could suggest might be easily introduced. But his main objection to the noble Lord's

Bill was founded on its principle, which he conceived to be to make the separate market system a permanent and normal part of the institutions of the country, and applicable at all times to the introduction into this kingdom of foreign cattle, which were to be subjected to very rigid restrictions that would not be imposed on home cattle, and were to be slaughtered at the water-side. That would be perfectly fatal to the interests of Hull, where the importers wanted to send their cattle into the West Riding of Yorkshire, and it would be similarly injurious at Newcastle. He was aware that the noble Lord proposed to enable the Privy Council, by clauses of a very different kind, to make exceptions to the general rule he laid down; but it would be very unfair to the Government of the day to throw on them the responsibility of saying that in any part of the world the cattle were so safe from disease that in regard to it an exception might be made to the general law and policy of the country. Now, what was the principle of the Bill of the Government? That the normal state of things would be restored both at home and abroad; but that, at the same time, as they could not be absolutely sure that would be the case, they should vest in the Government in respect both to the home and foreign cattle trade ample powers of stamping out the plague wherever it might appear, and of isolating all places in the country where the disease had shown itself. Whenever there was reason to suppose that any danger of cattle plague existed, the Government would be armed—on the principle of no quid detrimenti republica capiat—with power to take care immediately to prohibit importation; but, subject to that principle, the cattle trade for the benefit of all parties would be entirely free. The establishment of the separate market system was to all intents and purposes a return to the system of Protection [“No, no!”] He did not charge hon. Gentlemen opposite with intending to bring back Protection, but the effect of the separate market system on the cattle trade was precisely the same as if that were done. There was no part of the world freer from the taint of cattle plague than Spain and Portugal, and yet the effect of the system of compulsory slaughter at the water-side had been to destroy the trade in cattle imported from these countries at the port of Liverpool. In 1863 one firm in Liverpool imported from Portugal 3,857 head of cattle; in 1864, 3,140; in 1865, 2,820; in 1866, 2,525; in 1867, 1,164; and since then they had scarcely imported any at all. Similar results had followed from the establishment of separate markets at Southampton and other places, where the importation of cattle from Normandy and other parts of France, equally free from all suspicion of plague, had formerly been carried on. At Southampton the importation from Normandy had fallen off from 1,500 in 1866 to only 30 last year; and he maintained, on the strength of these facts, that, whether hon. Gentlemen opposite intended it or not, the consequences of the system which they wished to enforce were exactly the same as would follow a return to Protection. Then, in regard to Hull, speaking in July last year, the present Prime Minister said that in 1867 the working of the separate market system had greatly reduced the importations. That of sheep and lambs had decreased from 60,000 to 9,000; of pigs from 15,000 to 3,000, and of cattle from 41,000 to 15,000. What the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) meant by the increase at Newcastle he could not understand, for he (Mr. Headlam) found that the number of cattle imported from Hamburg, Rotterdam, and Antwerp was 4,594 in 1865; 6,273 in 1866; 2,299 in 1867; and only 999 in 1868. These figures showed a great falling off, but, as the trade in 1866 was a growing one, he believed that if it had been perfectly free the number of beasts imported would have been at the present time three times as great as it was some years ago. The figures which he had just quoted showed with great clearness the practical working of the system which the noble Lord's Bill was designed to perpetuate. He would now direct the attention of the House to the manner in which it was proposed to carry out the permanent separate market system under the provisions of this Bill. The tenth clause of the noble Lord's Bill gave powers to the local authorities to erect separate markets for foreign cattle at the ports at which they arrived. The noble Lord would, he believed, find that there would be no great readiness on the part of the local authorities in large towns, and more particularly in the metropolis, to establish markets of that description. The Bill, however, provided that, at any time after its passing, the Privy Council might by notice in writing addressed to a local authority require that local authority to provide within a time specified in the notice, not being in any case less than one year or more than three years, a separate place for the landing, reception, sale, and slaughter of foreign animals; but if the local authority failed to do so, the Privy Council might certify the fact to the Board of Trade. On such a certificate being made the Board of Trade would be invested, "any Act, charter, prescription, right, or authority to the contrary notwithstanding," in lieu of the local authority, with all the powers conferred on the local authority under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts in relation to the disposal of foreign animals, including the power of making charges for the use of places provided for the reception, sale, and slaughter thereof, and the power of borrowing from the Public Works Loan Commission, conferred by the fourth section of the Cattle Diseases Prevention Act 1866, but without the restriction imposed by that section on the borrowing powers of local authorities with reference to the amount of rate. The House, he believed, would not deem these provisions so valuable that they need go out of their way to pass this Bill at a time when a Government measure on the same subject was about to come under discussion. If the noble Lord thought fit, he might propose the insertion of these clauses in the Government Bill when that Bill went into Committee. He doubted, however, whether such provisions would be adopted, for the noble Lord presupposed that his plan was to be carried into effect by means of powers more arbitrary than had ever before been vested in any Government in this country. According to the noble Lord's notion of political economy, prices did not depend on importation, but importation depended on prices. Well, he (Mr. Headlam) should have said that a high price in this country would stimulate importations from abroad, and that large importations would necessarily diminish prices, and that importation would continue until the price fell below a certain standard. And this view was corroborated by the Report of the Select Committee, which inquired into the foreign trade in animals in 1866. As regards the movement of animals within the limits of this country, that Committee recommended that foreign and English cattle should be placed on precisely the same footing. What was the rule adopted in other countries? There was no country in which the Government were more careful to guard against the introduction of disease than France, and it appeared from the evidence given before the Select Committee that in that country foreign cattle were sold in the same market as French cattle. The Government of France took power to stop importations from any place where there was a suspicion of disease existing, and there was a veterinary inspector at all ports with power to stop cattle suspected of disease. With that exception there was free importation and free circulation. He should like to see the trade in this country regulated in the same way. The practice in France was to recognize the care taken in other countries. In Germany precautions were taken to prevent the introduction of diseased cattle. It might be that in remote parts in Transylvania and Hungary this disease was not guarded against; but even if so, the cattle could only come to this country by going through places where they were as careful as we were in this country. In his opinion, if the Government had good grounds of suspicion, it would be much better to prohibit altogether the importation of animals from particular countries, for infinite dangers would arise from the introduction of a system of special markets and compulsory slaughter. The proverb, "Give a dog a bad name and you may as well hang him," was applicable to the bovine as well as to the canine species, and under the provisions of this Bill the value of foreign animals on arriving in this country would be so much diminished that it would be better to prohibit their importation altogether. The tendency of the restrictions which had been some time in force had been to diminish the quantity of meat consumed in this country, and of course there were a large number of persons who were prevented by these restrictions from having so large a supply of food as they would otherwise have. In conclusion, he moved that the second reading of the Bill be postponed to that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Headlam.)

MR. NORWOOD said, it could not be denied that the present Bill treated only of one portion of the subject—namely, that connected with the foreign trade, whereas the Government measure dealt with the subject as a whole, and by consolidating all the statutes relating to it would form a complete code for the regulation of the home and foreign cattle trade in cattle. The noble Lord opposite had asserted that the ports were satisfied with and had benefited by the restrictions which had been imposed during the last few years; but this he denied, especially with respect to the port which he represented and which he believed had suffered more from those restrictions than any other port in the kingdom. In 1865, before any restriction was made, there were imported into Hull 45,862 oxen, cows, and calves; but in 1868 the numbers had fallen to 8,524. The noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) had endeavoured to account for the Hull statistics by saying that in 1865 store cattle were imported. But in 1866, when no store cattle were received, 26,000 oxen, cows, and calves were imported, so that store cattle could not account for the great reduction since that year. The number of sheep imported was 68,257 in 1865, and 16,000 in 1868; the number of pigs in the same years being, in round numbers, respectively 16,000 and 2,600; and the total number of animals used for food imported into Hull was 131,373 in 1865, and 27,462 in 1868. The cause of so great a falling off was easily explained. Before the imposition of the restrictions Hull used to supply the enormous populations behind the port, in Sheffield, Leeds, Huddersfield, and other large towns; but now this could not be done, because it was impossible in the summer months to carry on a large traffic in dead meat. There were hundreds of thousands of people in this country whose knowledge of animal food was almost entirely confined to offal, and it was impossible to convey offal long distances, especially in hot weather. The noble Lord had stated that if it could be shown that the Bill would have the effect of rising the price of meat, or of keeping the price high, he would at once withdraw it. Now, he (Mr. Norwood) had no doubt that the effects of the restriction would be to limit the supply and to raise the price of meat. It was impossible that there could have been such a great falling off in the importation as he had pointed out—a falling off which did not apply to one port only—without its having a sensible effect on the price of meat. He was not opposed to reasonable and necessary temporary restrictions where there was a suspicion of disease; but from places where there was no evidence that diseases existed, they should have free importation and free circulation of cattle in this country. He had, last year, stigmatized the noble Lord's Bill as a measure which contained within it a principle of a return to monopoly, and he still entertained that opinion. He felt it to be his duty to protest against permanent restrictions, the effect of which would be to increase the price of food to the consumers in this country, and to put money into the pockets of the agriculturists at the expense of those who could ill afford to bear it. In conclusion he said he had great pleasure in seconding the Amendment.

MR. READ said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam) had rightly stated that the main principle of the Bill was to establish separate markets for foreign cattle only in order to stop these contagious diseases at the fountain head. He contended that the principle embodied in the Bill was no new principle, inasmuch as it had received the assent of the Cattle Plague Commission, with some slight reservations on the part of the hon. Member for East Staffordshire. What the supporters of the measure sought to effect was the establishment of a separate market for the slaughter of foreign cattle, with the view to put a stop by that means to the spread of a disease which had already produced such disastrous results in this country. Privy Council Reports informed us that a greater amount of meat than had ever been imported from abroad had been destroyed by sheep-pox, pleuro-pneumonia, and the foot-and-mouth disease; for, although it might be said that some of those diseases existed in England previous to any large importation of cattle from other countries, he must maintain they were never known amongst us until we began to import foreign stock, whereas they had existed on the Continent from time immemorial. The fact was it was impossible to produce those diseases spontaneously here, let the condition of the atmosphere be never so bad and the treatment of cattle never so brutal. Upon the other hand, he would venture to say, that if he were to take a handful of hay from the mouth of a bullock suffering under the foot-and-mouth disease and carry it several miles he might affect a whole herd with it, though they happened to be placed in the best possible position in a sanitary point of view. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle had, a few days before, stated that the compulsory slaughter of sheep had completely destroyed the foreign trade in that class of stock in the borough which he represented; but it seemed that, while the importation of sheep into Newcastle had entirely ceased on the 28th of July, the Order in Council directing the compulsory slaughter was not issued until the 30th of August, so that the import trade came to an end a month before the Order was in existence. The trade revived in January and February last, and there were 452 sheep imported in the former, and 1,010 in the latter month, all because in the month of August the price of mutton went down to 5*d.* per lb., whereas in the month of February it had risen to 8*d.* The right hon. Gentleman had also told the House that the foreign trade in cattle had been greatly affected, and had referred, in support of his statement, to the years 1866 and 1867, when the home trade was suffering under all sorts of restrictions, and the foreign trade had a monopoly of the supply. But before the breaking out of the cattle plague, in the year 1864, the number of foreign cattle imported into Newcastle was 2,614; in 1863, 465; in 1862, 97; in 1861, 186; and in 1860, 1,169; while two years after, in 1862, the importation was under 100. It was impossible, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman could prove anything from the figures which he had laid before the House, or make them serve any other purpose than to please his own constituents. The total supply of sheep in Newcastle for the year ending February, 1869, was 24,000, for the year 1868, 18,000, and for 1867, 16,000; and the inhabitants of that borough had, he thought, not much reason to complain of the increase in their market. In the port of Liverpool, from June to November, 1867, there were 7,000 sheep imported, and yet without any alteration whatsoever having been made in the Order in Council—there were only three sheep imported during the next six months. But it was urged that the high price of meat rendered it absolutely necessary that the restrictions on the importation of foreign cattle should be relaxed. In his opinion, however, that high price ought to have rather the contrary effect. As the House was well aware, high prices operated to bring stock from all parts of the Continent, and it therefore became all the more requisite that we should take due care that our home supply was not diminished by the introduction of disease. The real causes of the enhanced price of meat were to be found in disease and drought. The cattle plague, as the noble Lord the Member for Huntingdonshire (Lord Robert Montagu) had informed the House, had carried off hundreds of thousands of our stock; and the result had not, he believed, been at all exaggerated, for the very simple reason that, as the greater proportion of the cattle killed were cows, the progress of our young stock had been retarded for years. The tropical heat, too, through which the country passed last summer when the sky was like brass, and the ground beneath our feet like iron, was the chief cause of the high prices which at present prevailed. We had no grass, and very little hay. The root crop was destroyed, and the spring grain, which farmers used very largely in winter grazing, was only a half crop. Yet agriculturists were told, on the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, that they were never so prosperous as at the present moment. He could, however, assure him that there had never been so disastrous a summer for graziers as the last. From July to January we had been killing three sheep instead of two in the ordinary way to furnish the same quantity of mutton; or, in other words, 9,000,000 sheep, instead of 6,000,000. In January and February of this year he found that 27,000 sheep were imported into London, whereas, in the corresponding months of 1868, the number was only 16,000, although they were perfectly free to go where they pleased. That brought him to the question of the relative proportions of home and foreign supply, and upon that point he might be allowed to quote the high authority of Mr. Dudley Baxter, who said that the agricultural statistics for 1867, published by the Board of Trade, showed that there were in the United Kingdom nearly 9,000,000 head of cattle and 34,000,000 of sheep. By inquiries made of eminent agricultural authorities Mr. Baxter added that he found that the value of that live stock was about £150,000,000, and that every year we slaughtered for home consumption about 2,500,000 head of cattle and 12,000,000 sheep, of an estimated value of £60,000,000. Taking that calculation, which was, he thought, a fair one, although the estimate of sheep appeared to him to be somewhat under-stated, and comparing it with the importation of foreign cattle, he found the following to be the result:—The number of foreign cattle imported into this country and slaughtered during the past eight years averaged 170,000 a-year; but as the number might increase, it might be put at 200,000, or 1-12th of the number of home cattle which we annually slaughtered. The number of foreign sheep imported during the same period, averaged 500,000 a year as against 12,000,000 slaughtered at home; while the number of pigs constituting the home supply for 1867 might be put at 4,500,000, as against 50,000 foreign pigs imported during the same period. The result was that, if the weight of our own cattle and sheep—superior as they were to the foreign cattle and sheep—were taken into account, and the price of English meat put at 7d. per lb., and that of foreign meat at 6d. per lb., it would be found that the proportion of the foreign to the home supply of cattle was 1-12th; of sheep, 1-24th; and of pigs, 1-90th; or, to complete the table, it was 1-24th of the number, 1-18th of the weight, and 1-23rd of the value—in round numbers something like 5 per cent. The calculations of the noble Lord the Member for Huntingdonshire were therefore, he maintained, substantially correct. He had taken his calculations from a totally different source, but both gave pretty much the same result. Next came the question, to what extent London was supplied with foreign live stock. Taking the year 1867 he found that the weight of all the live stock was 97,000 tons, of which only

37,000 were foreign. But then it was said that the dead meat trade could not be developed, and that in spite of the facts we were every day having brought under our eyes. There were, for instance, nine railways which conveyed to London over 70,000 tons of dead meat, besides 10,000 from abroad, and 5,000 tons which came by rail, road, and ship, making in all 85,000, of which quantity let him suppose 5,000 tons went into the country, there would still remain 80,000 tons of dead meat which, together with the 97,000 tons of live stock, would bring the whole supply up to 170,000 tons, of which only about one-fifth consisted of foreign live stock. We must, he contended, increase the dead meat trade, and greater facilities for doing so existed now that a noble market had been built by the Corporation of London instead of the old market at Newgate. The dead meat trade was deserving of encouragement for more than one reason. The cattle would be killed without the torture of a long journey, and in a better atmosphere; and, although it was said that dead meat could not well be sent long distances, how was it, he would like to know, that tons upon tons of it were sent from Aberdeen to London, and arrived at their destination in the best possible condition? In 1853 we had in London 38,000 tons of dead meat, or 24 per cent of the entire supply; in 1863, 69,000 tons, or 30 per cent; and in 1867, 80,000 tons, or 40 per cent, so that the quantity was on the increase. He wished, in the next place, to say a few words as to the arguments against the Bill. It was contended that the butchers were more likely to carry the cattle plague about with them than the cattle themselves; but, in reply to that argument, he would merely observe that those who used it would shut up the doctor in the hospital and let the patient loose. As to the objection that dead meat could not be sent five miles by railway without injury, he need only remark that it had been sent over and over again 500 miles without suffering in the slightest degree by the journey. It was, he might add, urged that the exemptions which the noble Lord had introduced into his Bill were absurd, but the House was not at that stage dealing with the clauses of the Bill, but with its main principle, and in advocating that principle he hoped he had placed fairly before the House the views which he entertained and the figures upon which they were founded. He knew it had been said that those who talked about bullocks could not be wise, but he might say with confidence that the question at issue was not a question of protection, but one of security against diseases the ravages of which were injurious to the whole community, and few more important subjects could, he ventured to say, occupy the attention of the collective wisdom of the nation.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he entirely concurred with the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken in thinking that the question before the House had nothing to do with Protection beyond the necessarily protective effect which the restrictions proposed were calculated to produce. But while he agreed with the hon. Gentleman to that extent, he wished to give the reasons why he objected to the second reading of the Bill, and in doing so he must ask the House to consider in what state the second reading would leave them for legislating this Session, and it was impossible in noticing the present Bill not to allude to the Government measure. He objected to the Bill under discussion because, in the first place, it was provided by the fourth clause that the present Acts relating to the subject on which the noble Lord the Member for Huntingdonshire (Lord Robert Montagu) sought to legislate should be made perpetual. The Government were of opinion—an opinion which seemed to have been received with favour on both sides of the House—that it was desirable there should not be more than one Act, whatever the principles might be on which legislation should be established. His first objection then to assenting to the second reading of the Bill was that the consolidation of the seven or eight Acts now in force would thereby be rendered more difficult. Again, the noble Lord had, in his opinion, not placed before the House very clearly what would be the position of the foreign cattle trade under the operation of his measure. He stated, indeed, that the Government had proposed no regulations with respect to that trade; but, in making that statement, the noble Lord laboured under a misapprehension, for the Government had in reality covered the ground of legislation both with regard to the foreign and the home trade. There were three modes in which the importation of foreign cattle might be dealt with. The principle of compulsory slaughter in the case of all foreign animals arriving at any of our ports might be laid down, or it might be left to the discretion of the Government to determine what foreign animals should be compulsorily slaughtered, or it might be provided that there should be no compulsory slaughter at all, but that foreign cattle should be freely admitted into our ports subject to inspection. Now, the last of these plans was not one which he believed was seriously advocated by hon. Members on either side of the House, and it had never entered into the minds of the Government that they could with safety admit the free entry into this country of all animals from foreign countries. At the same time he hoped, he should not be accused of exhibiting ignorance of the subject, if he were to say that whatever restrictions on importation we might impose, one of our main safeguards against the spread of the cattle plague must be regarded to be our power to stamp it out when it did occur. The hon. Gentleman who had last addressed the House had observed that one of the objections which had been urged against the establishment of a separate market was that the disease might be conveyed by a butcher from one place to another, and there could be no doubt that danger would still exist under the operation of the present Bill, unless the idea of exterminating all butchers were carried out by its author. But be that as it might, the Government did not for a moment intend to advocate the free admission of foreign animals. Then came the question whether a rigid rule of compulsory slaughter should be established, and the noble Lord had not informed the House whether he was in favour of laying down such a rule. He understood the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) the other night to advocate a positive rule for the slaughter of foreign cattle, and if such were the general opinion of hon. Members opposite, it would be well to have the fact stated. It would, so far as the Government were concerned, be, of course, a great advantage to them to have no discretion left to them to exercise as to what animals should or should not be admitted from foreign countries, inasmuch as their responsibility would in that case be greatly diminished. Such a principle of legislation was not, however, he believed, seriously advocated on either side of the House. Indeed it was clear, from speeches which the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Read) had made towards the close of last Session, that he was of opinion some discretion ought to rest with the Government in the matter, for otherwise he would not have argued that cattle might be admitted from Denmark and Sweden, or, as at present, from Spain and Portugal. He should like, then, to know from the noble Lord whether he proposed that there should be any discretion left to the Government by the Bill? In the 5th and 6th clauses the principle was laid down that foreign animals landing in our ports should be compulsorily slaughtered, but in the 12th clause, an exemption was introduced which — notwithstanding what had fallen from the hon. Member for Norfolk — he must look upon as one of the utmost importance, for it vested in the Government the discretion of admitting animals from such countries as they might deem fit without compulsory slaughter, provided they were not admitted from countries which had been visited by the cattle plague within a period of three years. Now, that was an exceedingly important provision, and he was surprised the noble Lord had made no allusion to it in his speech. What would be the effect of such a provision? It applied not only to the cattle plague, but to other diseases, such as those to which the hon. Member for Norfolk had referred; but how was it possible, he should like to know, for any Government to ascertain whether the cattle plague had existed for three years in any foreign country, or what was to prevent them from saying, if no proof were given them that it had, that they would then, as a matter of course, admit cattle from that country? The House might depend upon it that if discretion was to be vested in the Government at all, it must be given fully. Both the noble Lord and the hon. Member for Norfolk thought the Bill would not in reality interfere with the interests of the consumer, but he did not think that he need reply in any detail to their arguments on that head. The noble Lord laid down the doctrine that importation depended on prices, although prices did not depend on importation. The real fact, however, was that prices and importation depended upon one another, and that this was so the noble Lord would be convinced if he had had the advantage of dealing with importations as much as he had. It required no statistics to prove that if the natural course of a trade were interfered with, the prices in that trade must, to some extent, be affected. In order to show that this was the case in the present instance, it was not sufficient to compare the Returns for one or two weeks of this year with those for a similar period of last year. To arrive at a just conclusion, a larger space of time must be taken; and he found that while the number of foreign cattle imported in 1865 was more than 283,000, in 1866 237,000, in 1867 178,000, it was in 1868 only 136,000; the number of sheep imported being last year only 341,000, as against 534,000 in the previous year. If hon. Members were to look through the whole of the Returns, they would find that, as the restrictions in the trade were rendered more severe, the diminution in the amount of the importations became greater. A good deal had been said in the course of the discussion about the dead meat trade; and the House must, he thought, even in the interests of common humanity, desire to see that trade developed as much as possible. The way to effect that object, however, was not by attempting to foster it, or imposing any artificial restrictions in its favour. He had now stated some of the objections which he entertained to the Bill; but there was another to which he wished briefly to advert. Clause 10 referred to a local authority, by whom the separate market was to be provided; but the clause, was so far as he could see, a mere brutum fulmen, for there was no power of making the local authorities buy land for the purpose. If they did not, indeed, it was provided that the Privy Council might certify to that effect to the Board of Trade, who were, in that event, empowered by the 11th clause to make the market. But with whose money, he should like to ask, were the Board of Trade to make it? He did not read the Bill as providing that the particular district should be rated with the view to procuring the necessary funds. The Board of Trade would then, in all probability, be placed in such a position that they would have to apply to the Public Works Loan Commissioners; but what security could they give them for the advance of the money which they might require? It might be said that they could give the tolls as security—[Lord ROBERT MONTAGU: And the rates.]—He doubted whether, under the Bill, they could offer the security of the rates. But then the Loan Commissioners might refuse to accept that security. It was very probable that the Commissioners would refuse, and then what was to be done? But if they did not refuse, then the principle of the Bill would empower the Board of Trade at every selected port to speculate in the erection of a market, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have to make good any loss which resulted from that speculation. That was an important principle, and the House should consider it very seriously before adopting it. He opposed the Bill, first, because it would make the work of consolidation difficult; secondly, because, while admitting discretion, it did not define to what extent that discretion was to extend; and, lastly, because it would place this House and the Government in a position which would be found exceedingly embarrassing and difficult. He would now state how the Government proposed to deal with this question of the foreign supply. The Government went upon the principle of interfering as much as appeared necessary for the prevention of disease, and no more. They thought they ought to have the power to prohibit importation entirely from any country afflicted with the cattle plague, and that they also should have power to define what might be called suspected countries, from which animals should be imported on condition that they were slaughtered at the port of landing. Leaving out the three years' provision in the noble Lord's Bill, there was really no immediate practical difference between the two measures in this respect, because a discretion would be given to the Privy Council in both cases. The noble Lord would give them a discretionary power to admit cattle from any countries the Government thought fit; the Government measure merely said that they should exclude cattle from such countries as they thought fit. The immediate practical effect would be the same, though the principle was different, and he maintained that the principle in the Government Bill was the true one—namely, to assume that foreign cattle as a rule were healthy rather than diseased. But then the noble Lord would no doubt say, "You yourselves look forward to a separate market. How do you mean to provide one?" The objection taken by the noble Lord was that it would be difficult to provide any separate market, because there would be no security that the Privy Council might not at any time exclude the site of the market from the area into which foreign cattle were admitted. Now that objection applied to the noble Lord's own Bill, but not to that of the Government, for Clause 27 fully provided for such a case. The Government thought that the local authorities ought to have compulsory powers to obtain land for the erection of a market, and also power to borrow money for the purpose upon the security of the market tolls and rates. The difference between the measure of the noble Lord and that of the Government was that they did not attempt to impose a limit of three years within which the local authorities were bound to provide a market, and did not, in case of the failure of the local authorities to make such provision, entail upon the Government the difficulty of providing markets throughout the country. But then, he might be asked, "What hope have you that the market will be provided?" Now, when hon. Members talked about the difficulty which existed on this point, what they all had in their minds was the case of the metropolis. There was no practical difficulty elsewhere; for, although it might be of advantage that there should be better slaughter-houses at some of the ports, there were none at which some provision did not exist within the defined area for the slaughter and sale of foreign cattle. Now, as to the metropolis, he had been in communication with the City authorities, and though there had not yet been time to take the opinion of the Court of Common Council, the Market Committee, which was an influential civic body, had empowered him to state that if the Government measure were passed into law, they would recommend, and fully expected the concurrence of the Corporation, that the separate market which would be necessary under the Bill, should be provided by the Corporation. At the same time there seemed to be great objection on their part to the Bill of the noble Lord, and, considering how it would affect them, he was not surprised at this. Under all the circumstances, he would ask the noble Lord not to press his Bill to a division. This was no party question, and the views of Gentlemen on both sides of the House would be much better met by a discussion of the Government measure. It was easy to raise all the points suggested by the noble Lord in Committee upon that measure. Amendments could be framed embodying all those views, and the House would then be much better able to arrive at a satisfactory decision than they now could. They would then also have more information as to the probability of the practical working of the Bill in London. It was generally admitted that when a question arose involving considerable detail and complications, the best text upon which you could discuss such a question with a view to legislation, was a Bill brought forward by the Government of the day. He therefore asked the noble Lord to withdraw his measure, but he should vote against it with the full understanding and desire that all the points upon which hon. Members might agree with the noble Lord rather than with the Government, could be raised, and should be raised, and should receive the fullest possible discussion, upon the Government Bill.

MR. SELWIN-IBBETSON said, it had been objected that legislation on this subject would be postponed by acceding to the request of the noble Lord to refer this Bill to a Select Committee. But it never was the intention of the noble Lord to refer this Bill to a Select Committee. What was proposed was that the Bill should be read a second time and then referred along with the Government measure to a Committee of the Whole House. Parts of the noble Lord's Bill were well worthy consideration by the House, and the Government measure would be in no wise damaged if considered alongside of this Bill. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that a Bill emanating from the Government was far more likely to be a comprehensive and satisfactory measure than one brought forward by a private Member; but it would facilitate the discussion of the Government measure if the noble Lord's Bill were taken with it, and the really valuable parts of it were grafted upon the Government scheme.

MR. DENT said, he was not prepared to assent to the principle of this Bill. Whatever might have been the origin of the diseases which beset cattle in this country, he did not believe that they were now solely due to foreign importations, nor did he think that was the view of agriculturists, for one authority among them declared that other measures would be necessary besides the establishment of separate markets, and another advocated the establishment of separate markets for fat stock and separate markets for store stock. In his opinion, besides being preferable as a Consolidation Bill, the principle of the Government measure was a sound one, and the normal state of foreign cattle should be treated as healthy. He trusted there would be no trace of the unfortunate party contest which arose last year upon this question, for it must be the object of hon. Members on both sides to secure a regular, steady, and ample supply of meat for the food of the people. But all questions of difference might be fairly settled upon the Government scheme, and he therefore hoped the noble Lord would withdraw this Bill.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he could confirm the statement which had been already made that his noble Friend never intended to refer his Bill to a Select Committee, but to combine the two measures and enable them to be discussed side by side in Committee of the Whole House. The right hon. Gentleman who moved the rejection of the Bill, and those who followed him on his side of House, had laid much stress upon the proceedings of the Committee of 1866 and the Royal Commission of 1867, but scarcely alluded to the mass of evidence taken before the Committee of 1868. Now, without wishing to attach undue preference to the latter body, of which he (Mr. Lowther) was a Member himself, he ventured to point out a great distinction between it and the similar bodies which had been referred to—namely, that in 1866 and 1867 the majority of the witnesses gave only theories as to the best methods of precaution, whereas last year the Committee was able to hear practical experience, which, unfortunately, too many in the country were in a position to afford, respecting the success or failure of various methods which were under consideration. It had been said that, particularly in hot weather, when the dead meat market was glutted, serious loss would result to the importer. That point was much considered in the Committee of 1868, and one of the witnesses (Captain Ralph Engledew), a gentleman of much practical experience, who had acted as superintendent of the large cattle traffic under the Peninsular and Oriental Company at Southampton, was asked by him whether, since the condition as to compulsory slaughter was in force, there were any means of regulating importations according to the demand. To this the witness replied—

“There is no difficulty about that. The demand and supply are known with perfect ease among the dealers in cattle. We have, for instance, frequently as many as 3,000 or 4,000 dead carcasses of sheep come in one ship, and twenty, thirty, or forty tons of beef brought from Hamburg and other places by steamers, which is landed at the wharf and taken away to the different markets; and I find, from the information I received from those gentlemen who deal in live and dead stock, that they use the wire so continuously that they keep their markets just to the point; that they never have an excess in the market over that which they can sell.”

Then, with regard to offal, it was true that a great portion of the labouring classes were dependent upon this kind of food, and on this point Mr. Engledew said that great quantities were imported from Antwerp, Hamburg, and other places; that not only the picked parts came over, but the whole offal, packed in casks. It was not at all probable that this supply of offal would be diminished in any sensible degree in future, and any apprehension upon this score might be dismissed. He urged the adoption of such measures as would effectually insure the flocks and herds of this country against disease.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he supposed that the hon. Members opposite, who were calling for a division after having but just entered the House, did not know what had occurred during the debate; perhaps they did not care to know; but were quite ready to vote without knowing on what they were about to vote. That, however, was not the case with those who, like himself, had heard the debate. The right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam), opposed the Bill before the House on the distinct ground that he objected to any separate market for foreign cattle, and to any permanent arrangements being made at the ports for the tempoary quarantine of foreign cattle by providing lairs and sheds, in which the cattle might be kept till they had been duly inspected. He (Mr. Newdegate) wished to know, whether this objection was entertained by the Government; for the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had evaded this point while speaking, or rather, had disguised it. He therefore asked whether he was to understand that the Government intended to admit into their Bill a proposal for the establishment of quarantine in the case of foreign cattle, landed at certain ports to be designated by law, for the reception of foreign cattle, and provided with lairs, sheds, facilities for inspection, and with arrangements for separate markets in those places? It was said the Government measure proceeded on the assumption that cattle were healthy both at home and abroad, but in that case, what need was there for a Bill at all? It was the unanimous opinion of the leading veterinary surgeons of England that, unless quarantine lairs were provided, in which cattle could be kept for a certain number of hours after landing, inspection with a view to ascertain whether those animals were diseased or not was a perfect farce. He objected to allow any undefined discretion to be vested in the Privy Council. The case of Hull had been alluded to. What was the case of Hull? A large and unregulated trade in foreign stock had there arisen, until, unfortunately, the cattle plague was there imported. This naturally aroused the jealousy of the Government, and the trade was destroyed by the Orders in Council. He (Mr. Newdegate) believed that, in the interests of trade, in the interests of the consumer and of all classes of the community, it was essential that separate ports of debarkation should be established by law, so that the certainty should exist which was essential to all successful trade.

MR. BRUCE said, it was not his intention to enter into the merits of the case. The question now before the House was whether the Bill of his noble Friend (Lord Robert Montagu) should be submitted to the same Committee as that which would consider the Government Bill. Now, he thought he could show that course would be most inconvenient and objectionable. The Bill of his noble Friend only dealt with the foreign importation of cattle, leaving out of sight the question of domestic disease and other points provided for in the Government Bill. But did it even deal completely with the importation of cattle? No, for it was grafted upon other Bills relating to this subject, and was merely a supplement to them. The Government measure, on the contrary, would, he thought, be regarded as setting a wholesome example of legislation, for it consolidated all the Acts relating to the subject. The Bill of the Government was, in fact, a code, dealing with the whole subject of cattle disease and importation, and it was impossible to engraft upon it a measure like that of the noble Lord, which did not depend upon itself but upon the Act of 1867, and upon Acts passed many years previously. Moreover, what was understood by referring Bills to the same Committee? It was, perhaps, in the minds of many Gentlemen that these two Bills could be considered side by side in Committee of the Whole House; that when one clause was dealt with in one Bill, a kindred clause in the other Bill could be set up against it and considered at the same time. But that was not the case. The only object gained by referring Bills to the same Committee was that when one had been considered and done with the Committee could continue the consideration of the second Bill without the necessity of reporting Progress on the first. Now he hoped it would be seen that it would be impossible to engraft his noble Friend's Bill upon the Government measure without entirely destroying the character of the latter as a Consolidation Bill; but it was quite possible for his noble Friend, and those who thought with him, to endeavour to embody the principles of his Bill in the Government measure by moving to amend the clauses of that measure. There was no great principle at stake between the two schemes, and the securities offered by the Government Bill were as great as those offered by his noble Friend, but the consideration of both Bills at the same time and by the same Committee was out of the question.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, he did not think it right or fair to refuse to refer the two Bills to the same Committee, and should therefore support the second reading.

SECOND READING.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: Sir, I am about to invite the House to assent to the second reading of this Bill, and in so doing I do not propose to detain the House more than a very few minutes, because this Bill is now an old story, and the subject with which it deals has formed so common a topic in the election addresses and speeches of hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House that I think it is fair to presume that the leading arguments in favour of the change—the just change—proposed by the measure are by this time familiar to all of us; and, for my own part, as it has been my evil fortune to inflict three speeches already on the subject upon the House of Commons, I am sure hon. Gentlemen will rejoice to know that the materials altogether fail me for a fourth. There is one topic, however, that is new in the present discussion, and that is the presence of my right hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Mowbray) in the fore front of this battle. For during the few years I myself have had a seat in Parliament my right hon. and learned Friend has observed a cautious silence on this matter, and I had been induced to hope that upon some points of the Bill, and those not unimportant points, there was an agreement in sentiment between myself and that learned and right hon. Gentleman. But my right hon. Friend is no doubt no longer quite his own master. He has been sent to this House as the representative of the Convocation of Oxford—of the constituency which rejected the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, and which would have nothing to say to the distinguished services of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer). Therefore, no doubt, my right. hon. and learned Friend must needs do the bidding of Convocation. That he will do it well; that he will do it, so far as he can, in a genial and kindly spirit, I have known my right hon. and learned Friend for too many years to doubt; but I trust that he will excuse me if I say that he cannot as yet make up to the House for the candour and dignity, for the great gifts and the singularly lofty and stainless character which has been lost to the House by the absence from its debates of the right hon. Gentleman's distinguished predecessor, Sir William Heathcote.

The Bill now before the House is, as everyone who has taken the trouble of reading it will see, with one exception, and that a mere verbal alteration, an exact reprint of the Bill of last year, and like the Bill of last year it deals in a different manner, and upon different principles, with the two great subjects comprised in it, the Universities and the Colleges of which these Universities are mainly composed. With regard to the Universities, it compels that amount of religious freedom in regard to all the subjects of the Queen which the House of Commons at least by overwhelming majorities on previous occasions has declared that it thinks just and right. With regard to the Colleges, it only removes all restrictions upon their freedom of action which have been imposed from time to time by the authority of Parliament itself. It leaves the Colleges controlled by their statutes, it leaves them controlled by the feeling of their members, it leaves them controlled by all the associations which gather round them, and which are after all upon most men's minds as effective as any Parliamentary action can be, and it relieves them only from those restrictions which have been imposed from time to time by Acts of Parliament. I cannot but think that year by year the necessity of some such change will become more and more apparent. The discontent—the just and reasonable discontent—of those multitudes of persons who do not agree in all things with the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England is deepening day by day; and for my part I cannot but see with regret that men of high character and great attainments are every year lost to the Colleges, and lose themselves those just and honourable distinctions which are the due reward of their character and attainments, and which they would possess but for the restrictions which legislation has thought fit to impose. The Senior Wrangler at Cambridge this year was a Jew, and he is not the first person by any means who has, from a difference of religious opinion, been excluded from the just and right result of a course of academical distinction. I have myself known, not a great many, but several instances of persons, highly distinguished in both the Universities, who have been excluded from Fellowships in the Colleges, not from any active hostility to the Church of England, not from any strong or definite objection to this or that particular tenet of the Church, but because, as honest men, they could not say that in all things the doctrines and opinions contained in the whole of the Thirty-nine Articles exactly expressed their belief. Now it is only to enable the Colleges, if the Colleges themselves think fit, to alter this state of things that the Bill at present proposes to deal with them. I cannot but think that there is no ground, if the provisions of the Bill be looked into, for speaking of it as anything like a tyrannical interference with their liberties, still less as an act of spoliation, as I have before now heard it described.

It is fair to say, however, that there is one matter with which the Bill now before the House does not deal, but which, expressing my own opinion only, it appears to me cannot long be kept from the action of Parliament. I allude to the position which, at least at Oxford, the visitors of many of the Colleges are supposed under the present state of the law to maintain. I am not exactly aware how the matter stands at Cambridge; but at Oxford many of the most distinguished Colleges are visited not by the Crown, but by various Bishops, in virtue of the tenure of their sees, and it has been decided, upon very high authority, that according to the Oxford Act of 1854 these visitors can place a veto upon all alterations of their statutes by the Colleges. I know that one very distinguished visitor has not hesitated to interpose his veto to prevent a College making an alteration in its statute, not upon the ground that the alteration in the statute would be prejudicial to the College, but because he, being the visitor of the College and a Bishop, thought that alteration in the statute would be prejudicial to the Church of which he was a member; injuring the College of which he was a visitor, to benefit, as he thought, the Church of which he was a Bishop, and giving an example of a confusion of functions which I cannot help thinking ought not much longer to be allowed to exist.

I will now say one word with regard to the common argument which those who oppose this Bill have brought forward, and I wish to do so because last year I spoke warmly on this subject—perhaps too warmly—and made use of expressions which were misunderstood—I hope and believe unjustly misunderstood—to reflect upon the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hardy), who I am sure knows that to reflect on him is the last thing I would do intentionally. I confess I have felt sometimes provoked and mortified to hear men for whom I have a great respect speaking in what seems to me so weak and hopeless a tone of the strength and prospects of the Church of England and of Christianity itself. To hear those Gentlemen talk, it would seem as if the Church of England relied entirely upon the protection of certain Acts of Parliament, and it would be destroyed if certain Acts of Parliament were repealed; and that with regard to Christianity there was a hopeless future in store for it, if ever it was brought face to face in fair conflict with infidelity. For my part, I utterly deny both those statements. With regard to Christianity, I must say that history and experience show us that the battle of belief and unbelief is going on, and always has been going on; and that, looking back at bygone times, there is no reason for Christianity to be afraid of the ultimate result of that great struggle. And with regard to the Church of England, I say that with the great advantages and the immense associations with which she starts it is her own fault if she is not perfectly safe. She is perfectly safe if she does her duty; and if she does not do her duty she has no right to come to Parliament for protection against the natural results of her own neglect. I say, therefore, this measure as now proposed to the House, is a perfectly harmless measure; I believe it to be an inevitable measure, and I believe it to be a measure inevitable in a very short time.

I believe, further, that many hon. Gentlemen opposite know in their hearts that this is true, as well as I who say it; and I do earnestly wish that they would take counsel in time and accept the inevitable; that they would accept it in a case where, unless they give everything, they give nothing; that they would accept it frankly; that they would prepare for it and work for it in good heart and good faith, and not fly the flag of "No surrender," a flag quite certain to be torn down; and not raise the cry of Non possumus, a cry which history shows no good ever came from, and out of which no good ever will.

Motion made, and Question proposed "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Solicitor General.)

MR. MOWBRAY: Sir, My hon. and learned Friend, at the commencement of his remarks, told us that we had heard enough of this measure in election speeches, but I think I have some reason to complain that he followed out that remark by himself making an election speech. He was not content to refer merely to the election of 1868, but he must travel back to the proceedings of the University of Oxford in 1865, and reflect upon those who then took part in the election of that year. No one, Sir, is more painfully conscious than I am of my inability to fill the place of the many distinguished men who have been my predecessors in the representation of the University of Oxford. No one laments more than I do that I have to stand here and, to the best of my feeble powers, defend that cause which my hon. and learned Friend has just said was so well maintained by my distinguished predecessor, Sir William Heathcote; and I can only say, "would indeed that he were once more amongst us." My hon. and learned Friend has just stated that I am here to do the bidding of the Convocation of Oxford. I should like to know what right I have to sit in this House if I am not here as the representative of the Convocation of the University of Oxford; and this I must say that, if at any time I altered my views, or departed from the opinions which recommended me to the consideration of the Convocation, I should feel myself to be unworthy to stand up in my place in Parliament in their name. My hon. and learned Friend has thought fit, whilst he pays me personal compliments, for which I thank him, and which I must say were far beyond my deserts, to insinuate that my own opinions differed from those which I am about to advocate. All that I can say on that point is that if, on previous occasions, I have maintained a cautious silence in this House, it is because I have found the principles at stake well recommended and amply defended by other Members better able to take part in the debate than myself; and I beg to tell my hon. and learned Friend that I never shrank from recording my vote on every occasion in every division that has taken place. It is quite true that I have not yet made four speeches on the subject, like my hon. and learned Friend, and I must ask the indulgence of the House for a little longer time than my hon. and learned Friend has occupied. And first let me say that there is one point in which the Universities have a right to complain of my hon. and learned Friend's proceedings with regard to this Bill. On every previous occasion it has been the habit to give longer notice before bringing in this Bill, and to have the Bill printed in such time as to enable the University to express its opinion upon it. Now, although it is more than a fortnight since my hon. Friend obtained leave to introduce his Bill, it was only last Thursday that it was printed, and it could only be sent down to the Universities on Friday. Steps were taken at the earliest moment to take the opinion of Convocation upon it; but the forms of Convocation have prevented that being done in time, otherwise I think I should have been able to present to the House a petition from Convocation against the Bill.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: I had previously stated that the Bill was similar to that of last year.

MR. MOWBRAY: No doubt the hon. and learned Gentleman did make that statement, but until we see a Bill we do not know precisely what is in it. People do not keep old Bills. The Bills of last year were not to be obtained, and Convocation could not proceed to petition against measures which were not before it. But as regards my objections to the Bill they are objections of principle. My hon. and learned Friend asks me to accept the inevitable. I do not know what Parliament is about to do, but it is our duty if we firmly believe great principles, and believe that the interests of the Church and of the country are concerned in the maintenance of those principles, to uphold them manfully, regardless of the consequences. When he tells us to accept the inevitable, my hon. and learned Friend means, I presume, all the provisions which he chooses to put into this great Bill which is now before the House. If there had been any hope of a compromise, if any concession which we could have held out would have been at all likely to have been accepted by the hon. and learned Gentleman, or those who sit behind him, I, for one, should most gladly not have moved the rejection of this Bill, but have endeavoured to bring about a compromise. But Sir William Heathcote offered, over and over again, compromises which have always been rejected. We have read in the public Press and elsewhere various suggestions for compromises, and last autumn a great divine suggested one on the basis of the Nicene Creed. All had the same object, that of maintaining the Universities as places of Christian education; but everything that has been proposed in the nature of a compromise has been rejected, and therefore it only remains for us to say "No" to the Bill of my hon. and learned Friend. The Bill divides itself into two parts—that which concerns the Universities and that which concerns the Colleges. With regard to the Universities, its legislation is compulsory; with regard to the Colleges, it proposes merely to facilitate action on their part, by removing certain clauses in certain Acts of Parliament. I take the question as regards the Universities first. It has been the fashion to consider this matter as proved by two assertions. I have heard it said by hon. Gentlemen who sit on those Benches, that the Universities are lay corporations. Nobody denies it. Then we are told that they are national institutions. Undoubtedly they are, but in the term "national institutions" the whole fallacy of that argument lies. In what sense do you accept the meaning of the term? The Church of England is a national institution, and I hope will long continue so. But do you mean that the Universities were founded by the State, or are supported by the money of the State? They are neither supported by the State, nor were they founded by it. What is the history of the Universities? It goes back to remote antiquity, centuries and centuries ago, long before this House existed. The Universities were then voluntary associations attracting crowds of students. The wealth they had was wealth of their own; they had created that wealth, and did not receive it from the State. They were national institutions impressed with distinct trusts. There has been no period in the history of England when the education given at their Universities has not been distinctly a religious education, and I mean by that an education connected with a distinct and definite form of religious teaching. It is true that changes took place at the Reformation. It is true that the Universities have followed the changes and fortunes of the Church, and have been connected with the national Church for the time being; but that does not alter my position that, at all times and under all circumstances, they have been places for definite religious teaching—a religious teaching which corresponded with the public profession of faith, as professed by a majority of the nation, and established in connection with the State. This you find recognized by Parliament on every occasion. The Bill which my hon. and learned Friend has introduced is the first in which no mention is made of religion in connection with these Universities. The first statute which was passed with respect to the Universities, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth—13 Elizabeth, 1570—contemplates the objects of the incorporation to be "the maintenance of the good and godly training and the virtuous education of youth," and in most important acts of legislation—the Oxford University Reform Act of 1854, and the Cambridge Act of 1856—you find the same principle recognized, as in the words "whereas it is expedient for the advancement of religion and learning to increase the powers of the University," &c. Then is this not a fundamental change which my hon. and learned Friend seeks to make in these Universities? Not merely has legislation recognized the religious character of these great seats of education, but, practically and historically, that character has been fully maintained, and the very motto of Oxford, "Dominus illuminatio mea," which it has borne for centuries, is a sufficient indication of the same. My hon. and learned Friend seeks to nullify that motto, however, by setting up in the Universities the light of secularism. Is this great change necessary? At Cambridge already every person is admitted to the degree of Master of Arts, without taking any test. A test is only imposed when he becomes a governing member of the Senate. At Oxford undoubtedly the restriction is greater, as you can only proceed to the degree of Bachelor of Arts without a test being imposed upon you. Over and over again, however, we have offered, on behalf of Oxford, what was called the Cambridge compromise, and even now we shall be quite ready to adopt the same provisions with regard to that University that exist with regard to Cambridge, and to add to them, if it was desired, that which will recommend itself to my hon. and learned Friend opposite, a vote for the burgesses to represent the University in this House. The case, then, would stand thus—A young man going up to the University would have open to him every honour, every prize, every social advantage, all that culture and learning we were told last year the Dissenters prized so highly, and he would have all this without distinction of creed, or race, or colour. But the Bill now before us involves a fundamental change in our legislation, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury will kindly give me his attention at the present moment, because this is a change which I venture to think, —unless he has very materially altered the opinions he expressed in former years—he can hardly be expected to sanction at the present moment. Not in a book written in 1839, but in a speech made in this House so recently as 1854, the right hon. Gentleman, at that time the Member of a Liberal Government, and sitting beside Lord John Russell, expressed himself in these terms—

“ I hold the relative position of the Church and the University of Oxford to be this—that while the Church is in the position of a national Establishment, so long as the people of this country insist upon a connection being maintained between religion and education, so long the Church is entitled to expect that the interests of the University, that the discipline of the University, that the government of the University, shall be moulded in conformity with the principles of religion, and with the principles of religion in that specific form in which they are held and taught by the Church of England.”

What does that argument amount to but this—that so long as there is an Established Church in England, so long should the connection be kept up between the Universities and the Church? When we objected to the disestablishment of the Irish Church, we were told that a distinction was to be drawn between the two Churches; but my hon. and learned Friend, while prepared to maintain the Church of England, proposes to do that which the First Lord of the Treasury himself admitted was inconsistent with the connection between the Universities and the Established Church. We are not only to depart from our legislation with regard to the higher class of teaching at the University, but to legislate in direct contravention of the principle laid down by Parliament in 1860 with regard to endowed schools. That Act, while providing for the education of children differing in religion from the governing body, held that the religion of the governing body should be maintained. I come now to the question of the Colleges, with respect to which my hon. and learned Friend seems to feel that his position is a more difficult one, and he proceeds in a tentative, and seductive, and attractive way, clothed with all the charms of eloquence, and says—“ There is nothing at all tyrannical in my proceedings; I merely wish to relieve the Colleges of certain difficulties imposed by the Act of Charles II., and by more recent Acts of the Georges upon them, and to leave them free, without regard to anything but merit and ability, to choose the best men as their Fellows.” Well, but what are these Colleges? You cannot say that they are national institutions. They are private foundations. They were founded by private benefactors, who had impressed their trusts upon those institutions. Do you suppose that the great and wealthy ecclesiastics, who for the most part founded those Colleges—that Chicheley and William of Wykeham, and Waynflete, did not intend that religion of a very definite form should be taught in those Colleges? What is the meaning of those College chapels, to which all the students of the Colleges are invited to attend, and which are the central ornament and the great feature of every College in the University? What is the meaning of all those trust deeds, by which they tied up the government of these Colleges? And have these Colleges forfeited their trust? By no means. So recently as 1854 and 1856 the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury recognized the duty of maintaining the original intentions of the founders and benefactors. [Mr. GLADSTONE: The "main" design of the founders.] What could be more a main design than that these Colleges should be places for religious education? What is the meaning of such names as Trinity, St John's, Christ Church, St. Mary the Virgin and St. Mary Magdalene? What does that mean unless that the founders intended that the students should be taught religious principles? My hon. and learned Friend talked of the "inevitable," and comes to us with this seductive, permissive, tentative Bill, to enable the Colleges to repeal the Acts of Charles II., George III. and George IV., and to select their best men. But what if they do not adopt it? The hon. and learned Gentleman has already, in his short speech of to-day, sketched out a programme of future legislation to remove the direct representatives of the founders—the visiting Bishops—from the position they occupy. That is clear as daylight. My hon. and learned Friend wants to carry one point to-day—to remove these restrictions from the Colleges—and then he would go a step further. Those Bishops are already viewed as obstructives. If you get this Bill you will exclaim, "What a gross thing it is;" you will say, "Here is a young man who has attained the highest honours—a Senior Wrangler at Cambridge or a double first at Oxford—and because he is a Jew or Roman Catholic he cannot enjoy all the benefactions of the founder." You will say, "What a hardship this is." [Cheers.] I expected that cheer, and I would ask whether it was not also a hardship that this young man should not enjoy the estates of hon. Gentlemen opposite. [Laughter] Why not? If an Act of Parliament could take the one, why not the other? I can fancy my hon. and learned Friend—if not removed to a more distinguished place—saying three years hence, "We gave you once the opportunity—Parliament gave you the hint; we put the screw on the University, and compelled them to admit into the governing body those who were not members of the Church of England. At the same time we gave you, the Fellows of Colleges, power to throw your foundations open; you would not take advantage of the hint, and we now come forward with compulsory measures." I am sure that that will be the sequel of the legislation of the hon. and learned Gentleman; and if you do proceed to compulsory legislation, will you respect private foundations of recent date? It is true that many of the large foundations of Oxford will not come within the limit which the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury laid down. They were anterior to 1660. If my hon. and learned Friend does bring in such a Bill, I hope he will allow me to put in a word on behalf of Worcester College, which was founded so recently as 1714. I should like to know, also, what he would do with the College chapels. Suppose all the Fellows were Unitarians—the College chapel having no marketable value—would he leave it to the Church of England, or to the single unfortunate head, to keep it for his own purposes? At any rate, there is one College which I hope will appeal to the tender sympathies of my hon. Friend, and on which he will not lay a finger—that College whose walls are only now rising, whose mortar is still moist, and whose roofs are yet uncovered, that College which is founded in memory of the great Christian poet, whose life we have all been reading with so much interest. Need I remind my hon. and learned Friend of the opinion expressed by that distinguished man—I do not refer to the mysterious whisperings of his sentiments about the Church Establishment of Ireland, but the clear, unmistakable opinions which Mr. Keble uttered three years ago with reference to the position of the University and the Colleges. There is another point which has been kept out of sight by those who advocate the measure. We are told that Nonconformists are anxious to resort to these Colleges for the learning they get there; but are we sure when we have made these fundamental changes, so that the Colleges shall cease to be places of religious teaching, the religious parents of England will send their sons to the University as before? The social attractions of the Universities may thus be destroyed in endeavouring to liberalize those institutions. Do I say so without reason? I believe every religious body which professes a definite belief—not a colourless creed which seems so fashionable—desires that their youth shall be taught the distinctive tenets of their own denomination. In 1854 the late Mr. Lucas, a distinguished Roman Catholic Member of this House, in speaking on the question of admission of Dissenters to Oxford, said that he would advise Roman Catholic parents not to send their sons to Oxford if the change then proposed should be carried. And what do we find in 1867? We find Roman Catholics in this and the other House, voting in 1867 against the measure of that time on the ground that there must be religious teaching. It was distinctly on that ground that two Roman Catholic Peers both spoke and voted against the measure of my hon. and learned Friend. I am sorry to have troubled the House so long, but I must protest as strongly as I can against the proposed legislation. It is most injurious to the Universities and destructive of the whole principles on which the Universities were founded and have hitherto acted—it is most unjust to the Colleges, and to the Church of England. These two Universities, if I may be allowed to quote the eloquent language of the First Lord of the Treasury, have been “tried and not found wanting in the vicissitudes of a thousand years.” They have during that time conferred inestimable benefits both upon the Church of England and upon the Legislature. To the Church they have given a succession of great and learned divines, who defended the doctrines of Christianity in their pulpits and by their writings, and exemplified its precepts by their blameless and holy lives. To the State they have given statesmen who have served the Crown with honour, and adorned both Houses of Parliament. And the right hon. Gentleman would be very ungrateful did he not admit this; for, excepting only two distinguished Members, the President of the Board of Trade and the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education, the Universities have furnished all the occupants of the Bench opposite. They have perfected and carried out the best system of education that ever prevailed in any country. For all this they have deserved well of the country. It is most unjust, then, to break in on a system which has prevailed for centuries, from which such great results have followed. However feeble my voice, and however ineffectual my protest—however “inevitable” the future to which my hon. and learned Friend referred—and however I may be taunted with speaking the sentiments of Convocation, I, speaking the real mind and sentiments of those who sent me here to represent them, and the convictions of my own heart, will always raise my voice against so revolutionary a measure. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER moved, that the Debate be adjourned.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: To what day?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: Till to-morrow, after the Army Estimates.

MR. MOWBRAY: At what hour will it be resumed? It ought to be taken at an hour when it can be fully debated.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: I agree in that, and shall take it not later than half-past ten.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

INCLOSURE AWARDS (COUNTY PALATINE OF DURHAM) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. BENTINCK, Bill to provide for depositing in one place the Inclosure Awards preserved at Durham, and for abolishing the office of Cursitor of the Court of Chancery in the Palatine of Durham, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BENTINCK, Sir ROUNDELL PALMER, and Mr. WILLIAM LOWTHER.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—Second Reading—Governor General of India (16).

PRIVATE BILLS.

On Motion of the CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES it was ordered—

“That the time limited by the order of the 25th of February last for the reception of petitions for Private Bills be extended to the first sitting day after the recess at Easter.”

GOVERNOR GENERAL OF INDIA BILL.

(NO. 16.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I rise, my Lords, for the purpose of moving the second reading of a Bill which I trust may raise some discussion, but which I believe and feel assured will raise nothing in the shape of political controversy in this House; yet it is a matter of high interest and importance, for it affects the machinery for legislation for many millions of the subjects of the Queen in India. It will, I think, be a satisfaction to those Members of the House who have as great a suspicion as myself of theoretical legislation on constitutional questions and on the amendments on the machinery of government to know that, although this Bill was prepared by the late and has been adopted by the present Government, it is in reality a measure mainly suggested and, to a great extent, framed by the Government of India, and has not been by them devised for the purpose of giving effect to theoretical opinions, but simply for the purpose of removing practical inconveniences which have been found to affect the working of the existing administrative system. I need not detain your Lordships for a moment in describing the object of the first two clauses. They are intended merely to remedy a blunder—a very strange blunder—committed in two former Acts of Parliament. Your Lordships are aware that the native States of India are so mixed with our own territory, and have in themselves so many degrees of dependence upon us, that it is absolutely necessary we should have full power and control over our own subjects who are resident therein. Now in 1849 the local Legislature of India passed an Act, giving the courts and Government of India authority over those of our own subjects who should commit crimes or offences within the territories of native States. Unfortunately, however, an Act passed by the Imperial Parliament in 1861, and intended, I believe, to give effect to the local enactment, committed the mistake of limiting that power to the servants of the Government of India; for by giving the Indian Government and courts of law jurisdiction over persons holding office under that Government, if they committed crimes in native States, it by implication recognized no such jurisdiction over persons who were not its officers but were merely its subjects. In 1865, when this doubt was brought before the attention of Parliament, my noble Friend, who is not now present (Lord Halifax), introduced a Bill intended to remedy the mistake. But unfortunately a new mistake was committed;—for though, in its Preamble, distinct notice was taken of the distinction between European subjects of the Crown and native subjects, it unfortunately happened that in the enacting clauses that distinction was overlooked, and the words used were “all British subjects.” Now, the term “British subjects” had in India a restricted meaning, having received a legal and fixed interpretation confining it to European subjects of the Crown. Thus, an Act designed to remedy one blunder committed another, leaving the Government of India precisely in the same position as before, with a serious doubt cast upon its authority over its native subjects if they committed crimes within the jurisdiction of native States. Now the 1st clause of this Bill will correct these blunders—it affirms the power of the Government of India to legislate for and have jurisdiction over all persons being native Indian subjects of Her Majesty committing crimes or offences within the dominions of native Princes. The 2nd clause is a consequential one, declaring valid all previous Acts of the Government with reference to this jurisdiction. The 3rd and 4th clauses involve questions of great interest and importance. The history of the legislative power in India is a very curious one. Down to the year 1833 the Executive Council of the Governor General had full power to make laws and regulations for its own territories—in fact the same body acted as Executive Council and as Legislative Council. From 1833 to 1853 the Governor General and his Council practically enjoyed the same power; for, though the Act of 1833 constituted what is called the Legislative Council, that Council simply consisted of the Members of the Executive Council plus a lawyer, who was called the fourth or Legislative Member of the Council, whose right to be present in the Council was limited to those occasions when legislative work was transacted. Virtually, therefore, the Governor General and his Executive Council were supreme, and could pass for all parts of India any regulations having the force of law which they might think expedient. Since 1853, a different state of things has prevailed. In the first place, the Act of that year established a Legislative Council, which was an entirely new body, consisting, to a great extent, of extraneous Members. Then the Act of 1861 made an important amendment in the constitution of that body, all legislative power, however, being still withdrawn from the Governor General and his Executive Council, and being lodged in the Supreme Legislative Assembly. Now, the consequence was that the Governor General could not, by the action of his Executive Council, make regulations having the force of law even for those provinces which had hitherto been called the non-regulation provinces; but was obliged, in order to make such regulations for any part of India, however rude, uncivilized, or outlying, to put in motion the whole machinery of the Legislative Council at Calcutta. Thus, as regards the Presidencies of Bengal, Madras, and Bombay, the Legislative Council at Calcutta, though not indeed the sole, is the Supreme Legislative Council, and as regards all the rest of India, including the non-regulation provinces, is not only the supreme, but the sole Legislative Council. Now, there have been many complaints of late years of what is called "over-legislation" in India—of the passing of Acts or regulations being, in fact, Acts relating to comparatively small matters, frequently affecting only portions of the territory, and rendering the statute book of India exceedingly complicated. The Government of India has lately sent home an interesting Minute on this subject, explaining how this complication has become necessary; and the main argument used by Mr. Maine in defence of himself and of the Legislative Council at Calcutta is that, in consequence of the statutes to which I have referred, that Council is the only body empowered to make laws for any matter, however trivial, affecting the outlying territories. Now, I need hardly say that for the more outlying parts, and for many tribes within our jurisdiction; it is very desirable that the Government of India should have large discretionary regulating powers, and the sole object of the 3rd and 4th clauses of this Bill is to restore to the Governor General in his Executive Council the power of making regulations which I think should, in language as well as in fact, be kept separate from laws, properly so-called, enacted by the Supreme Legislative Council. Clause 3 provides that for all parts of India under the immediate administration of the Governor General in Council—the old non-regulation provinces—it shall be in his power, in his Executive Council, without putting in motion the Legislative Council, to make regulations having, in the meantime, the force of law. With regard to those portions of Indian territory erected into Lieutenant Governorships, it is proposed that the same power shall be enjoyed—subject to this restriction—that in any regulations relating, for example, to such an important province as the Punjab the initiative shall be with the Lieutenant Governor of the province. He will send draft regulations to the Governor General at Calcutta, and, if approved by the latter, they will be put in force under the name of "Regulations," having for a limited time the force of law with regard to that particular territory. The second part of the 4th clause extends the same provision to the Governors of Madras and Bombay in their Councils, but only as regards those portions of territory which may from time to time be declared to be in the nature of non-regulation provinces. I may mention as an example the great province of Scinde. That is a case in which the Governor of Bombay would have power, if that province were designated for the purpose, of making regulations by his Executive Council alone. The latter part of the clause provides that this power may be temporarily withdrawn by the Government at home. The 5th clause provides that such regulations shall be sent home for the approval of the Secretary of State. The 6th enacts that whenever the Governor General in Council shall hold a Council for the purpose of making laws and regulations affecting the territory of a Lieutenant Governor or Chief Commissioner, such Lieutenant Governor or Chief Commissioner shall be an ex officio additional Member of the Council for that purpose and for that time. The 7th and 8th clauses are designed to render more convenient and more in harmony with existing usage the practice of the Legislative Council in the event of dissent between the Governor and his Council, or between different Members of that Council. The 3 & 4 Will. IV., which this clause repeals, requires that, in all such cases, Minutes must be drawn up recording the different opinions; but, in point of fact, this is felt to be a great inconvenience, and is not resorted to, nor is it always expedient that such dissent should be recorded with a view to the information of the public. There is often a desire to act together, as a Cabinet does here, the minority yielding to the majority. It is, accordingly, proposed, in harmony with the existing usage, that dissents shall not be recorded unless any two Members of the Council desire it.

I now come to a clause—the 9th—which is one of very great importance, involving some modification in our practice and in the principles of our legislation as regards the Civil Service in India. Its object is to set free the hands of the Governor General, under such restrictions and regulations as may be agreed to by the Government at home, to select for the Covenanted Service of India natives of that country, although they may not have gone through the competitive examination in this country. It may be asked how far this provision is consistent with the measures adopted by Parliament for securing efficiency in that service; but there is a previous, and, in my opinion, a much more important question which I trust will be considered—how far this provision is essential to enable us to perform our duties and fulfil our pledges and professions towards the people of India? There has, I think, been much exaggeration with respect to the nature of our Indian Empire. It is often declared to be the most wonderful Empire that ever existed in the world. Now, as far as magnitude is concerned, that is by no means the case. Many of the great monarchies of the ancient world were much larger, and so also were many of the military monarchies of the Middle Ages. At the present time, moreover, the territory and people ruled by Russia constitute a much more enormous Empire than that which we possess in India. The peculiarity of the latter is that it is not a part of our territory in the sense of forming any part of our political system, nor is it a colony, nor is it a dominion from which we derive, or have ever professed to derive, any tribute or pecuniary advantage. Beyond the dividend given to those who have held shares in the Indian debt, India does not now contribute, and has not, since the very earliest days of the Company, contributed a single farthing to the Imperial necessities of the State. The great peculiarity then of our Indian Empire is the relation in which we stand to the people. We hold it under the instinct of dominion. I believe that instinct has been a powerful instrument in the civilization of the world; and I believe, further, that never at any period of the history of the world has it been placed on a firmer basis or exercised from purer motives than those which have induced us to maintain our Empire in India. With regard, however, to the employment of natives in the government of their country in the Covenanted Service formerly of the Company and now of the Crown, I must say that we have not fulfilled our duty or the promises and engagements which we have made. In the Act of 1833 this declaration was solemnly put forth by the Parliament of England—

“And be it enacted, That no Native of the said Territories, nor any natural-born Subject of His Majesty resident therein, shall, by reason only of his Religion, Place of Birth, Descent, Colour, or any of them, be disabled from holding any Place, Office, or Employment under the said Company.”

Now, I well remember that in the debates in this House in 1853, when the renewal of the Charter was under the consideration of Lord Aberdeen's Government, my late noble Friend Lord Monteagle complained, and I think with great force, that while professing to open every office of profit and employment under the Company or the Crown to the natives of India, we practically excluded them by laying down regulations as to fitness which we knew natives could never fulfil. If the only door of admission to the Civil Service of India is a competitive examination carried on in London, what chance or what possibility is there of natives of India acquiring that fair share in the administration of their own country which their education and abilities would enable them to fulfil, and therefore entitle them to possess? I have always felt that the regulations laid down for the competitive examination rendered nugatory the declaration of the Act of 1833; and so strongly has this been felt of late years by the Government of India that various suggestions have been made to remedy the evil. One of the very last—which, however, has not yet been finally sanctioned at home, and respecting which I must say there are serious doubts—has been suggested by Sir John Lawrence, who is now about to approach our shores, and who is certainly one of the most distinguished men who have ever wielded the destinies of our Indian Empire. The palliative which he proposes is that nine scholarships—nine scholarships for a Government of upwards of 180,000,000 of people!—should be annually at the disposal for certain natives, selected partly by competition and partly with reference to their social rank and position, and that these nine scholars should be sent home with a salary of £200 a year each to compete with the whole force of the British population seeking admission through the competitive examinations. Now, in the first place, I would point out the utter inadequacy of the scheme to the ends of the case. To speak of nine scholarships distributed over the whole of India as any fulfilment of our pledges or obligations to the natives would be a farce. I will not go into the details of the scheme, as they are still under consideration; but I think it is by no means expedient to lay down as a principle that it is wholly useless to require natives seeking employment in our Civil Service to see something of English society and manners. It is true that in the new schools and Colleges they pass most distinguished examinations, and, as far as books can teach them, are familiar with the history and constitution of this country; but there are some offices with regard to which it would be a most important, if not an essential, qualification that the young men appointed to them should have seen something of the actual working of the English constitution, and should have been impressed by its working, as anyone must be who resides for any time in this great political society. Under any new regulations which may be made under this clause it will, therefore, be expedient to provide that natives appointed to certain places shall have some personal knowledge of the working of English institutions. I would, however, by no means make this a general condition, for there are many places in the Covenanted Service of India for which natives are perfectly competent without the necessity of visiting this country; and I believe that by competitive examinations conducted at Calcutta, or even by pure selection, it will be quite possible for the Indian Government to secure able, excellent, and efficient administrators. As to the effect of this change on the policy which led to the throwing open the Civil Service of India for public competition in this country, I would desire to call attention to the real history and origin of that system. Those of your Lordships who are acquainted with Indian affairs are aware that, in fact, the government, though long nominally in the hands of the Company, has been practically, ever since the great Parliamentary contest of 1783-4, the government of the Crown. Mr. Pitt was violently abused by the Old Whig party of that day for having opposed Mr. Fox's Bill, and for having after all adopted its principle—namely, the subjection of the government of India to the control of the Home Government. The truth is, however, that Mr Pitt objected, not to that subjection, but to the subjection also of the commerce and patronage of India to the government of the Crown, and in his own Bill he subjected the government in all its political relations to the absolute authority of the Crown. The Crown has been responsible for every act done, or not done, ever since the great statute of 1803; and I venture to say that, in name as well as in fact, the government of India would long before have been declared to be the government of the Crown but for the difficulty arising out of the commerce and patronage of the Company. The Company, as your Lordships are aware, was deprived of its commerce by the Acts of 1813 and 1833; and when the succeeding twenty years had expired, and the Government of Lord Aberdeen had to consider what was called the renewal of the Charter, it was also considered, whether it would not be expedient to assume at once, in name as well as in reality, the government of India as the government of the Crown. I well remember the discussions at that time; and I venture to say the main difficulty in our way was this,—we did not know how to get rid of the patronage of the Company after it should have been removed from the Directors. It was found that to open it to free competition was the only expedient. There was, indeed, no alternative, for Parliament—with, perhaps, almost too much jealousy, through the ancient echoes still ringing in the ears of men on that subject—would not have tolerated the exercise of that patronage directly by the Crown, and if not by the Crown, by whom could it be exercised? It was, therefore, thrown open to competition. What may be the feelings of individual Members of your Lordships' House I do not know, but I confess I have never been such a fanatic in support of competitive examination as to believe that that is the sole or, in all cases, the best method of getting the best men for the public service. But it is an escape from many difficulties; and when you have only a choice of difficulties, competitive examination gives on the whole a much better chance of success than the pure nepotism of the ancient Court of Directors; but the exercise of patronage, where it is wholly removed from the danger of political jobbery or family nepotism, is, perhaps, the very best mode of selecting men for the public service. Now I venture to submit that, as regards the selection of natives for the administration of their country, there is no risk whatever of the Government of India being influenced by political jobbery or family nepotism; and I think, therefore, it is safe and expedient to open the Civil Service of our Indian Empire to selections by the Governor General, under such restrictions as may be laid down in concert with the Government at home. On these grounds, I trust this important change will receive the sanction of Parliament.

Let me now notice one not unimportant fact with regard to this Bill. I have described it as the same Bill as that introduced last Session by my predecessor, and supported by the late Government; but there is an important exception with respect to a particular portion of the Empire of India. The Bill, as introduced by Sir Stafford Northcote, contained a clause enabling the Home Government to erect Bengal, from being a Lieutenant Governorship, into what is called a full Government—that is, having a Governor and Council. I have omitted that clause for reasons which seem to me good and sufficient—for I could scarcely ask Parliament for a power which, in my opinion, ought not to be exercised. The question arose in this way—Your Lordships will remember the painful circumstances attending the Orissa famine;

many thousands of people perished, and the natural conclusion drawn from such a calamity was, that such a thing could not have happened unless there had been something wrong in the machinery of government. That is a conclusion at which men are very apt to jump, but which frequently is quite unfounded. Many thousands of persons perished in the Irish famine, many of them before we knew that famine was prevailing; but no one attributed this to any fault in the machinery of the British Government, and no remedy, therefore, of that nature was proposed. Now, inquiry was instituted into the cause of the Orissa famine, and the result was that many suggestions were made for improving the Government of Bengal. A certain number of persons recommended that the Lieutenant Governorship should be erected into a full Government, and that suggestion was submitted by my predecessor to his own Council at home and to the Government in India, the result being a very interesting volume, which was presented to Parliament last Session, and which presents a very chaos of opinion on that subject. Hardly any two men agree as to the precise modification of the Government, and the proposition to erect Bengal into a full Government is on the one hand strongly opposed by Sir John Lawrence, Sir William Mansfield, Sir Henry Durand, Mr. Strachey, Sir Richard Temple, and Sir William Muir; while, on the other hand, it is supported by some very eminent men, including Mr. Taylor, Mr. Maine, and Mr. Grey, now himself Lieutenant Governor of Bengal. As regards the Council at home, with the exception of three, all of the members are adverse to the proposal. Under such circumstances, it was not, I hope, presumptuous in me to desire to form an opinion of my own from the arguments of those very distinguished men; and I am bound to say that, under existing conditions—I limit myself to that—it seems to me inexpedient to erect Bengal into a full Government. What is the complaint against the existing Government? It is that it is weak. That is an ambiguous word—is it weak in point of physical strength, so that it cannot overtake its work, or is it weak in regard to its authority? Now the evidence is very strong that it is weak as regards mere physical strength, and this kind of weakness we have it in our power to remedy without coming to Parliament for any new power. Measures are now under consideration for that purpose; but the assembling of the heads of departments into a Council to debate the matters which would come before it would not strengthen the physical power of the Government. If it be asked whether it is weak in point of authority, a decided negative must, I think, be given. We must recollect that the very theory of a Lieutenant Governorship is that it represents the authority of the Governor General. The Governor General of India is the Governor of Bombay, the Lieutenant Governor being his deputy; and therefore, as far as authority is concerned, when the latter speaks, he speaks with the authority of the Supreme Government of India. To assemble his heads of departments in a Council would do nothing to strengthen his authority. The real object of the proposal is not to increase the physical strength or authority of the Government, but to give it greater strength to resist the Governor General in his own capital and province. That is not, indeed, the way in which it is put by its supporters, but it is the real gist of their argument; for they say they are over-shadowed by the Governor General, and that when complaints arise they are carried to him, and not to the Lieutenant Governor. But that is a necessary result of the Supreme Government being located in Bengal; and until Parliament come to the conclusion that it should be removed from its ancient capital, and relegated to some other part of India, you cannot by any trick or device prevent people from going at once to the higher authority rather than to the lower — to the Governor General rather than to the Lieutenant Governor. What would be the effect of the change? Merely to increase the friction and tendency to jealousy which may already exist, and so run serious risk of a misunderstanding between the Supreme Government and the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal. I confess I attach great weight to the opinion of those who have been in the position of Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, and have felt the inconveniences which attached to it. We have recently introduced into the Home Council Sir Frederick Halliday, who was Lieutenant Governor during the disastrous period of the mutiny of 1857. He is a man of very great experience and ability, and his decided opinion is that no assistance whatever would be given to the Lieutenant Governor by simply erecting the administrative heads of departments into an Executive Council, allowing them to debate the measures which might come before them. On the other hand, serious inconveniences might arise from two Governments, quasi supreme in their own territories, sitting in the same city, like the two kings of Brentford. Another suggestion has been made which approves itself much more to my judgment; and, if I had trusted entirely to my own judgment, I should have introduced it into the present Bill; but, considering the difference of opinion which prevails on the subject, I desire to wait another year before advising Parliament as to the course it should adopt. But I may mention what I consider might be an expedient course. As matters now stand, the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal has a Legislative Council of his own, and he is also a member of the Supreme Legislative Council of India; but he is not a member of the Supreme Executive Council of India. Business, consequently, which goes to the Supreme Government of India in reference to questions affecting Bengal cannot be made a matter of viva voce explanation between the Lieutenant Governor and the Supreme Government. A whole set of despatches must go from one to the other, though both sit in the same city, and are very much concerned in the same matters. No arrangement can be more inconvenient, and the remedy which Sir Frederick Halliday suggests is to place the Lieutenant Governor in more immediate connection with the Executive Council at Calcutta. Speaking of the tendency to pass over the Lieutenant Governor and go to the Supreme Government, he says—

“This would happen under any constitution of the superior Government, whenever it might be put down permanently over against the subordinate Government, as now in Bengal. Nothing of this would be obviated by any change in the constitution of the Bengal Government. Indeed, a Governor appointed and chosen in England might be more exposed to it than a Governor chosen for his familiarity with the details of Indian administration; and if he had a Council, that would not help him, seeing that Councils do not hinder much occasional soreness, even in the distant Governments of Madras and Bombay. A Council in Bengal pitted against the Council of India, present in the same place, might indeed heighten the turmoil.”

Then, at the close of his Minute he suggests that the Lieutenant Governor should be placed in more immediate connection with the Executive Council, as far, at least, as concerns matters connected with the Bengal Presidency. That arrangement is, no doubt, open to the same objection as the presence of the Minister for the Home Department in meetings of the Cabinet. It may be said that if any complaint were made against the Lieutenant Governor, he would be sitting in the Executive Council as a judge in his own case. In like manner, it may be said that if complaints were made against the Home Secretary, he would be sitting in the Cabinet upon those complaints; but, in point of fact, I have never heard any practical objection to the Minister being there to defend and explain his own conduct. The present arrangement simply leads to the multiplication of that which is the great bane of Governments in India—the unnecessary writing of voluminous despatches when five minutes of conversation between the persons immediately concerned would settle the whole matter. I do not wish to depreciate the habit of recording in Minutes the arguments used on both sides, for I do not know any mode by which persons not conversant with a question are better able to judge of its merits than by reading the Minutes of two able men taking different sides; but there should be a limit to this system, and when important interests—those of the planters, for example—are concerned it is desirable that the authority of the Lieutenant Governor should express not only in name, but in reality, the authority of the Supreme Government of India; and I think you will never effect this unless you bring about a closer union between these two authorities, both sitting in Calcutta.

I have thus stated the plan which seems to me the best, but I do not ask the House to come to any decision this Session on so difficult and important a question. I have therefore struck out the only clause involving serious difference of opinion, and I venture to think that the Bill, having for its two main objects the increase of the power of the Executive Government as regards legislation for the non-regulation provinces and the abolition of the monopoly of Europeans through the door of the competitive examination for the Civil Service of India, will receive the assent of your

Lordships' House and of the House of Commons.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."

LORD LYVEDEN said, he anticipated very little opposition to the first part of the Bill, for it gave greater power to the Governor General than he had hitherto been able to exercise—a course recommended by Lord Ellenborough and other high authorities. With the Governor General rested the main responsibility, and with him ought to rest the main power. He also approved the change with regard to the non-regulation provinces; and the rectification of the blunders of previous Acts could excite no difference of opinion. The novelty of the Bill was that relating to the appointment of natives to employment in the Civil Service of India without competitive examination. He had never been a strong advocate for that system in this country; but in India he thought it less calculated to draw out the qualifications for Indian Service than any other that could be devised. The questions sometimes asked by the Examiners were almost ludicrous. Moral qualities were required far more than intellectual ones, and the former no competitive examination could ascertain. His noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll), however, would, he believed, find himself mistaken if he went back to the declarations of 1833, and imagined that the natives would be satisfied with the proposal he had now made. There might not be political jobbery or nepotism, but there were other influences which might guide the Government of India in making appointments, and natives would not feel themselves in the same position as Europeans who came out after a competitive examination. On the other hand, a European, having passed an examination, and deeming that he had an inchoate right to an appointment, might find, on his arrival, that the post had been already filled by the appointment of a native. He could not understand why competitive examinations should not be carried on in India, and why the successful competitors should not be sent, if necessary, here to learn English customs and institutions. The only reason he had heard urged against a mixed competition was that the natives were extremely precocious in the early stages of their life, and by their quickness and knowledge, would beat Europeans, and that it would be unfair to the latter to subject them to such competition. As to the nine scholarships proposed by Sir John Lawrence, that would have been a very inadequate arrangement. He thought the noble Duke had been well advised in omitting from this Bill the clause relating to the Lieutenant Governorship of Bengal, which had formed part of the measure proposed by his predecessor last year. But the other Bill proposed by Sir Stafford Northcote—which was a measure of far greater importance than the present, inasmuch as it would completely alter the whole constitution of the Government of India—had failed to get through the other House. It did not, indeed, go so far as the Bill he (Lord Lyveden) prepared by desire of Lord Palmerston and as a Member of his Government; but he hoped the noble Duke would introduce it in their Lordships' House, and carry it on pari passu with the present Bill. The Bill altered the constitution of the Council in a most proper manner. It had been too much the practice to select as Members of the Council men who had left India many years and who had forgotten all about it; and it would be expedient to provide that no one should hereafter be appointed who had left India more than five years. In the discussion upon Sir Stafford Northcote's Bill it was suggested that the Under Secretary of State for India should sit in the Council and have a voice in it; and that would be an important alteration, because any Minister in either House of Parliament who had had an opportunity of taking part in the discussions of the Council would be all the more competent to grapple with Indian subjects in debate. He was justified in drawing attention to the omission of the Bill for altering the constitution of the Council, because the noble Duke had himself invited the discussion, and the question agitated people in India, and they were looking forward to a change, not only in the direction of economy, but also in the rapidity and efficiency of general administration. He could not help thinking it would be better if the number of the Council were limited to eight or ten, instead of fifteen, because with fewer Members there would be less discussion and equal efficiency in business. He wished there had been something in the Bill in relation to the rendering of accounts in a more perfect form. The accounts were getting more intricate and involved every year, and the Estimates sent home were getting more and more fallacious. Whether this was to be remedied by Act of Parliament, or by an instruction from the noble Duke, though such instruction had hitherto failed, was perhaps a matter for consideration. The Estimates sent home last year appeared to have been a complete delusion on the wrong side; for, instead of there being a surplus, there was a deficiency. Another matter which ought to be discussed was our relation with the tribes of Afghanistan; and, as we had acknowledged a Sovereign, it was important it should be known how far we were committed to maintaining him on the throne, lest we should, to use words rendered classical by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, "drift into war." He was not an alarmist respecting the apprehended invasion of India by Russia, but the general question was a large one; and the production of the Papers recording what had passed between the Indian Government and the tribes of Afghanistan would communicate much valuable information.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I should be sorry not to avail myself of this opportunity of acknowledging the ability and interest of the speech made by the noble Duke, and the value of the Bill which he has laid upon the table. The only difficulty I find in criticizing that Bill and speech is, that I almost entirely agree with them. I believe the step taken by the noble Duke, in extending the power of the Governor General in matters of legislation, is eminently a step in the right direction, and that the experience of English statesmen will lead them to extend that power still further. I believe no greater mistake has been made of recent years, in regard to Indian matters, than that of thinking we could produce a copy of the English Constitution in India. If you wish to govern Asiatics in a manner conformable to their opinions and interests, you must govern them Asiatically; and the cumbersome system which we, in obedience to our instincts, have adopted for guarding the interests of all in the progress of legislation, is utterly unsuited to their feelings, and only tends to hinder the progress of government. In the discussions that have arisen in regard to the popularity of the English rule in India, no reproach has been addressed to us more often than that we have attempted to govern India by refined but cumbersome and tardy methods, which the natives would gladly exchange for more rapid, though, perhaps, ruder justice. Therefore, I am glad to see that the noble Duke is tending towards a more despotic ideal of management; and I trust that, when we get free from some superstitions of public opinion which have hampered us during the last generation or two, we shall extend the despotic idea a little further, and shall confine our attempts to imitate European institutions to those places where the European population is in the majority. Another most important matter is the admission of natives to employments under the Government of India. I think that the plan of the noble Duke contained in this Bill is, I believe, the most satisfactory solution of a very difficult question, and is infinitely better than the system of appointment by competition. The evil of that is two-fold—if it fails, as it hitherto has done, and the natives do not take advantage of your competitive system, then they blame you for having excited their hopes, and, as they think, acted with duplicity; if it succeed you give them vested rights in the offices which they come to hold, and that, in time of trouble, may expose you to dangers on which I should hardly venture here to enlarge, but which must spontaneously suggest themselves. Therefore it is far better that natives should be appointed on the exclusive responsibility of the Governor General; and I do hope the noble Duke will not consider it necessary to fetter the discretion of the Governor General too much in that respect, or to do anything that shall cause him to hesitate in the trial of the new system. Whatever is done must, of course, be done slowly and tentatively. There are two dangers to avoid—if you are too careless you may appoint men educated and competent, but in their hearts not loyal to your rule; and, on the other hand, while you may obtain natives loyal to your rule, the differences of race, which we can hardly appreciate here, but which exercise so strong an influence in India, may arouse jealousies between civil servants which may render it impossible for natives and Europeans to work harmoniously in the same office. One of the most serious dangers you have to guard against is the possibility of jealousy arising from the introduction of natives into the service. There is one point in the speech of the noble Duke against which I wish to enter my protest. He seemed to think that the only way in which we could fulfil our pledge was by admitting natives to the direct service of the Crown. My belief is that the true way to admit the natives of India to a just share in the Indian Government is to maintain the native Sovereignities which we protect, because in the management of these Sovereignities the natives participate according to their own ideas of government, in the way they best understand, and which is, therefore, best calculated to promote the equality and efficiency which we have in view. One of the main arguments against annexation, and in favour of the policy of maintaining those native States which still remain, is that by so doing you are able to gratify the ambition of those natives of India who feel themselves fit for political offices, and that you are thus able to repudiate the reproach that you are barring out the fields of patronage by the barriers of caste or race. I believe that such a policy would be suicidal, and by abstaining from interference with the native Princes who still remain you will be saved from the reproach. The only other point connected with the policy of this Bill was a point, if I may use the Hibernicism, relating to matters not in the Bill. There is no doubt that the question of the Governorship of Bengal is a very knotty one, and I think that the noble Duke has adopted the right course. The truth is that you cannot leave the Lieutenant Governor where he is. He is either too big or not big enough. The original idea with which it was suggested that the Governorship of Bengal should be erected was to avoid the necessity of putting an English statesman in that position, and thus to avoid the occurrence of an evil which was strongly experienced at the time of the Orissa famine. But the objection was well-founded that you could not have a Lieutenant Governor independent of the Governor General without introducing an amount of disagreement which had in former times been so fatal to Bengal. If ever the question of a Governor of Bengal is to be taken up, it must be when you have solved the difficulty about what is to be the capital of India, and when you have determined not to throw away the lives of the ablest of your servants in India by placing them in the most unhealthy station to be found in that country. When you have attained to that stage of administrative wisdom, then will be the time for attempting a settlement of this question. In the meantime, I think the course adopted by the Government is the right one. One subject still remains, which was referred to by the noble Lord the former President of the Board of Control (Lord Lyveden)—the composition of the Council in England. I earnestly wish that the noble Duke would address himself to that question. It is very disagreeable to discuss the qualifications of gentlemen in their absence, especially as those gentlemen are well known for the earnestness of their conduct in the service of the Crown. But there is no doubt that you do require a certain number of men—when India is changing from day to day—who know what India is rather than what India was, and to do this you must introduce a new system of election into the Council. Whether this is to be done by introducing retirement after a certain time, or by fixing an age beyond which a Member should be ineligible to sit in the Council, or by compelling resignation at the will of the Secretary of State,—in one way or another you must promote a more rapid circulation of Members, for there is not enough of new blood in the Council of India. I cannot, however, agree in thinking that the Council ought to be entirely composed of gentlemen who have recently been in employment under the Government of India. I believe the noble Duke will hear more about that to-morrow; but I believe the noble Duke agrees on the necessity of representing the commercial element in the Indian Council. It is perfectly impossible that the proper importance can attach to the measures adopted in relation to the commercial and mercantile interests unless those interests are represented in the Council, and able to discuss those measures. There is another point to which I will refer. I confess I should like to have seen more power given to the Governor

General, and I should like to see a clause inserted in the Bill providing that, whenever the Secretary of State should be of opinion that any measure proposed before him was necessary for securing the welfare, safety, and tranquillity of India, he might on his own authority adopt and carry it into execution—only in such case that he should also notify the fact to the two Houses of Parliament. I believe that the tutelage in which the Secretary of State is held by his Council is injurious to the good government of India. It is perfectly true, in reference to such matters as railway guarantees and other commercial affairs of that kind, the veto of the Council is occasionally a protection; but with that solitary exception I believe that the principle upon which Lord Palmerston acted in 1858 was a sound one—that the responsibility should lie in the Minister of the Crown, and in the Minister of the Crown alone. And it must be remembered that this curious machinery of the Council, so strangely selected and endowed with such anomalous powers, was not adopted because it was believed to be the best plan that could be devised, but as a compromise to get rid of the opposition of the old East India Company. They have had ten years of their compromise, and the time has at length come to reconsider it. I think we may fairly ask whether the ordinary rules of our Constitution ought not to be put in practice, and whether we ought not to place in the Secretary of State alone that responsibility which is borne by every other Minister of the Crown? I hope, at all events, that the noble Duke will not allow the Session to pass away without clearing up the mystery which enables the Council, under cover of vetoing money questions, to interfere with every other measure on the plea that it involved money considerations, and which, in fact, makes them an incubus upon the Minister. It is not enough to say that they will not exercise the veto except upon extraordinary occasions. The very fact that they can exercise it imposes a check upon the action of the Secretary of State to which he ought not to be subjected, and the power of veto ought to be confined to money measures alone. I think that the time has now arrived when legislation on this subject may safely be attempted, and I feel convinced that Parliament will support the noble Duke in any endeavour which he may make. I entirely assent to the changes which the noble Duke proposes, and I think they indicate the policy in which the statesmen who succeed him will have to go further than he has gone, and that the removal of so many of the old prejudices on this question is full of happy omen for the future good government of India.

LORD HOUGHTON: I very deeply regret, my Lords, the embarrassments that seem to have attended the new Government of India ever since its construction. It would be impossible for any man who considers the question as it came before Parliament some years ago, in the different relations both as regarded the Government of England and the Government of India, and the Government of India and the natives of that country, not to feel that we were entering upon so difficult and dangerous a problem that we required to be guided by almost superhuman wisdom and superhuman knowledge. We are here in this position—that it is impossible for any man—even for my noble Friend opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury)—to speak upon this question without falling into a series of contradictions. My noble Friend evidently desires that there should be no limitation placed upon the power of the English Secretary of State for India, because he says it is advisable that he should act with the same independence that other Ministers do. From that we are to understand that the Secretary of State residing in this country—a Gentleman who probably knows no more about India than any one of us can learn by our own political study and our own political thought—should be invested with what may be called the supreme power of the Government of India. At the same time my noble Friend says he desires to see India governed in India, and not from England. Every measure which tends to separate the Government of India from the Government of England, and to enable the Government of India to be carried on by those who alone can understand the subject, will meet with my cordial assent; and, therefore, I cannot but think that Parliament has done wisely in giving the Secretary of State for India a Council composed of men who have that peculiar knowledge of the country that those alone can have who have been in direct communication with the natives of India. But the question now before your Lordships is complicated to such a degree that I do not feel competent to solve it. When the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) intimates that he intends to introduce into the Government of India the natives of India to an extent that has not hitherto been adopted, I would remark that, if he means to do so, he must set about it in some other way than that which would destroy whatever good has come from the present system of competition in England. I confess, at the same time, that I never could see the advantage to the public service of giving appointments in India to young men merely because they had undergone a severe intellectual test, while they might not have any moral capabilities at all. I do not believe that the present Governors of India possess any great superiority over those who filled the same positions in former times. No doubt, in former times, young men were put forward and selected for appointments in India because it was believed that they had qualifications which would fit them for the public service in that country; and, therefore, I very much doubt that your modern competitive examination gives you anything like so good a knowledge of the staple qualifications of the men you send to India as you had in old times. But the question is, can we exclude natives altogether? I believe it is not possible to do so. We might wish to govern India entirely by Englishmen; but education is spreading there, and we cannot in India act in contradiction to that policy of extending self-government on which we are acting in all our other possessions. I only hope the noble Duke feels the magnitude of the change which he calls on us to bring about. He is now about to have carried out for the first time the principle stated in that magnificent, but hitherto futile, declaration in which it was stated that the government of India would be conducted without reference to differences of race. I hope my noble Friend will be able to adapt that principle to the exigencies of the Government in India, and that he may be able to bring about a large admission of natives; but how to do this under present circumstances is to me an enigma. That something must be done is certain; but I would ask your Lordships to remember the difficulties of the case. They cannot be exaggerated. It is difficult to see how natives and Englishmen can work together in one service, differing as they do in religion, customs, and modes of thought. It is only a few years ago that this happened—so simple a post as that of surgeon to one of our regiments having been put up to competition it was assigned to a native; but my noble Friend (Lord Halifax) who was then Minister for India, felt himself unable to make the appointment. It was apprehended that the appointment of a native would provoke such a spirit of mutiny in the regiment that my noble Friend thought it would be better even to do an injustice to the individual than to run the risk of the consequences which might follow from his appointment. There is another point which I would ask the noble Duke to explain a little more fully. How will you combine this arbitrary power in the hands of the Governor General with the competitive system in this country? Are there certain appointments to be given without competition, but on the arbitrary judgment of the Governor General, and are there other appointments which will be competed for in England? Some of the difficulties in this matter the noble Duke will, doubtless, be able to explain away; but I fear there are others which, with all his power, he will be forced to leave behind.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE quite concurred in the provisions of the Bill. Any legislation which tended to strengthen the hands of the Governor General of India was, in his opinion, legislation in the right direction. As regarded the last clause, admitting natives to the Covenanted Service, the men recently appointed had been introduced on that system; but he could not but remark that in his experience the competitive system, which had been some time on its trial, had not produced such able servants for India as the old patronage system did. He therefore thought it better to have the appointments made in the way provided by this Bill than to have them made by competition to take place at Calcutta or in London. He did not know whether the noble Duke was aware how comparatively few natives there were in the Uncovenanted Service. In that service, out of 2,000 officials, only fifteen natives held appointments of a salary of £1,000 a year; and in the other appointments there were six Europeans to one native. This seemed to him a very large disproportion, and either the Government of India had no disposition to encourage the employment of natives, or there was the greatest difficulty in finding natives capable of filling appointments. When he was in India he knew natives who filled the office of deputy-magistrate. If the system of competition were introduced in India they would have clever Bengalees from the College at Calcutta who would distance all competitors. Now, it was quite notorious that a Bengalee might do very well for a deputy-magistrate, but his habits disqualified him for the higher offices of the Civil Service. If the seniority principle were adopted, natives would rise pari passu with Europeans, and the Governor-General knowing that a European would be the better man, for—say such an office as that of Zillah Judge—a difficulty would arise, unless the Governor General had the power of appointing an European over his head. Everyone must see that in the present state of public opinion, it would be impossible to keep natives out of the Civil Service. We must admit them, and he thought the plan of admitting them embodied in this Bill was better than that which had been proposed elsewhere—namely, to admit them by competitive examination.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET rose to make one suggestion. This was the first time the Secretary for India had a seat in their Lordships' House. He therefore asked his noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll) whether he would, in the course of the Session, favour the House with a statement regarding the finances of India? It was said that the Indian Budgets brought forward in the other House were works of imagination rather than financial accounts. Perhaps it might seem to trench on the privileges of the other House; but as no money was voted when the Indian Budget was brought forward, there would perhaps be no difficulty if the noble Duke were to favour their Lordships' House with a general survey of the state of affairs in India.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, his noble Friend (Lord Lyveden) had asked how far we had committed ourselves by our acknowledgment of the present Ruler of Afghanistan, and to what extent we had engaged ourselves to maintain him the throne. In answer to his noble Friend he (the Duke of Argyll) had to say that the money and arms given to the Ameer of Cabul was simply a present. No conditions whatever had been made with the Ameer. The Ameer asked the Government for assistance, in consequence of his having lost much of his revenue in the war, and the money was given to him as a present. The Government in India and the Government at Home were free to take in the future whatever course might be best for our own interests and those of Cabul. He wished to direct the attention of the noble Lord to the wording of the provisions of the Act of 1833. He was not defending that clause, because he thought that the abstract declarations of principles in Acts of Parliament were extremely inconvenient and, for the most part, impolitic, as leading to expectations which never could be wholly fulfilled, and which were always liable to be quoted against this country with amplifications which were never intended by Parliament. It was on this account that he was opposed to the promises being made which were contained in the Queen's Proclamation issued under Lord Derby's Government at the time that the Crown assumed the nominal government of India. He thought that Proclamation contained abstract declarations of principle which had been found exceedingly inconvenient, and which had been frequently quoted against us in regard to cases to which they were never intended to apply. Nevertheless, he was of opinion that the declaration contained in the Act of 1833 ought to be adhered to as far as possible. As the law stood, no office or place under the Company—and of course the Crown now stood in the place of the Company—could be shut to natives of India merely because they were natives. Of course, there were many offices of which it might be said that they could not be filled by natives, such as great administrative offices. He entirely assented to the general principle laid down by his noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury)—namely, that it was not only our duty to ourselves, but to India also, to maintain our dominion in that country, and to take no steps that endangered the dominion except such as must lead, in the long run, to the complete education of the people. In the meantime, however, we were not bound to employ natives who were not loyal to ourselves. As regards the powers of the Council, he could assure his noble Friend that the attention he had been able to pay to that subject showed him that his noble Friend laboured under an erroneous impression concerning it. The Secretary of State was absolutely supreme on financial matters. He had the whole control of the Secret Committee and, besides that, in all matters of policy, including even taxation, it was perfectly competent for him to over-rule the opinions of his Council. That he believed to be the interpretation of the law, and he was not aware of any case in which the Council had set up its authority in opposition to the will of the Secretary of State. Even in the great Mysore case, which involved the sacrifice of a large amount of revenue, no suggestion had ever been made that the Secretary of State was incompetent to deal with it upon his sole authority. With regard to the question of the noble Lord, who had just sat down, as to whether the clause he had referred to was to be a dead letter, he must express his opinion that such would not be the case, although, at the same time, they ought to proceed very carefully with regard to it. The safer plan would be to lay down some system of selection with regard to the natives. He could conceive no motives which could possibly bias to an injurious degree the authority of the Government of India in the selection of natives. It was most improper that the Government of India should be restrained by law from selecting natives to fill offices the duties of which they were thoroughly competent to discharge. With regard to what was very erroneously called "the Indian Budget," which, in fact, was no budget at all, but simply a statement of the position of the finances of India, hitherto it had been made in the House of Commons, and he had no doubt that the House of Commons would require his hon. Friend who represented the Indian Department there to make that statement in that House; but their Lordships were perfectly entitled to have another statement upon the subject made to them. He intended, with their Lordships' permission, at the proper time to lay before them a statement respecting the Indian finances.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday the 5th of April.

TITHE RENT-CHARGES (IRELAND.)

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK, in moving for a Return of all tithe rent-charges sold in the Landed Estates Court, Ireland, said, it appeared probable that a measure having for its object to make great changes in the position of the Established Church of Ireland would come before their Lordships during the present Session, and he thought it was of importance that all the information that could be obtained both as to the income of that Church and as to the amount of capital represented by that income, should be in their possession. The Report of the Royal Commission gave very full details as to the income of the Irish Church, and from that Report he found that the net annual income of that Church, including the net annual value in houses and land amounted to £616,840, of which the tithe rent-charge was £364,224. The object of the Return for which he moved was to put their Lordships into possession of some information as to the capital represented by the tithe rent-charge. There was a considerable portion of the tithe rent-charges in the hands of private owners, many of which had been sold at different times through the Landed Estates Court, and the price there obtained for them would afford a fair criterion for ascertaining the value of those in the hands of the Church. They differed in nothing except in the fact of their being in private hands from the tithe rent-charges in the possession of the Church. The noble Earl concluded by moving for—

Return of all tithe rent-charges sold in the Encumbered and the Landed Estates Courts, Ireland, specifying in each case,

1. Date of sale: 2. Amount of rent-charge: 3. Whence accruing: 4. Price for which sold: 5. How many times the amount of each rent-charge the price is equal to.

LORD DUFFERIN said, there was no objection to granting the Returns asked for by the noble Earl, provided he would be content to take them a little short of perfect accuracy. To give the exact Returns asked for would involve the examination of upwards of 6,000 rentals, and would occasion a great deal of delay, and a considerable amount of expense. The expense and delay would be all the more unnecessary as he understood that ample materials were already in existence for substantially affording the noble Earl the information for which he had asked. He supposed that in those Returns should be included the amount of tithe rent-charge sold, not only in the Landed Estates Court, but in the Encumbered Estates Court.

Motion agreed to.

SALMON FISHERIES (SCOTLAND).

ADDRESS FOR A RETURN.

LORD ABINGER said, that the Motion with which he should conclude differed slightly from that which he had placed on the Paper, as he had been informed that the information first asked for could not be given. Possibly some difficulty might arise in giving a Return where the valuation rolls had not been made up for ten years—in that case, he proposed that Returns should be given for the number of years with regard to which the roll did exist. As their Lordships might be aware, last week he had the honour of heading a deputation to the Home Office upon this subject, and on that occasion he stated the desire of the Scotch proprietors that there should be an amendment of the law, particularly in reference to the inspectors. There were inspectors in England and also in Ireland, but there were none in Scotland, and it would be impossible to carry out the provisions of the Act unless inspectors were appointed, and he hoped Her Majesty's Government would bring in a Bill to amend the Act of 1862, and from the answer he had received from the Home Secretary he had hopes that that would be done. He would therefore now ask whether Her Majesty's Government have considered the subject, and if there is any prospect of a Bill being introduced? The noble Lord then moved an Address for—

“Return of the rent or value of the stake or bag-net fishings in Scotland as the same appear in the valuation roll of the counties or burghs within which such fishings are situate, with their rental for each year as shown in the valuation rolls for the last ten years.”

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, there was no objection to the Return in the amended form. Of course, the Return could only be for the number of years during which the valuation roll had existed. With regard to the Question of the noble Lord, he could only say that he was not in a position to be able to give him any definite answer.

AND MURRAY.—QUESTION.

MR. T. POTTER said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to the following statement, published as correspondence in a London newspaper on the 25th February, and signed "G. A." :—

"Messrs. Bidwell and Murray, together with their legal confederate and another false witness of notoriously infamous character, also hired with public money, fabricated an ex parte statement to deceive the Law Officers of the late Government, and I was in consequence fined £2,000, which money Messrs. Bidwell, Murray, and Company divided between them."

He wished to inquire what truth there is in such allegation?

MR. OTWAY said, in reply, that his attention had been called to the statement which the hon. Gentleman had just read to the House, and he was not sorry that his hon. Friend had noticed the matter, for it seemed to him that when charges were brought against public men in the discharge of their duties it was within the walls of Parliament that those charges should be made and met. He did not understand that his hon. Friend identified himself in any way with the statement he had read, and, therefore, he must say that the value of a statement of that nature depended very much on the character of the person from whom it emanated. With regard to the statement itself, he had no hesitation in saying that from beginning to end it was utterly untrue. There were no clerks in the Foreign Office—if they were so minded—who had the power to use the public money in order to hire persons to deceive the Law Officers of the Government, nor had they any power to inflict fines of £2,000, or any other amount. Consequently, it was impossible that a fine of £2,000 inflicted by them should have been divided among themselves. Now, with regard to the gentlemen themselves whose names had been thus brought into prominence, he might remind his hon. Friend that during the last Parliament a statement not so precise, but somewhat similar in character, was made in that House against Mr. Murray, Assistant Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) said of that statement that it was simply and absolutely without foundation. [Lord Stanley: Hear, hear!] And Mr. Layard, who followed, said that Mr. Murray's character stood too high to be affected by any charge of the nature alluded to. Now, he (Mr. Otway) must in justice say of Mr. Murray that he had served in the Foreign Office for forty-three years, having commenced his career under Mr. Canning, and served under the various Secretaries of State of that Department up to the present time, that he was Assistant Under Secretary of State in 1858, and therefore served under Lord Malmesbury, Lord Clarendon, Lord Russell, and the noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley), and Lord Clarendon again, Mr. Layard, Mr. Egerton, and himself. He therefore thought the character of Mr. Murray might safely be left to the appreciation of those Gentlemen whom he had named; but for himself he felt bound to say—having known Mr. Murray for upwards of twenty years—that he was convinced that Mr. Murray was perfectly incapable of the conduct with which he had been charged. As for Mr. Bidwell, his family had been connected with the Foreign Office for a century, and himself for twenty-seven years, and he had written to him (Mr. Otway) to say that there was no foundation whatever for the charge, and that this was the first time, during the period he had been in the public service, that his public honour had been called in question. He therefore hoped the House would agree with him in thinking the statement in question utterly unworthy of any further notice.

SIONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland,

What course Her Majesty's Government intend to adopt with reference to the appointment of Commissioners or Inspectors of Irish Fisheries?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. SULLIVAN) was understood to say, that it was his intention to bring in a Bill on the subject, and he would then state what the intentions of the Government were with regard to the appointment of commissioners or inspectors.

INDIA—PUNJAUB TENANCY ACT.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, To lay before the House a Copy of the Despatch of the Secretary of State for India to the Governor General of India, with reference to the Act passed by the Governor General of India in Council, on the 1st October, 1868, entitled, the Punjaub Tenancy Act?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, I cannot do what my hon. Friend wishes, because no such Despatch exists. A Despatch on the Punjaub Tenancy Bill was drawn last November, but it was cancelled by the then Secretary of State in Council, and never went to India.

TASMANIA—PUBLIC WORSHIP.

QUESTION.

MR. C. REED said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether an Act passed by the Legislature of Tasmania in 1868, entitled "An Act to provide for the commutation of the sum of £15,000 a year reserved by the Constitutional Act for Public Worship in Tasmania," by which Act the sum of £100,000 is to be paid out of the Revenue of the Colony to the religious denominations willing to receive it—besides paying reduced annuities to the governing bodies of several of those denominations for existing incumbents—in the following proportions viz.—Church of England, £58,466 13s. 4d.; Church of Scotland, £7,866 13s. 4d.; Church of Rome, £23,106 13s. 4d.; Wesleyan Church, £7,333 6s. 8d.; Free Church of Scotland, £2,806 13s. 4d.; Jewish Church, £420—total, £100,000—has received the Royal Assent; and, if not, whether Her Majesty will be advised to give her assent to that Measure?

MR. MONSELL said, in reply, that in the year 1854, by the Constitutional Act of Tasmania, £15,000 a year was appropriated for public worship. In the year 1862 an Act was passed for the purpose of distributing that sum among the different religious bodies in proportion to their numbers, as taken at the last Census. The object of the Act to which the hon. Gentleman referred was to commute that payment of £15,000 annually by one sum of £100,000, to be distributed according to the numbers of each denomination as returned by the last Census. Tasmania, as his hon. Friend was aware, was a colony having representative institutions and a responsible Government; this was not an Imperial but a local matter, and therefore quite within the competence of the colony. That was the reason why Her Majesty had given her sanction to the Act.

LOAN SOCIETIES—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a Letter upon Loan Societies, addressed by Mr. Tidd Pratt to the Magistrate of the Westminster Police Court, in which he uses the expression, "I consider these Societies as perfect swindles;" whether he accords with this opinion, or considers the condemnation too general; and, whether the Government propose to take any, and, if so, what course upon the matter?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, it was only within the last few days that his attention had been directed to the subject, and the answers to the inquiries he had made had not been very satisfactory. At the same time, they were not such as would justify him in adopting the energetic language of Mr. Tidd Pratt. If further inquiry should prove the justice of the character given by Mr. Tidd Pratt of those societies, it would, of course, be the duty of the Government to adopt measures for altering the Act which regulates them.

COLLECTION OF ASSESSED TAXES.

QUESTION.

MR. MONK said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government has taken into consideration the often expressed opinion of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, that advantage would accrue to the Revenue by the transfer of the Assessed Taxes from the hands of Parochial Officers to the sole management and collection of the Department of Inland Revenue; and, if so, whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any Measure to effect that object?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in reply, that he had already stated, in answer to his hon. Friend the Member for Walsall (Mr. C. Forster), that he entirely agreed in opinion with those who objected to the present mode of collection. Having made that statement, and having now repeated it, he hoped his hon. Friend would so far moderate his zeal as to allow him his own time and his own way to effect the object in view.

IRELAND—CHURCH PROPERTY.

QUESTION.

MR. CORRANCE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will furnish to the House the sums respectively apportioned (out of the proposed sequestration of Church property — viz., £1,100,000) to Presbyterian purposes and the College of Maynooth; and, the specific uses and future purposes for which such sums are intended to provide?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, with respect to the uses and purposes for which these sums to be apportioned to the Presbyterians and Maynooth are intended I can only refer the hon. Member to the expressions in the Bill; for Her Majesty's Government have embodied in those expressions all that they have, as at present advised, thought expedient, or desirable with respect to these purposes. As far as Maynooth is concerned the matter is perfectly simple. There is nothing to do except to take the sum granted annually out of the Consolidated Fund and multiply it by fourteen. It is also a perfectly simple matter to obtain the precise amount, which is a very small amount, of a debt now due on the part of the College of Maynooth to the Board of Works in Ireland, which I mentioned in my opening statement on the Irish Church. But with regard to the main portions of this question, the only information that could be supplied to the hon. Member would be a Return of the sums voted last year or proposed to be voted this year for the Presbyterians, because the Government is not in possession of data that would enable them to present a precise computation of the amount. They depend, for example, on the ages of the Presbyterian clergy, and we are not in possession of the age of each Presbyterian clergyman, nor could we with propriety well call upon those gentlemen to return their ages. Therefore the hon. Gentleman will see that precise information cannot be given. Something over £700,000, or between that and £750,000, I have little doubt, is the sum that will go to the Presbyterians under this arrangement, and the annual amounts voted can be easily obtained if the hon. Member wishes for them.

METROPOLIS—SEMAPHORE NEAR PALACE YARD.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN DAWSON-DAMER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether that structure called a semaphore, on the crossing near the Houses of Parliament, is conducive to the safety of the public; and, if not, whether he will give instructions for its removal? It was his intention, at an early day, to make some observations relative to the so-called fountain at the corner of Great George Street, Westminster.

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that before the commencement of every Session an order was issued to the Chief Commissioner of Police requiring him to take measures to secure convenient access to the House for hon. Members, and also for their safety. Up to this time the method adopted had been to station at the principal crossings policemen, who endeavoured, at very great risk to themselves, to stop the great mass of vehicles sometimes collected in those thoroughfares, so as to allow of safe transit. During the last Session a policeman died of the injuries he received at one of those crossings, and two Members of Parliament were knocked down. He understood that the signal which was intended to obviate these dangers, by giving better notice to vehicles than could be afforded by the out-stretched arms of a single policeman, had been partially successful. The signal was obeyed by the drivers of omnibuses and cabs, who were familiar with it, and it was beginning to be obeyed by the less intelligent drivers of other vehicles. The general result was that although the signal had not been completely successful, yet, in the opinion of the district superintendent, it conduced considerably to the convenience and safety of the public, and that officer was so strongly impressed with its advantages that he recommended its adoption in other districts. For himself, he hoped that it would prove useful; for he could not venture to assert that it was ornamental.

COAL MINES—REPORTS OF INSPECTORS.—QUESTION.

MR. DIMSDALE said, in the absence of his hon. Friend (Mr. Greene) he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will cause the Reports of the Inspectors of Coal Mines for the past year to be laid upon the Table of the House, in order that Members may read them before the promised measure with reference to accidents in Coal Mines comes under discussion?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that these Reports had been already sent in, and he hoped that the whole of them might be published within the next month—a very much earlier period than usual. Recognizing the importance of having the Reports printed at an early date, the Government hoped they might be able by dint of pressure to lay them on the table soon.

DISTRICT MEDICAL OFFICERS (BIRMINGHAM)—QUESTION.

MR. DAVENPORT said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether it is true that the Birmingham Guardians of the Poor have cut down the number of the District Medical Officers from eight to five, thereby giving to each District Medical Officer an average population of 45,000; whether any Memorial of the 20th day of February 1869 has been sent in from the Medical Practitioners of Birmingham protesting against this alteration; whether the Birmingham Branch of the British Medical Association have sent in a similar Memorial; and, whether he will lay upon the Table a Copy of such Memorial and the Correspondence that has passed between the Guardians and the Poor Law Board?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, it was so far true that the Birmingham Board of Guardians had cut down the number of their district medical officers from eight to five—that at the election which was held lately they elected only five of those officers instead of the eight they formerly had. But the question was by no means settled as between the Poor Law Board and the Birmingham Guardians. Remonstrances had been made against the proposed alteration of these numbers; and a letter was addressed in consequence by the Poor Law Board to the Birmingham Guardians, asking for an explanation of the grounds of the alteration. The Guardians did not answer that letter, but on the 4th of March they elected five instead of eight district medical officers. On the 6th of March the Poor Law Board wrote to them again, asking for an explanation of that election having been held notwithstanding its previous letter, and in that later communication the Poor Law Board said it was at a loss to know what were the grounds on which the proposed reduction in the number of district medical officers rested, and stating that, the Board must refuse its sanction to that reduction unless it could be satisfactorily shown that the duties of the district medical officers had very materially diminished. That reduction had however been made, and officially the Poor Law Board had no information of the circumstances; but he was informed that while the district medical officers had been reduced from eight to five, their salaries had been increased from £150 to £200, and a public vaccinator—whose duties were previously performed by the district medical officers—had been appointed; so that the reduction in the number was rather from eight to six than from eight to five. However, unless good grounds were shown for the alteration, it would not be sanctioned by the Poor Law Board. The Memorial received on the subject from the Council of the Birmingham Branch of the British Medical Association alleged that the proposed reduction was contrary to the interests of the poor and of the medical profession. It was, however, not with its bearing on the interests of the medical profession so much as with its bearing on the interests of the poor that the Guardians and the Poor Law Board were properly concerned.

IRELAND—MURDER OF MR. ANKETELL.
QUESTION.

MR. WINGFIELD VERNER said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, in consequence of the letter of the Rev. Mr. Reichel, Vicar of Mullingar, in the public press, stating that Mr. Anketell, the station master, had for some time known that he was "a marked man," and had informed him "that his dismissing a railway official had been referred to from the altar of a Roman Catholic chapel in such terms as induced two most respectable Roman Catholics to go to him and disavow all sympathy with what had been said," the Government have instituted or intend to institute any inquiries with regard to this altar denunciation and its connection with the subsequent murder?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, he could only say at present that the Government were instituting the fullest inquiries into all the circumstances connected with that deplorable and detestable murder, and those inquiries would include the investigation of the truth of the statement contained in the hon. Member's Question.

IRELAND—COLLEGE OF MAYNOOTH.
QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When the Returns respecting the College of Maynooth, which were ordered by this House on the 8th of March, will be in the hands of Members?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, in reply, that he could not say precisely the date on which these Returns would be in the hands of Members, but hoped they would be in a few days.

NEWFOUNDLAND CONFEDERATION.
QUESTION.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Newfoundland Legislature have addressed the Queen for admission into the Confederation of the Canada Dominion, according to the Section of the Union Act providing for such admission?

MR. MONSELL said, in reply, that no Address to the Queen had been received from the Newfoundland Legislature for admission into the Confederation of the Canada Dominion; but the Governor of Newfoundland had called attention to the subject in the Speech with which he opened the Session of the General Assembly on January 28, and the House of Assembly, in reply, stated, that they fully concurred with the Governor in thinking that the time had arrived for taking the section of the Union Act providing for such admission into consideration; and they assured the Governor that they would give their consideration to the question of the union of Newfoundland with the Dominion of Canada upon fair and legitimate terms. Resolutions were proposed on the subject in the Newfoundland Legislature, and a telegram had been received stating that the Colonial Legislature had passed a Resolution in favour of joining the Confederation.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will not facilitate the passing of the University Tests Bill, by allowing its Second Reading to be taken on a Government night?

MR. GLADSTONE: I should be sorry Sir, to see the Business of the House in such a state that the University Tests Bill should be in any danger from obstructions connected with time. But having said that, I am sorry to add that, with the present demands of the Public Business, and especially of Supply, and the great measures on the Irish Church which we have in hand, I am not able to displace the Government business in favour of the University Tests Bill.

MR. FAWCETT: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, as the University Tests Bill was introduced by a Member of the Government, that Bill is to be regarded as the measure of a private Member, or as one with which the Government have something to do?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is a Bill which, I believe, is supported by all the Members of the Government, and it was introduced by my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General in his capacity as a private Member.

MR. DISRAELI: I would appeal to the hon. and learned Solicitor General to re-consider the arrangement he suggested last night in regard to this measure. I cannot now, consistently with the Rules of the House, state the reasons which induce me to make this appeal, but I may just say that it is very important when Questions of this nature are brought forward that there should be no doubt as to the time at which they will be proceeded with. It is for the interests of both parties that such arrangements should be distinctly known.

MR. WALPOLE said, that his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General had stated to him privately that the Bill would come on either to-night or on Monday. It would, however, be greatly for the convenience of Members if they were distinctly informed whether it would come on to-night or not.

MR. GLADSTONE: I quite agree that it is very desirable that it should be known whether a Bill of this kind is coming on for discussion or not. The arrangement, however, which has been made is the result of a conference between my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, and the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), and I believe that arrangement is to the effect that the Bill is to come on to-night, provided the Army Estimates are over by half-past ten o'clock.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he understood that ten o'clock was the time named.

MR. GLADSTONE: There will be no disposition to press the question as to whether the time is ten o'clock or half-past.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he was authorized to say that the Bill would not be proceeded with that night; but that it would stand second on the Orders for Monday, coming after the Endowed Schools Bill.

In reply to Mr. E. EGERTON,

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that he did not propose to proceed that night with the Contagious Diseases (Animals) (No. 2) Bill. Indeed, he should not ask the House to assent to the second reading before Easter.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, he wished to know whether the Returns relating to the College of Maynooth would be distributed to hon. Members before the Irish Church Debate came on?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he expected they would, but was unable to answer the Question positively.

MR. T. CHAMBERS said, he wished to ask whether the Lands Enclosure Bill would be taken to-morrow night?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN replied, that it would be postponed to Monday next.

In reply to Mr. BERESFORD HOPE,

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he intended to proceed on Monday with the Endowed Schools Bill.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

ARMY—THE HORSE GUARDS AND THE WAR OFFICE.—RESOLUTION.

MR. WHITE said, the question of the administration of our Army was, in his humble judgment, not a mere military or professional matter, because every Member of that House who was in favour of economy in the great public Departments must be deeply interested in the subject which he was about to bring under their notice. Having regard to the magnitude of the annual Votes for army purposes—the largest in the aggregate which were passed in Committee of Supply—a very heavy responsibility devolved upon hon. Members, as the guardians of the public purse, and they ought to take proper care that the monies which were voted should be frugally and judiciously expended. It would be difficult to overrate the social, political, and economical importance of this question, involving as it did the maintenance or the abolition of the present effete and vicious system of army administration. He would premise that he should not treat this subject in a personal or offensive manner. What he was about to say would not have special reference to individuals, but would be equally applicable if the head of the Horse Guards were an officer sprung from the ranks of the people, instead of being, as he was, an amiable and popular Prince of the Blood Royal. When, on a former occasion, the subject of Horse Guards' management was brought before the House, Mr. Bernal Osborne remarked that the Horse Guards was such an Augean stable of corruption that it could never be cleansed unless the Serpentine were made to flow through it. Now, he begged to assure the House that he should not give utterance to a remark so rude, and, perhaps, so true. Prior to the Crimean War the administration of the army was divided into five distinct heads or departments, independent more or less of one another. Every one of them possessed some of the attributes of a Minister of War, but none of them were endowed with adequate powers to perform their duties properly and efficiently. In the years 1854 and 1855 these separate departments were consolidated, or rather merged, into the new Office of the Secretary of State for War, and it would be remembered that the great change then effected was the result of a panic feeling created by that hideous collapse of our military administration during the Crimean War, when, indeed, the military prestige of this country would have been irreparably injured but for the gallantry and devotedness of the officers and men who were engaged in that disastrous war. Having regard to the relative duties which then and now subsisted between the Secretary of State for War and the Horse Guards, he confessed that, considering the Secretary of State was not endowed with the power possessed by the First Lord of the Admiralty, he thought that that change was, in a financial point of view, a national calamity, because such an appointment fostered and encouraged the normal tendency to extravagance in the Horse Guards, while it also tended to sustain an obnoxious system of dual government and of divided responsibility, which he believed to be detrimental to the best interests of the army and of the country. Eminent authorities, however, who sometimes created and sometimes governed public opinion, now asserted that it was altogether a mistake to suppose that there was dual government or divided responsibility in the administration of the army, and that it was owing to the accident of two branches of the same great Department being in different localities that so inveterate a delusion had been engendered and perpetuated. As assertions of this kind were made by authorities which commanded respect, he felt it would be a piece of foolish obstruction and ridiculous pertinacity on his part to persevere with the Motion of which he had given notice unless he were able fully to justify it. Hence he was compelled to inquire into his own belief as to the existence of a dual government and a divided responsibility in the administration of our army. He went into the Library, and the first thing he laid his hand upon was "the Official Handbook," from which he found that the Commander-in-Chief was

"the supreme executive military authority, having entire control and personal superintendence of the military force of this country, and of matters referring to its interior economy and discipline."

Now that definition of the position of Commander-in-Chief was quite sufficient, in his opinion, to show that there were two authorities in the administration of the army. He found also a War Office Circular of 1867, No. 76, commencing with the words—"The Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, in conjunction with the Secretary of State for War, &c.," and another, No. 854, for the year 1864, with the words—"The annexed regulations have been approved of by His Royal Highness the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief and the Secretary of State for War, &c.;" while there was a third relating to barrack cookery utensils, with the words—"The Secretary of State for War has decided, with the concurrence of the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief," clearly taking for granted the existence of a divided authority. But, supposing such evidence of the duality which he maintained existed in our military administration were not deemed conclusive, he would refer, in support of his opinion on the subject, to a debate which occurred about ten years ago, in which the Secretary for War of the day (General Peel) said—

"He could not assent to the proposition that the different offices should be placed under the control of one responsible Minister of State. At present, the command, discipline, and patronage of the army were controlled by the Crown through the Commander-in-Chief."—[3 Hansard, cl. 1339.]

General Peel, on the same occasion, added—

"He was aware that there was no person directly responsible to the House for the manner in which the duties of the Commander-in-Chief are performed. He was only responsible to the Crown."—[Ibid., 1340.]

He found that Earl Russell, who was then in that House, demurred to the doctrine of General Peel, declaring that it could not be the case in this country that the Commander-in-Chief should have absolute and irresponsible control. The late Lord Herbert, on the same occasion, said that the Commander-in-

Chief was completely under the control of the Secretary of State; while the late Duke of Newcastle, on a subsequent occasion, gave it as his opinion that neither General Peel nor Lord Herbert was right, contending that the position of Commander-in-Chief involved the Secretary of State for War in legal, though not in moral, responsibilities. It was hardly wonderful, with such conflicting authorities before them, that the public should be in a state of obfuscation as to the true position in which the Commander-in-Chief stood in relation to the Secretary of State. For his own part, he must confess that, having given some attention to the matter, he had returned to his former conviction, which was that there was a dual government and a divided responsibility in the management of our military affairs, a state of things which he believed to be most mischievous and detrimental to the best interests of the public service. If he were to seek for an illustration of the justice of that view, he might find it in the Abyssinian Expedition; for in the directions and orders which had issued from the Horse Guards and the War Department in reference to that expedition there was the most lamentable evidence of mismanagement and of contemptuous and reckless disregard not only of economy but of common sense, as was abundantly proved by the enormous amount of the expenditure incurred. He knew there was a class of men whom it delighted to maintain that the flowers placed on Nero's tomb were deserved, and that our own Henry VIII. was the most kind hearted and benevolent of English Sovereigns, and he would leave it to casuists such as those to prove that no dual government existed in the army. The nature of the present system was well described in an able article which had recently appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette, from the pen of a gentleman than whom there was no one more competent to pronounce an opinion on the subject. The writer to whom he referred said—

“The cumbrous and superannuated mode of doing business in the War Department is illustrated by the very simplest piece of patronage, if it can be called patronage, in connection with the management of the army—the appointment of a young man who is found qualified for a commission by purchase. After all preliminaries are complied with, the money lodged, and the regiment selected, the youth's name must go through the following zigzag journeys before he can bloom into a real ensign:—1. From the Horse Guards to the War Office for approval; 2. From the War Office to the Horse Guards approved; 3. From the Horse Guards to Her Majesty for her sanction; 4. From Her Majesty to the Horse Guards sanctioning; 5. From the Horse Guards to the War Office; 6. From the War Office to the Gazette. When this is the case respecting a matter about which there can be no dispute or doubt; when the merits and qualification of the individual have been previously settled, we may guess how it is with questions upon which controversy may arise or further information be needed.”

He found, he might add, from the Report of the Committee on Military Organization, that the money value of the commissions which had been given away at the Horse Guards between the 1st of January, 1853, and the 30th of October, 1859, was no less than £1,271,250, and he also learned from the same source that the Duke of Cambridge—when examined before the Committee as to the patronage which he exercised—said that the patronage was exercised on principles which rested in the breast of the Commander-in-Chief for the time being. Lord Herbert also stated that the Secretary for War had no voice in the selection for first commissions, and he had seen it mentioned that the money value of the first commissions which had been given away since His Royal Highness had been at the Horse Guards might be estimated at more than £2,000,000. It was not surprising, he might add, that the hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian), with that ardent love for his profession and that zealous desire to promote the interests of his country which distinguished him, should have turned his attention to the subject; and the hon. and gallant Gentleman accordingly, on the 1st of June, 1858, moved the following Resolution, which he (Mr. White) at that time supported:—

“That although the recent consolidation of the different Departments of Ordnance, Commissariat, and Secretary at War has to a certain extent improved the general administration of Military Affairs, a divided responsibility still exists; and that, in order to promote greater efficiency, the Departments of the Horse Guards and War Office should be placed under the control of one responsible Minister.”—[3 Hansard, cl. 1336.]

There divided or paired in favour of that Resolution 157 Members, of whom seven were now in the Upper House, and fifty remained still in the House of Commons. Among the seven Peers were Lord Russell, the Duke of Sutherland, Lord De Grey, and Lord Athlum-

ney, and eight of those Commoners now sat on the Treasury Bench—namely, the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Bright), the Attorney-General (Sir Robert Collier), the Under Secretary for India (Mr. Grant Duff), both the Secretaries of the Treasury (Mr. Glyn and Mr. Ayrton), the Secretary of the Admiralty (Mr. Baxter), the Military Lord of the Treasury (Captain Vivian), and one of the Lords of the Admiralty (Lord John Hay). Though the Resolution was affirmed, the Government did not bring in any administrative measure to carry it into effect, nor did they take any means to rescind the Resolution. Lord Russell, the late Mr. Ellice, and Mr. Horsman urged most strongly that it was incompatible with the dignity of the House of Commons not to take some notice of it, and owing to the pressure put upon the Government, a Select Committee was appointed in the following year. That was the memorable Committee known as the Military Organization Committee, whose Report was a text-book of information upon the relations between the Secretary of State and the Horse Guards. A very strong Committee was selected, and presided over by Sir James Graham, and half-a-dozen of the most conspicuous Members now in the House served upon it; but as the Mover meanwhile had lost his election, the Committee had not the benefit of his assistance. As often happened in such cases, the Report was a compromise, and the scheme of Lord (then Mr. Sydney) Herbert was avowedly recommended, "because it had the merit of reducing change to a minimum." After an attentive perusal and study of the Report, he was constrained to say that the verdict did not appear to him to be in strict conformity with the evidence; but as illustrating the normal and persistent obstructiveness of the Horse Guards to all improvement, he might mention that more than eight years elapsed before any one of the recommendations of the Committee were carried into effect. It was well known that successive Secretaries for War had striven to improve the organization of the army, but some influence too powerful to be overcome had been in operation, and for eight years nothing was done. At last, thanks to the pertinacity and zeal of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington), one of the recommendations of the Committee was adopted, and so almost superhuman was that effort deemed that it was made manifest in the most conspicuous manner possible. The country and the world were told of that mighty feat through the medium of the Queen's Speech at the end of last Session—

"By the Appointment of a Controller-in-Chief in the War Office a considerable Reform in Army Administration has been commenced, which, by combining at home and abroad the various Departments of Military Supply under One Authority, will conduce to greater Economy and Efficiency both in Peace and War."

The present wretched condition of our army administration might, he thought, be inferred from a recent correspondence with the Treasury respecting this new reform. Sir Edward Lugard, the Under Secretary for War, for example, said—

"It will probably lead by degrees to extensive re-organization and amalgamation, both of the War Office and the civil departments of the army, tending to a considerable reduction of public expenditure."

Knowing the potent, and as he believed pernicious, influence that was exercised at the Horse Guards, and believing also that true economy was identical with true efficiency, he despaired of any great advantage accruing to the public even from the appointment of so energetic an officer as Sir Henry Storks. So far as he could make out, while Sir Henry Storks was appointed to control the military expenditure, and was alleged to be responsible to the War Office, he was yet divested of all real control, seeing that he was not allowed to report formally to the War Office without the sanction of his chief at the Horse Guards. Be this as it may however, he found this under Sir Henry's own hand—and the House might thence deduce what was the present condition of things when he recommended that there should be a new audit, and that it should be independent of the War Office. And Sir Henry Storks, speaking of the greatest spending Department of the State, actually thought it necessary in this year of grace to lay it down as essential to the efficient conduct of the Department, "that the responsibilities of the heads of Departments should be defined," and, further—

"That it is essential that the audit should be made on completed transactions, and that every charge should be judged of by the sufficiency of the proofs adduced in support of it."

What other principles of audit than these had ruled up to this time, he (Mr. White) must leave the Secretary of State to discover. No better evidence could be furnished to his mind of the necessity of the recommendation with which he should conclude than the excessive costliness of our military system. He found that the total cost of our regular army, comprising 127,336 men, was £12,795,000, or in round numbers £100 per head per annum. The French army, according to the Budget of 1870, numbered 400,000 men, and their estimated cost was £14,920,000, or only £37 6s. 8d. per man. No doubt he would be met by the plea that in France there was a conscription, while here we had voluntary enlistment, so that no just comparison could be made between the cost per soldier in the two countries. He would not now examine that point, but no such objection could be made to his contrasting the annual charge for the central administration in each army; and while the cost of this in England for 127,336 men was £220,079, irrespective of superannuations, amounting to £132,000 more, its cost in France was but £80,000. Thus the proportion per man for the cost of the central administration was £1 8s., and in France only 5s., so that we paid nearly six times as much as the French did for this branch of the service. Six years ago the Marquess of Salisbury (then Lord Robert Cecil) made an exhaustive speech in illustration of the expensiveness of our military establishments, observing that the figures he adduced indicated a most disgraceful state of things. In spite of small parings the same observation was strictly applicable to the existing state of the War Department; the present Estimates being quite as extravagant as those which provoked the denunciation of the Marquess of Salisbury in 1863. He had yet to learn why the superfluous office of full colonel should be kept up. Of course he would save the rights of the present incumbents; but he saw no reason why vacancies should be filled up, because that post was nothing more nor less than a sinecure, for a full colonel often never saw the regiment from which he drew his extra pay. If the Secretary for War turned his attention to that point, he might realize a saving of £100,000 a year without affecting in the smallest degree the real efficiency of the army. If it should be urged that the Resolution he was about to move would interfere with the Prerogative of the Crown, he would observe that the object of the modern use of such an argument was not to vindicate the just authority of the Sovereign but to screen the abuses of the servants of the Crown. The late Lord Herbert, when asked whether he saw any constitutional objection to the subordination of the Commander-in-Chief to a civil officer in England, replied that he saw a constitutional necessity for it, and that, in a Parliamentary form of Government, that subordination was right. He had strong authority for what he was urging on this point, for Lord Grey, who had done so much to improve the condition of the army, stated before the Military Organization Committee—

“The whole notion of there being anything unconstitutional in bringing the army more under the Ministry of the day seems to me to arise from confusion between powers exercised by the responsible Ministers of the Crown and powers exercised by Parliamentary Committees, or some mode of that kind. Undoubtedly it was very unconstitutional in the Long Parliament that all powers of the State should be assumed by Committees of the House of Commons, but that power over the army should be exercised by a responsible servant of the Crown seems to me to be an absolutely essential principle of our Constitution.”

He found that the present head of the Horse Guards had filled that office during the last thirteen years, during which period there had been eight different Secretaries of State for War. Now, he must say, with all respect, that however amiable the occupant of that post might be, there was such a thing as an official holding his office too long. The country would have made but little political progress during the last thirteen years if the same Premier had held Office for the whole of that period. Persons well qualified to judge declared that even the Duke of Wellington was far too long at the head of the army, though he was only eleven years in that position. The late Duke, however, obstinately objected to many improvements in army organization, and any weapon but Brown Bess, with which he won his victories, was strongly repugnant to his feelings. Had the Russian War occurred during His Grace's tenure of Office the result might have been extremely disastrous from the want of the Minié rifle, which did such wonders at the battle of Inkerman. When, by a wholesome regulation the duration, of a Staff appointment was limited to five years, he saw no reason why the head of the Staff should have a longer tenure of office. He understood it was in conformity with a private arrangement made with Lord Palmerston in 1861 that the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief and his subordinates at the Horse Guards have so long retained their offices beyond the "Regulation" term of five years. What, he believed, that the House and the country wanted was that the chiefs of Departments should be directly responsible to Parliament for the acts done in their Departments; and the present position of things in regard to the administration of the army was not creditable to the House or to the country. He need not remind the House how many Parliamentary Committees, Royal Commissions, Departmental inquiries, and official investigations there had been with respect to the army during the last few years, and the results had been almost profitless, as the diverting schemes of Queen Whim's officers and abstractors, chronicled by Rabelais. Talk of a grievance! Who that knows a military officer does not know a grievance? He held an officer of the army to be the incarnation of a grievance. With respect to the mutual relations between the Horse Guards and the War Office, the Duke of Wellington said the best rule was mutual good temper and forbearance on both sides. That might do in the days of the Duke of Wellington, when economy was considered and practised; but now, alas! economy was not only not practised, but was positively despised, and about double the amount was now to be voted for the army than sufficed when the Duke was Commander-in-Chief. Public attention having been called to the subject, the remedy for every grievance was declared to be the placing of both Departments under one roof. That, he believed, was the opinion of the Committee, the House, and the Secretary for War; but there was not the slightest hope that the opinion would ever be acted on. He spoke thus confidently because, on the 12th of May last year, the Commander-in-Chief having attended the Treasury Commission appointed to consider the arrangements for the accommodation of public Departments, had indicated to him by the noble Lord, then First Commissioner of Works (Lord John Manners), the feeling of the public as to the desirability of bringing the War Office and Horse Guards under one roof. His Royal Highness answered that he did not see the slightest advantage in doing so, and when told that the Royal Commission on Military Organization (presided over by the late Sir James Graham) recommended that the War Office and the Horse Guards should be under the same roof, and that General Peel was for that union, His Royal Highness replied—

"With all respect, I dissent entirely from that view. The duties in the War Office and our duties in the Horse Guards are so distinct that there is no necessity for our being under the same roof; not the slightest. . . . I think, besides, as we are a traditional country, that the removal of the Horse Guards would be something like removing a Royal Palace—St. James's Palace, for instance—or any other long-established building or institution, and I think it would be a most unpopular idea. I cannot think it would be desirable to do away with the present entrance to St. James's Park, and I do not believe that the inhabitants of London would like to be without those two sentries who have been there from time out of mind."

To the admiration of the nurserymaids of London no doubt. Well, however, as the matter now stood, if the Secretary of State be the supreme effective Chief of the War Department—which like his predecessors he claims to be in theory, but which neither he nor his predecessors have ever dared to be in practice—he must be held responsible accordingly for all official abuses and all the corruption in the Department which might be brought under the cognizance of the House; especially would he (Mr. White) hold him censurable for having made so scanty a reduction as £1,250,000 upon the vast outlay of £15,500,000. Still, if the right hon. Gentleman had full control, as he should have, over the army expenditure, it would be an insult to his financial sagacity to imagine that he could not have easily made such reductions as would have relieved the country of, at least, 2*d.* of the income tax, or the whole of the tea duty, amounting to £2,800,000. He concluded by moving that—

"In order to promote greater economy and efficiency, the Departments of the Horse Guards and the War Office should be placed under the control of one responsible Minister."

MR. FAWCETT seconded the motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in order to promote greater economy and efficiency, the Departments of the Horse Guards and the War Office should be placed under the control of one responsible Minister," — (Mr. White,)

MR. CARDWELL: The question which we are now going to decide is whether we shall continue the discussion upon the large question raised by my hon. Friend, or whether it will rather be the pleasure of the House to go into Committee of Supply and discuss the Army Estimates. Now, my hon. Friend, in his interesting speech, has not confined his observations entirely to the subject of his Motion, but has made remarks which have direct reference to the Estimates. I have, therefore, risen immediately to ask him whether he will not consent that you, Sir, leave the Chair, and that we now proceed to the general Business? I must say, however, that before the House determines that an establishment ought to be under the control of one responsible Minister, it should be quite sure the state of things desired does not already exist, and as far as I am capable of understanding the situation that state of things does exist. But my hon. Friend appeals to a former Resolution of this House, moved by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Truro (Captain Vivian), and he says that, because that Resolution was carried, it is an encouragement and an inducement for him to move it again. But surely he must see that if the House of Commons had been very earnest about that Resolution it would have insisted upon its being carried into effect. The House, however, reconsidered its decision and referred the question to a most influential Committee; upon that Committee served my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Truro, and at its head was perhaps the most weighty name among independent Members of Parliament at that time—the late Sir James Graham. That Committee considered the question under peculiar circumstances; the Patent of the Secretary of State then contained a reservation which it does not now contain, yet they decided that even with that reservation it did not prevent the Secretary of State from interference in every matter it was desirable there should be interference. My hon. Friend says the discipline and command of the army is in the hands of the Commander-in-Chief, and not in the hands of the Secretary of State. But I believe the House will be of opinion that it is desirable the command and discipline of the army should be in the hands of an experienced soldier. At any rate, that was the opinion of the Committee, whose Report says, speaking of the Secretary of State—

"Nor does he interfere in any way with the ordinary routine administration of the discipline of the army. That is left to the military authorities, aided by the legal knowledge of a Parliamentary officer,—namely, the Judge Advocate."

And what is the view the Committee take of the expediency of that state of things with regard to its effect upon the feelings of the army and its discipline? The Committee says—

"The army is thus enabled to feel assured that the patronage of the army, as regards first commissions and the ordinary promotions and appointments, other than those which are self-regulated by purchase or seniority, will not be distributed with a view to political objects, or to the necessities of successive Governments. Nor will the discipline of the army, as daily administered, vary in its character with each change in the Civil Department. Your Committee think that the introduction of any system which shall shake this reliance on the part of the army would be prejudicial to the efficiency of the service, by introducing doubt and dissatisfaction where confidence should exist."

That was the opinion of that celebrated Committee—that was the opinion of the then House of Commons, pledged as it was to a different conclusion—and that, I believe, will be the opinion of the present House of Commons and of the country. My hon. Friend spoke in terms of kindness and respect of the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief; but he added that he thought His Royal Highness had held that office too long. I have quoted what was said by the Committee. My hon. Friend said there had been eight Secretaries of State, while there had been only one Commander-in-Chief. I have read what the Committee think, and I should like to ask the House what they think would be the state of affairs if, in that period of time, during which there have been eight Secretaries of State, there had also been eight Commanders-in-Chief. It is my opinion that the army is satisfied with the Commander-in-Chief, and that it would not be agreeable to the army if the view of my hon. Friend should be acted upon. I believe that the present state of things insures full responsibility on the part of the Secretary of State. I will never shelter myself in this House from any observations that may be made by any Gentlemen who may find fault with the administration of the army, by saying that the Secretary of State is not responsible. With these few remarks, I hope my hon. Friend will kindly permit us to pass to what was intended to be the business of the evening—namely, the discussion of the Estimates.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he regretted that it should fall to a civilian, who could not be expected to have full information upon military matters, to support the Resolution. There were men of distinction and of great ability and knowledge whom he had heard express opinions upon this question favourable to the Resolution, but who were now, from the fact of holding Office in the Government, precluded from speaking with that power and energy which he had often heard them display on the subject of army administration. His hon. Friend who had brought forward this Motion and himself were far from desiring to say anything in the least degree derogatory to the distinguished individual the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief; but it was one thing to speak of an individual, another of a system. It had been said that while there had been eight Secretaries of State for War the country happily had only one Commander-in-Chief; but he did not know that that was an advantage after all. For instance, when naval matters were under consideration in that House, the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone), who had so long and so ably taken part in those discussions, and other naval Gentlemen freely expressed the opinions of the profession with respect to a proper system of naval administration. Now, why was it that naval officers so often brought the administration of naval affairs under review? The reason was, because the First Lord of the Admiralty was not a fixture. These hon. Gentlemen were in no terror of the First Lord; they were not afraid to put forth what they regarded as naval grievances. That was not the case with the army. There was not a civilian in that House who brought forward questions relating to the army of his own mere Motion, but was induced to do so by Gentlemen who knew that it was not for them to move in the matter. It was very generally believed that not only was there a dual administration of the army, but that a triumvirate presided over it, and that there was a military Secretary almost as potential as the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief. They had been told by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) that the supremacy of the Secretary of State was recognized by the country. If nothing else came of the discussion, his hon. Friend had done good service by eliciting that observation. He was told, however, that there was no appeal to the Secretary of State from the decisions of the Commander-in-Chief, and therefore the supremacy was not complete. It was a theory of the British Constitution that the Sovereign could do no wrong—and why? Because every act of the Sovereign was the act of a recognized Minister. But with regard to the patronage of the whole army it was all in the hands of one individual, who, in that respect, they were told, was not responsible to the Secretary of State for War, and, therefore, not to the country. It was well to speak out on this subject. People felt about it, and the House of Commons was the place to express that opinion. He believed that, were military patronage entrusted to a responsible Minister, public opinion was strong enough to prevent its being abused to a base and unworthy purpose. Why should that patronage be vested in any individual who was not responsible to the Minister of the Crown? He held that the agitation of this question was useful, and that the country owed a debt of gratitude to the hon. Gentleman who had brought it forward. The other day the Abyssinian Expedition had formed the subject of discussion, and there was one little item of that large amount for which the War Office was responsible; he referred to the purchase of mules. Why was not the expenditure for that object reviewed in that House? Because it would take a fortnight or more to get an answer, such was the circuitous mode in which business was carried on. After the experience of the great war between Austria and Prussia everyone would admit the great merits of the Prussian system. But in Prussia there was a recognized Minister for War for military administration, and a Field-Marshal, however distinguished, if not Minister of War at the time, was his subordinate, and the practice was the same in Paris and at Vienna. There was not a Member of that House who would not be delighted to see one who had distinguished himself in action, as His Royal Highness had done, commanding in a military capacity. It was one thing to command the army, and another thing to have the whole patronage and all the minutiae of administration under his control. In India, that distinguished officer General Mansfield held a position in regard to the Governor General somewhat correlative to that of the Commander-in-Chief to the Secretary of State for War. But General Mansfield was subject in every respect, except in his military capacity, to the Governor General. He, for one, felt that the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief ought to bear the same relation to the responsible Minister for the time being. He should vote with his hon. Friend if he went to a division.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: In the hope that the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) will yield to the appeal made to him by the Secretary of State for War, and allow us to proceed without unnecessary delay to the consideration of the Army Estimates, I will not delay the House by entering at any length into this question. But having lately had the honour of holding the same position my right hon. Friend now fills, I feel bound to support and confirm what has fallen from him both on this and a former occasion with respect to the relative positions of the Secretary of State for War and the Commander-in-Chief, which he has stated with the greatest possible accuracy. I think the House will agree with me that it is most desirable that discussions of this kind should come to an end. The Motion of the hon. Gentleman says that "the Departments of the Horse Guards and the War Office should be placed under the control of one responsible Minister;" but that is exactly the present state of affairs. We have frequently heard the phrase "divided responsibility." There is no divided responsibility. If you refer to the opinion of Lord Panmure, the first Secretary of State under the new system, as expressed in the House of Lords very soon after its introduction, you will find that this very question then arose in the House of Lords, when Lord Panmure, in the presence of His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, laid it down in the most distinct terms that the Secretary of State for War is responsible for every part of the administration of the army. I see the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) who preceded me at the War Office, in his place, and I would appeal to him, and also to my right hon. Friend who succeeded me (Mr. Cardwell), whether there ever was a public officer who entertained a more correct appreciation of his own position and his own duties than His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief. I appeal to them also whether they can recollect any occasion on which His Royal Highness has not readily acknowledged the superior authority of the Secretary of State and deferred to his opinion. I hope, Sir, that this question will not be constantly recurring, and that these mis-statements will not be repeated. It is evident that the hon. Member for Brighton has either received very erroneous information, or labours under very great misconception as to the real state of affairs. The hon. Gentleman referred to the change which I felt it my duty to introduce into the War Office in respect to the control department, and how did he express himself in regard to that measure of mine? He said it was a superhuman effort, and that it was done in spite of the potent and pernicious influence of the Horse Guards. There never was a greater delusion. I introduced that change with the full consent of my Colleagues in the Government, who agreed with me as to its expediency; and as to "the pernicious influence" of the Horse Guards, nothing of the sort occurred. The hon. Member for Brighton proceeded gravely to make the most extraordinary statement that Sir Henry Storks, the Controller-in-Chief, is unable to communicate with the War Office without the sanction of the Horse Guards. Sir, I hope the House will accept this as some proof of the necessity of caution in believing the statements that are made, and I hope also that the hon. Member for Brighton will accept it as a proof of the necessity of a little greater care, on his part, before venturing to make these statements to the House of Commons. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I mean no disrespect to him when I say that a more utterly nonsensical statement was never made. Sir Henry Storks is himself a high officer in the War Office; he sits there and is in daily communication with the Secretary of State for War. If he requires the sanction of the Horse Guards to hold these conversations and constant communications, all I can say is that that rule must have been introduced since I left the War Department.

MR. WHITE said, he was entirely in the hands of the House, and would consent to withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the ground over which I am obliged to travel is extensive; but, in asking for the favourable attention of the Committee, I promise not to occupy their time unnecessarily, and to confine what I have to say to that which I believe that you will wish to hear and ought to know. The first thing which I ought to state is what is the precise financial result of the Estimates which I propose to lay before the Committee. The first statement I have to make is that the total Estimate of last year was £15,455,400. The Estimate of the present year is £14,230,400, leaving, therefore, an apparent net decrease of £1,225,000. But, in order to make the comparison more close it will, I think, be right that we should first deduct the non-effective Votes, over which no Government has had any control; and if you deduct these you will leave the Estimate of last year £13,331,000, and the Estimate of the present year £12,047,600, being a decrease of £1,283,400. But this is not entirely the real decrease. There is a considerable item which is merely an item of account. The Indian Furlough Vote—a payment of £136,000—was charged on the Estimates of last year, and is not charged in the present year's Estimates, but is to be defrayed directly by the India Office itself. From this deduction, however, on the other side, there must be deducted two sums which diminish it. One is the sum of £20,000 for Convict Warders in Western Australia; the Vote for whose payment I used to have the honour of submitting to the House when I brought forward the Colonial Estimates—and, in quitting the Colonial Office, I thought I had lost the pleasure of their company but, by an arrangement which the Treasury have made, this charge is thrown, not on the Colonial Estimate, but on the War Office Estimate. Then there is the purchase of a piece of land at Woolwich, made two years ago; but which, owing to some circumstances, has not yet been paid for, but will have to be paid for in the present year, and which, not being wanted, will be sold and entered on the opposite side of the account. These two items make £49,250; and this sum has to be deducted from the sum of £136,000, leaving £86,750 as the real deduction to be made from the apparent decrease of £1,225,000. The total net saving therefore upon this year's Estimate, as compared with that of last year is £1,196,650. My hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. White) says this is only a very small "paring." I wish however to say to the Committee that if you take the net total of the effective Estimate—that is to say, if, looking at the balance-sheet on the first page of the Estimate, you take from the total of the effective services the estimated repayments on the other side of the account—you will leave, as the net total of the effective services, £10,834,600. If my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton will compare with that the £1,196,650, he will find that the reduction is more than 10 per cent on the whole of the net effective Estimate. And, although he may consider that is only a "paring," I hope we shall receive credit for it as a substantial reduction. Now, the cause of this reduction will be found to consist principally of two considerations—the one is a review of the distribution of our troops in the colonies, and the other is that arrangement which was made by the late Government, of which my right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) has just been speaking, and which, as the hon.

Member for Brighton said, was mentioned in the Queen's Speech at the close of the last Session of Parliament—an arrangement by which a greater control has been established over the expenditure in matters of Supply, from which I entirely agree with the statement of the late Government in the Queen's Speech, that the most beneficial consequences will result. To the former of these considerations—namely, the change in the distribution of troops in the colonies, I will first allude. There is always printed with the Estimates, which hon. Gentlemen have in their hands, a Paper which shows what is the expenditure of that colonial distribution. If any hon. Gentleman has compared the net expenditure of that distribution (after deducting the repayments made by the colonies) for the two years, he will have found that that net expenditure in the Estimates of last year was £3,022,323; and that this year it is £2,237,886, leaving a decrease of £784,437. That, however, is subject to this correction—all that are called colonies in that account are not colonies. There is the widest distinction between these colonies which are occupied for the purposes of colonization, and those maritime posts which are occupied for Imperial objects as stations for our fleet. We therefore deduct all the expenditure for Gibraltar, Malta, Bermuda, Halifax, and the China stations, and having taken these off there remains for the colonies proper in the last year's Estimates £1,643,794; and in this year the Estimate is £1,070,735, being a reduction of £573,059. That is, in short, a reduction of one-third on that item. I hope that even my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton will allow that this is a pretty fair saving for the commencement of our operations. As regards the other consideration of which I spoke, the Store Vote shows only a decrease, on the face of the balance, of £341,400; but that is owing to a change suggested by the Treasury in the mode of distributing the accounts. And a note at the bottom of the page in the Estimates indicates that the true comparison would show a reduction of £549,081. Now, I have said that this reduction in the Estimate has been due to two considerations, of which the first is a change in the distribution of our colonial force, and I will, therefore, state that if you take the force at home—the distribution upon which the Estimate of last year was framed showed a force in this country of 87,505 men; whereas the distribution on which the Estimate of the present year is founded is 90,677, being an increase of 3,172 men. But since these Estimates were framed we have, in concert with the Colonial Office, recalled a regiment from New Zealand and another from the Cape, so that the total number of men at home will thus be 92,015. They will be distributed into cavalry regiments, each containing 554 of all ranks, with 344 horses; while of infantry regiments there will be sixty-one battalions, each consisting of 560 rank and file, or 668 of all ranks, those only which are going to the colonies containing a larger number. Perhaps, I may be told by critics of a certain school that 560 is a very small number of men to have in a battalion. But, Sir, I wish to state that very high authorities may be adduced on the other side of the question. There are three ways in which, if you desire at any time to reduce your force, you can accomplish your object. The first is by the reduction of battalions. By adopting that method you effect the greatest pecuniary saving; but, on the other hand, you incur these three undesirable results. First of all, you inflict a hardship on a great number of officers; secondly, you incur a considerable expenditure in half-pay for services for which you get no return; and, thirdly, and by far the most important, you are diminishing the strength and elasticity of your army and lessening the power of defence which you possess. The second mode by which you can reduce your force is by the reduction of companies in regiments. That is an intermediate course, which shares those disadvantages to a certain extent, but not to the whole extent. The last course is by maintaining your cadre intact, stopping recruiting, and diminishing the number of men in the cadre. This latter is the course pursued in the armies of France, where the cadre is always kept intact, though a number of men are permitted to be absent from their regiments. In a pamphlet, lately published by Colonel Baker, which has attracted a great deal of attention, this subject is spoken of as follows:—

“ A large number of weak battalions should be kept up in time of peace, complete in everything but the number of men. I have taken the opinion of some most distinguished foreign officers, as well as those in our own service, as to the smallest number of men which would keep a battalion serviceable in time of peace, and nearly all agree that 500 is the lowest limit."

And he adds in a note—

"Among others, Marshal M'Mahon, perhaps, one of the greatest authorities in Europe. He thought 500 quite sufficient in time of peace, provided that the cadres were fully kept up."

The net total effective of the present Estimate must be compared with the net total effective of the Votes of former years. In 1865-6 the net total was £10,786,407; in 1866-7, £11,005,300; in 1867-8, £11,785,300; in 1868-9, £11,988,000; in 1869-70, £10,834,600. The force available at home was—in 1865-6, 83,242; in 1866-7, 91,703; in 1867-8, 91,048; in 1868-9, 87,505; in 1869-70, 90,677, which, as I have said, we now propose to raise to 92,015. Then the force in the colonies, according to the distribution on which the Estimates of last year were framed, consisted of 50,025 men; but, according to the distribution on which the present Estimates are framed, the force will consist of only 34,852 men, a reduction having being effected of 15,173. Now, of course, the question will occur whether it is necessary that I should go into a lengthened argument for the purpose of vindicating the policy of withdrawing these troops from our distant possessions. The principal change has occurred in Canada. Last year's Estimates were based on the distribution of 16,185 men in the whole of our British North American possessions, whereas the Estimates of the present year are based on a distribution of 6,249 men. The Committee will remember the Select Committee of 1861, which was moved for by my hon. Friend (Mr. Arthur Mills), sitting on the other side of the House, to consider the general subject of our colonial military expenditure. They will remember also that that Committee reported that a great change was necessary in the policy of this country in that respect, in order that the burdens of the people at home might be diminished, and a spirit of generous self-reliance generated in our colonial possessions, so that the result might be mutually advantageous both to the colonies and to the mother country. Well, the Resolution of that Committee was adopted by the House, and from that time to the present, I think I may say it has been the settled policy of this country. By the Duke of Newcastle, when he was Colonial Secretary, it was first carried into effect with regard to the Australian colonies; and almost immediately afterwards, when I had succeeded him in the Colonial Office, there was withdrawn from New Zealand a force of 10,000 men, which at that time was waging war with the insurgent Maories. A little later the same policy was carried into effect in the Crown colonies of Hong-Kong, the Mauritius, Ceylon, and the Straits Settlements, not indeed by the withdrawal of the troops, but by making the colonists contribute towards their support; and just before I left the Colonial Office—having proposed in this House a Bill for the annexation of British Kaffraria to the Cape,—I gave notice to the Governor of the Cape that the policy adopted by the House of Commons in 1861 must at no distant time be applied to the Cape. That policy the Earl of Carnarvon carried into effect, and with regard to our colonies generally, with the exception of Canada, it has been our settled policy since 1861. Canada has been a remarkable exception, and, for remarkable and exceptional reasons, which reasons, however, have now ceased to exist. Before those exceptional reasons had arisen, there was no exception in the case of Canada. In the year 1851 Earl Grey, then Secretary for War and the Colonies, addressed to the Governor General of Canada a remarkable despatch, in which he pointed out that Canada, enjoying as she did the blessings of responsible government, must be prepared to encounter all the sacrifices which freedom and a responsible government demanded of her. And in 1853 the Duke of Newcastle, on reducing the force in Canada to a lower point than is proposed in the present Estimates, pointed out to the colonists the same thing, and read them the same lesson. In 1865 one of the strongest arguments for the Confederation of the North American Provinces was the necessity which lay upon them of looking forward to providing for their own defence. Exceptional circumstances, however, prevented the application of the policy to Canada until the year which has just expired, in the course of which my right hon. Friend who preceded me in Office (Sir John Pakington), commenced what I think was a sound and judicious policy by the application of the principle to Canada.

He withdrew, I believe, 3,592 men out of 16,000 men who were previously stationed there; and just about the time when he resigned the Seals of Office he or I received a letter from the Duke of Buckingham recommending a still further reduction. If the advice of the Duke of Buckingham had been adopted, there would, I believe, have been left in the British North American Provinces 8,944 men. Now, we think we ought to carry out that policy still further, and consequently we propose that only 6,249 men shall be left there. And here let me pause for a moment to ask whether this diminution of force is really any weakening of our colonies? In my opinion it is exactly the reverse. I do not believe that New Zealand was in any way better off when she had 10,000 of our troops to fight her battles. I do not believe it does strengthen the Empire. If, instead of calling upon your colonists to exert themselves and to rely on their own resources, you distribute forces among them in small divisions, you will paralyze their efforts without furnishing them with real strength. I believe that Canada, with 30,000 or 40,000 armed men of her own, occupies a stronger and more independent position than she ever did before. Again, I believe that Victoria, raising her own fleet to defend her own harbours, is in a better position to defend herself, and will be a greater strength to the Empire than at any previous time. One of the Eastern potentates—I think Hyder Ali—said the English he was afraid of were not those whom he saw, but those whom he did not see; and the true defence of our colonies is that they live under the ægis of the name of England, and that war with them is war with England. You are strengthening and defending your colonies, and increasing the power of England, when you generate in every one of the settlements where the British name is known a spirit of British energy and self-reliance; for you consolidate and concentrate the strength of the mother country for their defence in time of need. The way, then, in which this reduction has been effected has been that instead of having at home 87,500 men, representing forty-six battalions of infantry of the Line, we have now a force of which the aggregate is 92,058, representing sixty-one battalions. The reduction has been made by keeping up the cadres entirely, but by diminishing the number of men in a battalion. There are, however, certain exceptions to this rule. One of the West India regiments has been altogether reduced, and a portion of the Ceylon Rifles as well as a portion of the Canadian Rifles will also be reduced. I have laid down this principle, that it is not desirable to maintain at the expense of the mother country forces which, owing either to the conditions under which they are recruited or other circumstances, are purely local forces. A purely local force should, in my opinion, be paid solely from local sources, and forces paid from the Imperial Exchequer should, I think, be of an Imperial character, so that Her Majesty might be able to command their services at any moment in any part of the world. It was the boast of the Duke of Wellington that his army could do anything and go anywhere, but let a corps be ever so efficient, if in its nature it be purely a local force, it is evident it cannot satisfy the conditions of that canon, and be regarded as a force which can go anywhere and do anything. Looking at the requirements of the service for our West India regiments, we thought that one of them ought to be reduced. The two places in which these regiments are employed are the west coast of Africa and the West Indies. On the west coast of Africa we found that the nominal force employed was one regiment and a half, but if you come to calculate the real strength of the force, you find that in reality it is not more than a single regiment. The whole number of the rank and file on the west coast of Africa is only 844, whereas the strength of a regiment and half is 1,125. That decrease of strength is accounted for partly by the difficulty of recruiting, owing, I am glad to say, to the cessation of the slave trade, which furnished a source from which recruits were drawn. I may add that Governor Blackall and the present Governor of our West African settlements, Sir E. Kennedy, both recommended a concentration of the force, and I am sure the Committee will be glad to hear that the colony of Lagos, of which we heard so much some years ago, has now arrived at such a state of independence that the Resident there has signified his readiness to dispense altogether with the services of any of Her Majesty's troops. Under these circumstances, we thought we might entirely reduce one of the West India Regiments, and by that arrangement a saving of £20,000 has been effected, after allowing for the addition of one company to each of the three remaining regiments. The same principle applies to the Canadian Rifles, which is a very costly regiment, and these Estimates contemplate the reduction of four companies. With regard to the Ceylon Rifles, the case would have been less important, because that colony, by a recent arrangement, pays a full contribution to the Exchequer for the troops which she employs; but a reduction of four companies of this force also will be effected, in accordance with arrangements made with the colony. No reduction has been made in the companies on the British establishment, except that when a regiment returns home from the colonies its twelve companies are reduced to ten in accordance with the ordinary practice. I will now state to the Committee what the financial result is of the reductions which have been made in the different branches of the service. In the Artillery we have reduced two batteries of field artillery, and the reason is that these were batteries which were created expressly for the China War, in 1860; but at the present moment, considering the very large return of artillery from Canada, which adds materially to the artillery at home, we thought it time to reduce those two batteries. Four field batteries have been converted into garrison batteries, and the third line of waggon of all artillery has been reduced, it being thought that in time of profound peace there was no necessity for keeping up so many drivers and horses. The total reduction will result in a saving of £39,500. I ought to have said that by concentrating the artillery depôts at Woolwich we have reduced entirely the depôts at Sheerness and Warley. In the Engineer train there is a reduction of fifty men and 100 horses, making a saving of £1,500. My right hon. Friend who preceded me in Office left, in course of progress, an arrangement by which the troop formation in cavalry regiments was to be converted into the squadron formation, and since I succeeded him that arrangement has been carried into effect, and the result appears in the Estimates. Accompanying that change—which is the formation of cavalry in every country in the world, and which is considered to be a great improvement, not only in point of economy but efficiency—sixty-eight officers have been reduced, as well as 557 men and 385 horses, making a saving of £19,828. In the infantry the saving will be £156,600. In the colonial forces, including the West India Regiment of which I have spoken, there will be an aggregate saving of £39,700, and in the dépôt battalions of £10,200. Having spoken of the regiments, I now proceed to deal with the Staff. Of the savings in the Staff some will be immediate and some prospective, and the principle by which we have been guided in effecting them is this—Where the duty has ceased the reduction has been immediate, but where it was proposed to discharge the duty in future in a more economical manner, and the time at which the Staff officer's period of service was about to expire was not very distant, we have made it prospective. The whole saving, consequent on immediate reduction, and which appears on the present Estimate, is £6,759; that on prospective, to which I shall refer by-and-by, £7,000. Then there is another change, about which I have heard a good deal, which we propose should be made. There are in the regiments of Guards, not only a general in command of the whole brigade, but also a lieutenant colonel who does not command a battalion, but who is, as far as I can understand the matter, at the head of a brigade within a brigade, and is lieutenant colonel of the regiment. We have deemed it necessary to make some reduction in that respect. We do not propose that the separate command of lieutenant colonel of a regiment should be continued, but that a lieutenant colonel in the Guards should command his own battalion. To return, however, to the Staff, the immediate reductions are in Canada, the Cape, one brigade at Malta, and a major general in the West Indies. Prospectively, we propose a new arrangement as to the brigades at Aldershot, by which a more rapid succession will be secured and more officers trained for the command of a brigade. We propose a reduction among the Engineers in Ireland in the recruiting staff; but with regard to the more important point—the command of the forces in Ireland—I have to state that that command under Lord Strathnairn will terminate in the course of the next year. It used to be the custom formerly that the command in Dublin and the command of the forces in Ireland were held by the lieutenant general commanding the troops, and it appears to us that, on the termination of Lord Strathnairn's tenure of office it would be desirable that the command which he holds should cease, and that the lieutenant general commanding in Dublin should command the forces in Ireland. The cavalry are at present inspected by an Inspector General of Cavalry. That seems to us to be an unnecessary and expensive arrangement, and we think that the officer who commands the cavalry at Aldershot might with great advantage and economy inspect the cavalry throughout the whole island, and that the officer who commands the cavalry at the Curragh might inspect the cavalry in Ireland. We also think that musketry drill has become so completely a part of the general service of the army that it will not in future be necessary to appoint inspectors of musketry. The great object of those who look to the defence of the country and to improvements in military organization has always been frustrated by the consideration how very large a portion of the time of the British soldier is spent either in some foreign climate or at sea, and how little of home service you are able to give him in proportion to his time abroad. It has been of late years very difficult to give a man even four years at home to twelve abroad. But I think we shall by the distribution which I now propose have made a great step in advance in this most important direction. If you have—I think it will be, 92,000 men at home to 96,000 in India or the colonies—you will have made at least some advance towards that which has always been considered a great object by those who have the welfare of the soldier and the defence of the country at heart—namely, to give him, if possible, half of his time at home. I wish to speak with becoming diffidence upon matters which, of course, are new to me; but I cannot allude to the subject of Army Reform without saying that I have always felt a very strong disposition to favour a system of much shorter enlistments than now exists. I do not desire to speak presumptuously, but I shall be very sorry—as I become more acquainted with the subject, and have time to go more into details—if I find that there is no power of accomplishing the great object of introducing shorter enlistments. At any rate, some changes have been made which I think the Committee will be disposed to regard as improvements. The authorities of the Horse Guards have made some excellent rules within the last few months in regard to recruiting. The recruiters have been told not to take up strollers, not to take people about whose antecedents they know nothing, not to take men who—if it cannot be said that they were enlisted by force, as in countries where conscription prevails—may be said to be made a portion of the British Army by fraud. For the time, at least, the escort of recruits has been entirely discontinued. They have been sent from their homes to the regiment with a railway ticket given to themselves, without a sergeant or any escort, and the result hitherto has been signally satisfactory. The number of persons who have failed to present themselves to the regiment has been wonderfully small, the mere pecuniary saving has been considerable, but in its moral consequences this proceeding has been of far greater importance than any pecuniary saving can be. We have also laid down rules that men who have once left the service shall not have the right to re-engage. If they choose to re-engage during their first period of service, well and good; but if, at the expiration of that first period, they choose to leave the army, their right to re-enter for a further period of service shall lapse, and the system of bounties, compensations, and allowances to induce them to enter is put an end to. These, I think, though not very great changes, are important as indicating a disposition towards shorter enlistments; and when we see that the pension list amounts to a very considerable sum above £1,000,000—I think about £1,500,000—and that it increases without control, we may hope that in this system of shorter enlistments may be found a solution of some of the economical difficulties which surround us. I have spoken hitherto of the army alone; but there is another branch of the subject which is not less interesting—which in some respects is even of greater interest—than the army. I speak of the reserves. It is a great problem in a country which has no conscription how you are to maintain an army of moderate strength in time of peace, and capable of expansion in time of war. Before I proceed to deal with the reserves, I think I may be permitted to lay down the following propositions—namely, that the army of a country, circumstanced as this is, ought to be, as regards both men and matériel in time of peace, comparatively small; that its efficiency should be the highest possible; that it should be in a form capable of easy expansion; that, as regards its matériel, this should be of the highest quality and the greatest efficiency, and with this object it should not be allowed to accumulate in proportions so large as to be likely to become obsolete, to wear out, or to be the worse for keeping. Having laid down these principles, I should say that, in compliance with them, we have kept all the battalions entire, and have brought a considerable number of them home. How then can we effect the great object I have mentioned? How can we fill up our battalions when the emergency arises, and how can we maintain reserves efficient in themselves and able to second and support the army? I am sure every one will agree that the first body to which we turn in answering this question is the old constitutional force of England—the Militia. The well-known sneer of Dryden might be applicable in his time; but Dryden, I fear, was ready to turn his pen to any political purpose, and it may be that the object of the Court when he wrote those well-known lines was to raise not a Militia but a standing army. The Militia has ever been a force dear to the people of England from its constitutional antecedents, and I believe that in its efficiency the people of England will always take the greatest interest and pride. On the last occasion when the great Duke of Wellington addressed the House of Lords he spoke, in terms which I hope will ever be remembered, of the services which the Militia had rendered to him in the great struggle of our country's liberties. If I may be permitted to repeat an anecdote to the Committee—I once had the honour of sitting at the Curragh next to a soldier second only to the Duke of Wellington—the late Lord Seaton—who said, as the regiment of Lord Hatherton passed by—"That regiment is fit to stand by any regiment of the Line." I hope the Militia will always be regarded as the great support and reserve of the standing army. My right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington), I think, last year read to the House a letter from Major General Sir John Garvock, in which, speaking of the forces in the district he commanded, he said that they consisted of about 7,000 regulars, but that there were within his district the following forces, to the maintenance of all of which Parliament contributed, but with none of which the General commanding the district had any communication at all:—Yeomanry, 8,000; Militia, 25,000; Volunteers, 53,000; making a force of 86,000 men. That is a state of things to which I think my right hon. Friend did well to call attention. We intend to bring it under the notice of the House in a more formal manner, and I trust that Parliament and the country will determine to put an end to it. With regard to the reserve Votes, the Estimate is very nearly in equilibrio, but there is on the whole a small excess. The sum of £34,000 is saved upon the Militia Vote, and that arises entirely from two causes. Last year money was taken for training the Irish Militia. They were not trained nor do we intend to train them this year, but we ask for the necessary Vote for enrolling this force in order that it may be ready for training next year. The principal saving is £48,000 upon the clothing, a much larger quantity being procured last year and the requirements of the force this year being very small. As to the saving which arises through not training the Irish Militia, it is absorbed, because we train in England and Scotland nearly the same number of men as were estimated for last year when Ireland was included. Last year the number was 86,000; this year it is 83,000, and as we have to pay for enrolling an additional number in Ireland, the saving becomes exceedingly small. With regard to the Militia, Her Majesty's Government have not the slightest intention of in any way altering the constitution of that force. They have not the smallest intention of in any way depriving it of its local character, and of its connection with the county. Least of all have they the smallest intention of endeavouring to withdraw from the Lord Lieutenant of the county any patronage, if there be any, in regard to the appointment of the officers in order to vest it in the Secretary of State. But these things we think

Parliament will be desirous to do, and we ought to propose. We think that there ought to be a relation between the regular army and the Volunteer forces for special purposes, and of a limited kind, but in such a manner that the country may feel that the whole strength of its force is welded and consolidated together, and that any enemy who should venture to assail us would find that all our forces were applied with the greatest advantage to resist and repel invasion. Then, we think we have a right to say that the conditions under which the officers are chosen shall be those which shall insure a greater amount of military qualification in the officers selected. It may seem a small matter—and I only say it in passing—but we think that, as we have repealed the property qualification for Members of Parliament, we might as well proceed to abolish the property qualification for officers of the Militia. We have entered the sum of £20,000 in the Estimates for the purpose of improving the position of the officers of Militia. There is, as is well known, a disinclination to join the Militia regiments, and I must say I am surprised at some of the inducements which this great country offers to gentlemen to become officers of Militia. When I found a personal allowance of 1s. a day for officers of the Militia, I own it seemed to me one of the greatest curiosities that had come to my knowledge in the course of my official inquiries. We propose to add the sum of £20,000 to equalize the Militia with the army pay during the period of training, and to raise the personal allowance from the ridiculous sum of 1s. to the very moderate amount of 4s. a day. We also propose to pay the quartermasters some little addition, and to aid the movement of the Militia in order that they may join the regular troops and be more frequently brigaded together. I have spoken of the officers. I am happy to say there is no difficulty in obtaining men, and the present Estimate is framed on that hypothesis, and that in England and Scotland the number shall be raised to its maximum, which is, as we know, 90,000 men for the two countries. We make only one limitation. Some regiments have run to excessive numbers, beyond what are considered to be convenient for the commanding officer to handle, and we propose that no regiment should be allowed to recruit if its number exceeds 960 men. With that limitation we propose to raise the Militia to its maximum, and making the necessary allowance for absentees, and with the limitation of which I have spoken, we take the Estimate at 83,000 men for the present year. I now come to speak of the Yeomanry. An hon. Friend of mine opposite (Mr. Neville-Grenville) asked me early in the Session whether we intended to call out the Yeomanry. I thought that was indicative of a little distrust on his part whether we intended to call them out or not; and it does fall within my knowledge that there are competent authorities who do not attach very great importance to the Yeomanry in its present state. I hope they are mistaken; but, at all events, all I shall say is this—that at a period when Her Majesty's Government are most desirous to encourage the reserves, and to try whether they cannot be brought into a more efficient state and act with complete harmony with the regular forces, we should be exceedingly sorry to discourage any branch of the reserve, and therefore we have not proposed not to call out the Yeomanry. In concert with His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, on the part of the regular forces, and with a friend of ours whose name I am sure will always be acceptable in this House—General Lindsay, the Inspector General of the Reserve Forces—I am engaged in making arrangements which may tend to the efficiency of the reserves, and to their better combination, as I said before, at fixed times and for special purposes, with the regular troops. Of course, the Yeomanry will not escape the critical attention of the Government, and I will only hope that it will answer to the requirements made upon it, and that we shall never find that it is undesirable to call out that ancient and most respectable force, the Yeomanry, but that we shall be able to place it in a state of efficient relation with the other reserve forces. I come now, Sir, to the Volunteers. They are a very powerful body, for whom I, for one, entertain the highest possible esteem and respect. I think they were never better described than in the pamphlet of my hon. Friend the Member for Devonshire (Colonel Acland), and I will just quote some words from the pamphlet which were used by a distinguished officer of the regular service. He speaks of the Volunteers "as a school of preparation for duties which are required of all British citizens, in the event of an invasion." I am happy to say that the Volunteers have increased in the past year from 155,216, to 170,500 efficient; and from 90,588 to 102,500 extra-efficient. I was not able to comply with the request made to me by my noble Friend opposite (Lord Elcho) and others, to increase the capitation grant to £1, and for this reason—that there are great differences in the requirements of the different forces; and it is quite evident to me, at least, that whatever we may be desirous to do in future, it is not well to do it by merely scattering broadcast an increase of the capitation grant. I venture to lay down the following rules among many others with regard to the Volunteers. I think it will be admitted that, although the most efficient Volunteers may be as efficient as any soldiers in the world, yet, before the Government can come to Parliament to propose an increase in the present grant, it will be absolutely necessary for them to require a much more efficient organization of the body, and, among other things, to lay down these rules—first, that there shall not be in any locality more separate corps of Volunteers than that locality requires; secondly, that a greater proportion of those who receive the grant shall attain to the highest standard of efficiency; thirdly—and I attach great importance to this consideration—that officers and non-commissioned officers shall always be selected for their efficiency; and that neither social position nor any other recommendation shall compensate for the want of perfect efficiency in the officers; and, fourthly, I think myself entitled to say that, if Parliament is asked for an additional contribution for the Volunteers, it must be made not, as I have said, by sowing broadcast an addition to the capitation grant, but by adopting measures the direct tendency and necessary consequence of which shall be to contribute to increased efficiency. Now, Sir, we must look forward to an increase of expense for the Volunteers. The Committee may not be aware that the Estimates show that the expenditure already amounts to £509,330, and in that amount no allowance is made for the weapons which the Volunteers use. We must, however, expect a great change in those weapons, and expect to have to purchase new weapons, and with new weapons we shall have to furnish a much more expensive kind of ammunition. Therefore, our expense on account of the Volunteers will necessarily increase; and, in contemplating an increased expenditure, it will be absolutely necessary for those who are responsible to see that they secure also, if possible, increased efficiency. Then there are three other reserve forces. They all exist between the covers of an Act of Parliament; but as regards two of them, it must be admitted that their numbers are extremely small. The first army reserve consists of men in the first period of their engagement, and of young men, but that force is limited at present to 1,000 men; and in the present Estimate we only provide for 2,000. The second army reserve consists of older men of the regular army and of pensioners. The Estimates last year provided for 16,000 of the older men and pensioners, and this year the Estimate is for 22,000. Then there is a third reserve, which is called the Militia reserve, and as to that reserve I own I feel considerable difficulty. The theory of the Militia reserve is that, having got a man into the Militia by the payment of a bounty and allowances, you give him another bounty to make him an army man too. Now, I admit the great value of the first reserve and the Militia reserve in principle, because they are not, like the second reserve, available only for service at home, but are also available for service abroad. Demosthenes says it is the practice of a good boxer not to ward off the blow of his assailant, but to endeavour to return it seven-fold. It has always been held by officers of the navy that their place in time of war is not off our own coast, for the purpose of defence, but off the enemy's ports for the purpose of attack, and I freely admit that the great advantage of the Militia reserve, as well as of the first army reserve, is that they are liable for foreign service, and may carry war into the enemy's country. I feel, however, the greatest difficulty about the Militia reserve, and for this reason—I have stated that having given a man one bounty to make him a Militia man, we give him another to make him an army man. It seems to me obvious that by giving a man two bounties, you cannot make him two men, and that if you write him on the strength of the army, you must write him off the strength of the Militia. Now, Sir, I want also to see the Militia itself a most effective force, competent, like that Militia of which the Duke of Wellington and Lord Seaton spoke, to take its place in time of war by the side of the regular army. I know that Militia officers of the greatest experience and capacity differ in opinion about the Militia reserve, and we shall endeavour to learn their opinions before we come to a positive decision. But I say to myself, if I were commanding a Militia regiment, and there were in it men who received a second bounty to leave me when an emergency arose, I should feel a hesitation in appointing them non-commissioned officers. I should take those who would remain with me. It seems to me reasonable to state the case as a dilemma. If these men were made non-commissioned officers of the Militia, then when carried away to join the army, the non-commissioned officers would disappear from the Militia, and they would join the army as privates, subject to a feeling of unpleasantness, which would not tend to promote their efficiency. If they were not made non-commissioned officers, but remained in the Militia as privates, they would be subject to a feeling of discouragement all the while they remained members of that force. I have made these remarks in order to elicit the opinions of those in the House who are more experienced than myself. I hold, at the present moment, the power of adopting either of these plans by taking in the Estimates the same sum for the Militia reserve that

- was taken last year—namely, £20,000—I am not, however, sorry to find that only £2,700 of it had been expended, and I am very glad that time for consideration will be given whether we shall apply this sum to increase the Militia reserve, or rather to increase the first army reserve, which might be done with great advantage by connecting it directly with the army, through the general officer of the district, and making it perform the part of the furlough men as in France. [Lord ELCHO asked, what was the number of the Militia reserve?] The present number of the Militia reserve is 2,700. Of course, there is no difficulty in raising the men. The result I will now state to the Committee. The total number of men we provide for to be at home on the present Estimates is as follows:—Last year there were of Regulars 87,505; this year there are 90,677. Of the Militia last year there were 67,600; this year there are 83,000. Of the Yeomanry I take the same number as last year, 13,700. The first army reserve last year was 1,006; this year I take it at 2,000. The second reserve and pensioners last year stood at 16,970; this year it is 21,870. The Volunteers last year were 155,216; this year they are 170,581, making a gross result last year of 341,997, and this year of 381,828. Now, Sir, the force of 92,000 men in this country, in 61 battalions, represents a far greater force than 92,000 in 46 battalions. If you have your battalions in good order, your cadres full, all your officers and men in a state of efficiency, if you have in every battalion 560 veterans, you would have no difficulty, if any emergency arose, and when the warlike spirit of this country had been evoked, in raising your 92,000 to 100,000. Your Militia, if you include the Irish Militia, already exceed 100,000; and I may remark that, although the Irish Militia is not to be called out for training this year, that is no reason why they should be left out of our calculation in reference to an emergency. I say, therefore, you may fairly regard this as representing a strength of certainly not less than 400,000 men. And, according to high military authorities, no force is more efficient than where you have a backbone of veterans with a slight admixture of young recruits within it. Thus you will have 100,000 Regulars, 100,000 Militia, 24,000 Reserves and Pensioners, and 184,000 Yeomanry and Volunteers, which in all make up a force of 408,000; and with such a force I venture to think this country may be considered perfectly safe both from attack and menace. But I do not think we ought to be content with less than that strong force, when I see before me, as I have at this moment, the Returns of the forces of the four other Great Powers of Europe, and remember that the force of not one of them is less than 1,000,000 of men. Now, Sir, if I have not exhausted the patience of the Committee with reference to the men, it is necessary I should say something on the subject of matériel. And first of all I must pay my tribute of praise to my right hon. Friend opposite (Sir John Pakington), for the change he has effected by the introduction of the control system into the supervision of the army. My predecessors in this Office have, I think, long seen the great necessity for a combined management, and a more efficient control over the demands for every kind of supply. Lord Herbert stated it in Sir James Graham's Committee, and so did Lord De Grey soon afterwards in a letter, which he addressed to the Treasury. General Peel appointed a Committee under Lord Strathnairn, and that Committee made a Report, which no doubt every Member has read; and finally, my right hon. Friend made, I think, a most happy selection when he placed at the head of the control system that distinguished officer, Sir Henry Storks, and associated with him General Balfour. The object sought to be attained was to combine under one surveillance the commissariat, the transport corps, the barracks, the hospitals, and the military stores; this arrangement having been recommended by Lord Strathnairn's Committee. I quite agree with my right hon. Friend as to all the results so far as they have gone. But my right hon. Friend opposite did not limit his action to the points recommended in the Report of that Committee, and when I came into Office I found that the munitions of war, the Tower, and the manufacturing establishments at Woolwich, were placed under the management and oversight of Sir Henry Storks. I approve of that arrangement, and just before the right hon. Gentleman left Office he took the step, in which I entirely concur, of putting an end to the Ordnance Select Committee. Its objects were too varied, and its responsibility too vague and confused; it was expensive, and led to difficulties of various kinds with inventors, to which it was necessary to put an end. But in sending the Director General of Ordnance to reside at Woolwich my right hon. Friend took a step which I cannot approve of. I have not been able to collect from the correspondence what the functions were which that gentleman had to perform at Woolwich, and after giving the subject my best consideration, I have agreed to suspend the arrangement, and to declare that it is not necessary that the Director General of Ordnance should reside at Woolwich. The truth is, that though there is no patent right against the

Crown, yet so many claims have arisen for all sorts of inventions, and we have had, as I think, so little responsibility in the way in which these inventions have been brought before us, that I felt it to be one of my earliest duties to put an insuperable obstacle in the way of all vague claims, and take care that no such claims should be made except under specified directions and for specified objects. It seems to me that no claim should be allowed until it has been submitted to Parliament and voted by Parliament; and our intention is, that there should be, not at Woolwich, but at the War Office, a Council, at the head of which should be my noble Friend the Under Secretary for War (Lord Northbrook); my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) will be a Member of it; the Controller-in-Chief will be a Member, as also the Director General of Ordnance, the Inspector General of Artillery and Engineers, along with officers representing both the Navy and the office of the Secretary of State for India. This Council will investigate every claim before it is submitted to me, and it will not only be approved by the Secretary of State and the Treasury, but submitted to Parliament and voted by the House before there is any claim on the public. Under Sir Henry Storks' direction the work of control has already made very great progress. The result of this does not appear in the form of the Estimates you are now about to consider, as it has necessarily been a matter of gradual progress, and the old arrangements could not be interrupted until the new arrangements should be ready to replace them, though by next year the system will no doubt have acquired completeness. At the present moment the control system extends to Ireland, Gibraltar, Aldershot, the Cape, the Straits' Settlements, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Bermuda, Barbadoes, Grenada, and Australia, and in a short time it will be still further extended throughout Great Britain and to all our colonial stations. I have before me a statement which shows that a considerable saving will be established in this respect, and arrangements are besides being made at the Admiralty by which a double expense in stations common to both the War and Navy Departments—Malta for instance—will be avoided. The Admiralty will take the charge of some of those stations, and the same principle which is applied to the military Department, of combining under one control the different heads, will, I hope, be extended to the War and Admiralty Departments. The whole question of the munitions of war is, I think, at the present moment, one of the most difficult and one of the most interesting to which a civilian can possibly address himself. I am happy to be able to say that as regards the arms—whether the great guns or the small arms—I believe we have at this moment the best weapons that are possessed by any service in the world. I believe the Frazer gun and the Snider rifle are not surpassed in efficiency by any weapons held by any other military nation. But having said that I must inform the Committee that the Frazer gun is still the subject of crucial experiment; and that a Report has just been presented within the last few days, according to which it would appear that the Snider rifle must be superseded, and the Henry-Martini rifle adopted in its stead. Then there is that most extraordinary Moncrieff gun-carriage, the operation of which I witnessed the other day, and will endeavour to describe to the Committee. I and others were placed in what may be called a rifle pit for great guns, and the gun came down to us of its own accord. We then set it by means of reflectors, and soon after it was lifted up, proprio vigore, to the surface above, and was fired off, not limited by any embrasure, but having the sweep of the whole horizon. I do not know what an enemy would imagine if he happened to encounter such an instrument of destruction, but probably he might think that his opponents had subject to their control those central fires which occupy the middle of the earth, or that some infernal spirit had risen from below to fire off weapons in the upper air. I have included in these Estimates a reward for the inventor of that gun-carriage, and I shall submit it with great confidence for your approval, for I think that the economy it is likely to lead to will be deemed well worth the reward it is proposed to grant. Again, gunpowder is the subject of marvellous investigation. Science not only measures the speed of a projectile in the air, but accompanies the propelling force in its progress along the barrel, measures the intervals during which it is exerting its strength, and analyzes the explosive power into that portion which propels the projectile in a direct line, and that part which operates at right angles to the course of the projectile, and tends to burst the barrel. Thus science judges which powder it is most desirable to use and which to avoid. Gun-cotton, which a short time ago seemed almost excluded from the category of the materials to be employed in gunnery, has again come into notice as a competitor with gunpowder. Everything appears to be in a state of flux and progress, and Snider rifles, for example, must not be manufactured in large quantities, because of the appearance of a report from competent persons, who advise that that arm should be given up, and that the Henry-Martini rifle be substituted for it. That, however, cannot be done yet, as it will be necessary, first of all, to try the implement in actual service and in different climates. There is scarcely a branch of the great question connected with firearms which is not at present the subject of the most careful inquiry and critical investigation by scientific men. All these circumstances lead to this result—that we should confine our demands on the liberality of Parliament to wants which are immediate, and postpone everything that will bear postponement. We must take care not to be behind other nations in the race at any moment of time, while, at the same time, we adopt every means to secure the highest ultimate efficiency at the least expense. What we propose is, as regards the Snider rifle, of which we have a sufficient store to keep up the supply for the present year, to add only a small fresh supply; and that a few of the Henry-Martini rifles should be got ready to be tried in actual service in this country, and in the heat of India and the cold of Canada. I have desired also that a small supply should be provided in time to be tested at the next Wimbledon meeting, where experienced riflemen will judge of their merits. Under these circumstances, I shall take but a small Vote for the supply of rifles during the present year. As regards iron ordnance, I find that guns are supplied to meet all the immediate demands of the land service; but there is a want of great guns for our fortifications for sea-defence, and consequently all the money we spend on guns will be spent almost entirely, if not exclusively, on the great guns I have just alluded to. As to powder we have large accumulated supplies. In 1828 the stock amounted to 279,602 barrels, in 1829 it was fixed by the Duke of Wellington's Government at 198,000 barrels; in 1848 to 161,000 barrels, and in 1868 to 340,272 barrels. The annual consumption for all services is 36,000 barrels, and Waltham Abbey and the trade could manufacture twice that quantity. There is one kind of powder with respect to which especial investigations are being carried on. I allude to the Pellet powder, which, it is said, is much less calculated to burst the guns than other kinds of powder. I may say that, last autumn, several million rounds of ammunition were broken up because it had become impaired by keeping, or had been superseded by improvements. Therefore I propose to limit our claim upon Parliament in respect of matériel to those matters which are really needed, and to wants which ought to be immediately supplied. Among these we shall consider the 12-ton gun, if the crucial experiment shall succeed, as we believe it will, and as many Moncrieff gun-carriages for 12-ton and 7-ton guns as the carriage manufactory can supply. We have not yet absolutely ascertained that the Moncrieff carriage will carry the 12-ton gun; but there can hardly be any doubt upon the subject. I am speaking only of the land service, and not of the guns to be manufactured for the Navy; and we do not propose to make anything larger than the 12-ton gun for the sea-defences of the land service in the present year. Up to the present time very little change has occurred in the number of men employed at the factory. What little change there has been is rather in the way of increase than diminution, because it was necessary to make some new ammunition; but there must be a reduction according to these Estimates in the course of the year. In regard to the works, there has been a diminution. The question of the fortifications building under the Loan Acts was referred by my right hon. Friend opposite to a Committee, of which Sir Frederick Grey was Chairman, and it is about to present its Report. I have not seen the Report, but I think I know enough to say it is not likely to disappoint the House. With regard to barracks, military hygiene is a science which has made great progress of late years, and among other results it has increased the amount of space required for the accommodation of soldiers from 450 to 600 cubic feet. The Admiralty have given notice that in the autumn of this year they will place at our disposal considerable barracks at Woolwich, and the works of fortification which are in course of construction will also furnish the means of accommodating a considerable number of men. It is a very serious thing to undertake expenditure upon barracks with the present requirements, and therefore I intend to examine the whole subject in the course of the year. At present I ask in the Estimates only for a small sum to commence a barrack at Glasgow, which is very much wanted, and for which, my right hon. Friend opposite provided the site in the Estimates of last year. I must now pass as rapidly as possible over the remaining portion of my statement. In connection with fortifications, and in the race between attack and defence, I am happy to say that an advantage has been lately gained by defence through the great improvements that have been made in what are called torpedoes, which appear to afford a security to our mercantile harbours that has not hitherto been attained, and which are more easily applied to defence than to attack. In the Medical Staff there is not so great a diminution as would probably appear to most observers to be called for by the general diminution of the force. There is a diminution of twenty-five medical Staff officers and twelve regimental officers. The reason is this. We were very desirous not to place upon half-pay young and very efficient medical officers who, having passed their examination at Netley, would have been placed upon half-pay if we had made an immediate reduction. The course we have taken has been to keep them on duty, and to give older men returning from long residence abroad the opportunity of passing through the course at Netley, instead of the pupils, who will be prevented going there by our diminished requirements. The result of that will be a very great advantage to the army obtained at a comparatively small cost, for the supernumeraries will be rapidly absorbed. The subject of military education is one not to be passed over without notice. My right hon. Friend opposite appointed a Commission on Education, of which my noble Friend (Earl De Grey) was the head. When the noble Lord accepted his present Office I had the good fortune to secure the services of Lord Dufferin as Chairman of the Commission, in which other changes have been made. I would only say that, as we are introducing scientific appliances in every branch of the service, it becomes more and more necessary that the men should be educated and the officers also, and it is impossible to attach too great importance to the investigation of the Commission. The Commission on Military Prisons has already presented a Report, and will soon make another and final Report. They have recommended the building of a central prison, so as to avoid imprisonment with the regiments, and they propose to introduce punishment of drunkenness by fines. We have paid attention to the latter recommendation in preparing the Mutiny Bill; but on discussing the prison question with Colonel Henderson the Inspector of Prisons, we found that until we had the complete Report of the Commission we could not arrive at any definite plan, nor submit an Estimate with confidence. Probably later in the Session, when the House has had time to consider the whole Report, we shall make a proposal for carrying out the recommendation. Hitherto, as the Committee are aware, the Indian arrangements have been conducted on the principle of the British Exchequer being reimbursed by a capitation grant on the number of men serving in India; but the plan has not been very satisfactory. I am afraid the depôts have been very costly, and the numbers of men at them has frequently exceeded the Estimate. When the additional 2*l*. was given to the army, no account appears to have been taken of it in the transactions between the Indian and the British Exchequer; nor, on the other hand was any account taken of the advantage to the British Exchequer gained by adopting the overland transit. If there was a gain to the Indian Exchequer in the earlier years, there has lately been a very considerable loss to it, amounting, for the last year, to £150,000; and the Committee will conclude that I shall take immediate steps to remedy this state of things. I thank the Committee for having listened to me with so much patience. There is only another subject to which I will allude. My noble Friend opposite (Lord Elcho) has given notice of his purpose to call attention to the degree to which civil preferment is given in foreign countries to men who have served in the army, amounting in France and Prussia to 8,000 civil places in the year. I do not see my way at present to any such magnificence; but I sympathize entirely with the object of my noble Friend, and, to a certain limited extent, I have carried it into effect. With regard to the War Department and the Horse Guards, the first step I took on receiving the Seals of Office was to direct my attention to the state of the relations which subsisted between the financial and the other branches of the War Department; and I thought, as it was a matter in which the Treasury was interested, as well as the War Department, that the best course I could take was to ask my noble Friend (Lord Northbrook), my right hon. Friend the Third Lord of the Treasury (Mr. Stansfeld), and Mr. Anderson, whose great experience and value in matters of this kind is well known, to look into the subject of the financial control. I purposely omitted from the Committee a single military officer, on account of the jealousy which has been expressed of the military element in the War Department; for I was determined that when their Report was presented to me there should be no pretence for saying that there was in it any bias derived from the military element. When the Committee has solved the question of financial control, they will next proceed to assist me in solving what is scarcely less difficult—as my right hon. Friend will bear witness—the task of defining and separating in our great manufacturing establishments that which savours of economy and skill in manufacture, and that which savours of science and professional knowledge. It was the opinion of the Committee, presided over by Lord Strathnairn, that the several manufacturing establishments should be placed under the charge of skilled professional men, in order that the highest efficiency and economy might be secured, while, as I have said, the present arrangements place those establishments under the direction of the control department. A third task I have intrusted to them is to overlook the whole establishment of the War Department, and H. R. H. the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief has requested that they will extend their inquiry to the Horse Guards. My hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. White), at an earlier period of the evening, complained of the largeness of those establishments. If I may borrow a phrase from another subject, I would say that if I can disendow with due regard to existing interests I shall be very glad to do so. I want to have in the higher branches of the service the greatest ability, the best quality, but not the largest quantity; and in the other branches, the purely mechanical parts, I shall be glad if I can make myself useful in contributing to find comfortable places for those who as soldiers have done good service for the country. I must apologize to the Committee for the length of my statement. I have endeavoured to convey to them what I thought they would wish to know with all the brevity I could master; and, in conclusion, I commend to their indulgence, Estimates which I do not doubt contain many imperfections. I was called upon to give the principal decisions which have guided their preparation within the first fortnight after my accession of Office, and they were in the hands of the printers within the first two months. All I can say is, that, while they have been founded upon a desire to promote economy, they have been founded upon a still stronger and deeper determination that nothing should be allowed to injure the efficiency of the service, or the interests of the country. I commend them to your indulgent consideration, in the firm belief that they are perfectly consistent with increased security of defence, and with the improved organization of all our military resources. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that the number of Land Forces should be fixed at 127,366 men, together with 1,760 Native Indian Troops.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: It is with pleasure I find myself able to commence the few observations I have to make by congratulating my right hon. Friend on the very clear and able manner in which he has made his statement, which I am bound to admit is of a very satisfactory character in many respects. And while I acknowledge the ability and the clearness of that statement, I am bound also to acknowledge the fairness and candour with which my right hon. Friend put his case before the Committee. My right hon. Friend commenced his statement by referring to the amount of reduction in the Army Estimates of this year as compared with those of last year. He stated that the amount of the reduction was £1,225,000. Now the first observation I should have been inclined to make on that statement has reference to the item of £136,000 for the pay of Indian officers on furlough, which has been taken out of these Estimates and charged in another manner, so that it will not come into the Exchequer; but I am saved from that by the perfect candour with which my right hon. Friend admitted that this item at all events will take so much from the ostensible reduction. According to my calculation the reduction after striking out this £136,000 will be £1,089,000. But there is a sum of £12,000, a saving alluded to by my right hon. Friend as having been made in Western Australia, and there was another item, the particulars of which I did not very well understand.

MR. CARDWELL: The first of these two items is £20,000, not £12,000; the second is the value of land purchased two years ago at North Woolwich, but which is not wanted now.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Well, then, the reduction would stand finally at £1,196,000. My right hon. Friend, speaking broadly, divided the reduction into two parts. One of these he spoke of as being attributable to the reduction in the number of the army; the other he attributed to economy arising from the introduction of the control system. My Estimate is that the saving which has resulted from the control system amounts to £535,000. [MR. CARDWELL: I calculate it at £549,000.] Then my right hon. Friend must give me credit for not having desired to exaggerate the result of that Estimate. I was cautious in the Estimate I made, because the saving effected by a considerable reduction in the army is spread over so many items of expenditure. But deducting £535,000 from £1,196,000 that leaves £661,000, which is the real difference obtained by the Estimates of the present Government, and to be attributed to the reduction of the army. It is to the reduction of the numbers of the army I wish, in the first instance, to address myself. The reduction in the number of men in the army is, in round numbers, 11,000; and it is a question of very grave national policy whether the Government are or are not justified in reducing our military strength to the extent of 11,000 men. But this admission I am bound to make—that if the Government thought it right to reduce the army to the extent of 11,000 men they have done it in the best manner. I very much doubt that so large a reduction is advisable; but what the right hon. Gentleman said in the first part of his speech is quite true. If the Government had looked only to a reduction of the Estimates they might have reduced the army by battalions; but they have pursued a course which is much more wise and patriotic, that whilst reducing the number of men they have retained the cadres of the regiments untouched, so that they have the skeletons of the regiments, and in any emergency have only to raise the number of men to revert at once to their previous strength. This does not, however, touch the question whether the Government are justified in reducing our military strength from 136,000 to 125,000 men. I might say, that having regard to the extent of our Empire and to that consideration which my right hon. Friend did not omit—namely, the military strength of other nations at the present moment—in my opinion a force of 136,000 men is not an overgrown standing army for this country. I will not say that if I had remained in Office I might not have thought it possible to make some reduction; and the reduction to which I am disposed to take least exception is that which my right hon. Friend is able to make by the diminution of our forces in Canada. While I readily admit that, under existing circumstances, the force in Canada was fairly open to reduction, yet I confess that I think that the present Government have carried that reduction rather beyond the point at which I should have been disposed to place it. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the proposal of the late Government upon this very subject; but what was that proposal? In the course of the last year we did recall a considerable number of our troops in Canada, and with a view to the coming Estimates we determined to withdraw more; but what was the principle which we had determined should regulate our proposed changes? That we should leave the military strength of England in Canada up to the point at which it had stood before the great increase which occurred some years ago in consequence of the Trent affair. We thought that a very fair criterion of the strength at which our army in Canada ought to stand. My right hon. Friend proposes to recall I forget how many regiments, but certainly a considerable number of battalions from our Eastern colonies. One battalion is to come from Australia, one from the Strait Settlement at Ceylon, and one from Hong Kong. There is indeed a very considerable reduction of our strength in that quarter of the world, and I do not feel disposed to concur in the course that the Government have taken. Looking to the nature of the service in those countries; looking to the climates that our troops have to operate in; looking to the uncertain nature of their duties and to the sudden calls that are made upon their strength in those distant parts of the world, I must say that I think that I trace in the recall of these battalions rather an undue disposition to obey a public cry for economy at any price. I doubt whether the Government is justified in this part of their proposal. The right hon. Gentleman gave no explanation why the battalions that are still to remain in the colonies should be reduced by eighty men. I am not aware of any reason for the proposed change. It seems to me to be a mere arbitrary reduction of men; and I venture to say the same thing with regard to the reduction of forty men per battalion at home. My right hon. Friend referred to the very high authority of the French Marshal M'Mahon, who expressed an opinion that, provided your cadre is complete, 500 men are enough for a battalion. But I cannot help thinking that 600 men form a very weak battalion, and I believe the Government might have exercised a better discretion if they had left our battalions at home at their strength of 600 men, so that the army would have been reduced to a less amount than is now proposed. I admit, however, that the extent to which the reduction in the army should be carried is a matter of national policy, upon which the Executive ought to be the best judges, seeing that it is in some respects also a colonial question. But I cannot help stating that, according to the opinion I have been able to form, these reductions have been carried to an injudicious extent. I have always doubted the wisdom of the system under which our regiments are sent out to the colonies of one strength, and are maintained at home of another strength. I have always thought that the British regiment should be a British regiment, whether at home or abroad. If such were the case, the great hardships which occasionally fall upon the Line regiments on their return to England by the reduction of their strength by two companies would be prevented. In consequence of the reductions proposed to be made by the Government there will be an unusual number of those double companies to be disposed of, and the result is that the Estimates show a considerable number of officers to be provided for. The right hon. Gentleman has not touched upon the subject; but I hope these officers may be gradually disposed of by absorption. Having made these observations with regard to the first part of the reduction, I would venture to refer to that half of the reduction which arises from the adoption of the control system. I think that great credit is due to the exertions, of which no doubt the right hon. Gentleman is aware, of Sir Henry Storks and General Balfour—for their great and incessant labours from the time they were intrusted by the late Government with their important and difficult duties. I confess that, with regard to Sir Henry Storks, my only fear has been lest, from the extent to which he has devoted himself to his difficult work, he should break down under the labour imposed upon him. The result has justified the wisdom of the Committee in recommending these changes, and does honour to the officers by whom the new system has been carried into effect. In consequence of the exertions of the control department, the Commissariat Estimate shows a saving of £8,000. One part of the arrangement of the control department has been to transfer the clothing department at Woolwich to Pimlico, thereby throwing two establishments into one, and I believe that a saving of £3,000 has thus been effected. There has also been a saving effected under the head of barracks of £3,900, of purveyors' offices of £4,600, of stores of £16,000, and in the purchase and manufacture of stores there is a reduction of expenditure to the amount of £500,000. The Committee must not, however, suppose that this is a sudden saving—that the expenditure has been reduced immediately from one amount to the other. Sir Henry Storks and General Balfour were appointed at the close of the year 1867, but the real action of the department did not commence until July last. Since that period, however, so successful has been the result of their action, that I believe that, at the close of the present financial year, there will be shown a saving in this department which I do not think I am over-estimating at £300,000. Nothing can be more fair than the spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman has referred to these reductions in the expenditure. For my own part, I believe that the saving resulting from the changes that have been effected will grow more and more important every year. I wish now to refer to the very interesting part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech which relates to our reserve, and I think that the Committee will naturally go with me when I say that the Government which has taken upon itself to reduce our military force by about 11,000 men is doubly bound to attend to the efficiency of our reserves. As the amount for standing force is reduced so do our reserves become more and more important. The outline of our present system of reserves, as the right hon. Gentleman is aware, was sketched by my immediate predecessor (General Peel); but on my succeeding him at the War Office it devolved upon me to propose it for acceptance to the House of Commons. In some few respects I departed from the intention of General Peel, and therefore I cannot say that he is altogether responsible for the present system under which our reserves are organized. Still, however, the main plan is that of General Peel's, although I did not adopt that portion of it which applied to the Militia. The right hon. Gentleman has expressed his doubts with regard to this portion of the plan, and I am aware that military men are divided in opinion upon its merits. The right hon. Gentleman said that, in the event of war, we should be diminishing our reserves by drawing away from the Militia a certain portion of the men who ought to constitute our reserves. That is true, as far as it goes ; but then the right hon. Gentleman should recollect that the Militia force was increased in order to supply that loss, and that in time of war the loss could be rapidly and easily made up by recruiting at home. As far as I am answerable for this portion of the reserve, however, I shall be quite willing that it should be reconsidered, and I should be prepared to consider any plan upon the subject which the right hon. Gentleman may propose in reference to it. I did not clearly understand from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman however what are the changes which he proposes to make in the present system, except that he proposes to cut off from the reserve that portion which we hoped to be able to obtain from the Militia. He sketched out to us a numerical strength, composed of so many regiments of Militia, so many Yeomanry, so many Volunteers, so many Pensioners, and "there," he says, "is your reserve." I gather from his statement, however, that although he does not intend to increase the force numerically, he does intend to improve its organization.

MR. CARDWELL: What I intended to say was that I took the same Estimate for the Militia reserve which was taken last year ; but I entertain great doubt whether it will not be more wise to expend that sum in adding a smaller number to the army of reserve than to pay them in their double capacity as both Militia and reserves.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I did not think I had misunderstood my right hon. Friend. But in either view, I am sorry to say, he is dealing with a very small number. I do not understand that he proposes to add numerically to the strength of our reserve. All I understand him to imply is, that we have 100,000 Militia, 150,000 or 160,000 Volunteers, and a certain number of pensioners, but that they are not in connection with one another or with the regular army, and that we stand in need of better organization in that respect. Then my right hon. Friend spoke in terms with which I most cordially concur of the value of our Militia force. I beg to say distinctly that no man in the House appreciates at a higher value than I do the noble Volunteer force which has come into existence within the last few years. But one result—a temporary result—of the formation of that force has been that our old and admirable Militia has been rather less considered than it used to be. I was therefore well pleased to hear from a Minister in the position of my right hon. Friend the just and proper recognition which he made of the value of that service. I am also glad to hear that he has determined to improve the position of Militia officers, and to endeavour to make the service more attractive. As to the abolition of the property qualification, I believe that, practically, that will have very little effect, but the increase from 1s. a day to 4s. is, as far as it goes, substantial. Something undoubtedly was needed in the direction of improving their position, for there has been great difficulty of late in obtaining Militia officers. The system will, I hope, be continued and carried out as far as possible of letting Militia regiments go into quarters with troops of the Line at Aldershot and elsewhere ; but I confess I do not like to hear of regiments going out without ensigns or lieutenants — mere skeletons, in fact, as far as officers are concerned. In one respect the statement of this evening disappointed me. During the time that I held the Office, in which I have been so worthily succeeded by my right hon. Friend, no consideration was more constantly pressed upon me—the justice of which I was obliged to admit—than that some improvement ought to be made in the position of quartermasters of Militia. He raised my hopes when he said he was going to do something for them ; and what did it turn out to be ? Why, that during the time the regiment was in quarters, the quartermasters were to have some modicum—I really do not know what it was—but something small during that limited period of the year. [An hon. MEMBER: A fortnight's pay.] Well, that is a very small matter. What occurred to me, and what I had resolved upon doing if the preparation of the Estimates had devolved upon me, was to give a retiring allowance to the quartermasters of Militia regiments. My right hon. Friend admits the existence of the evil, and I do not think it would be too late even now to make an arrangement of the nature I suggest, which ground that it would be too expensive. My best attention was devoted to the subject when in Office, and I then hoped that if it should be my fortune to introduce the Estimates this year I should be enabled to propose some well-considered plan for retirement in the non-purchase corps, so as to augment promotion. My right hon. Friend has said nothing on this point. I should like to know whether my right hon. Friend has any definite plan under consideration—whether he proposes to adopt the plan recommended by the Committee over which the First Lord of the Admiralty presided, or any other plan for the retirement of the members of these corps? I will conclude, as I began, by expressing the satisfaction I feel at being able to approve so much the tone my right hon. Friend has taken.

LORD GARLIES said, he felt the disadvantage which, as a new Member, he laboured under in addressing the Committee, but he was sure that that indulgence, which was usually granted to young Members, would not be withheld from him. Having held a commission in the army, for a period of fourteen or fifteen years, he naturally felt a great attachment to the service, and must plead that circumstance as his apology if his remarks were somewhat critical. Having heard the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Cardwell), he confessed he could not quite understand how he proposed to effect the reduction of £1,196,000 in this year's Estimates over those of the previous year. The Secretary for War had stated that the Estimates for this year showed a gross reduction on those of last year of £1,196,000; the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) had set down the difference at £1,089,000; but, from his (Lord Garlies') own examination of the Estimates, he found the difference to be £1,096,000. There was evidently, therefore, a mistake of £100,000 on the part of some one, and probably the Secretary for War would account for it by referring to his former statement that there was a great difference between the actual and apparent state of things; but if the reason was to be found in the sale during the coming year of a piece of land in the possession of the War Office, he did not see how the Government could claim credit for saving £100,000. How was the reduction brought about? According to the Secretary for War the decrease was owing to the reduction in the number of men, and further to the adoption of the control system, though it was not explained how the control system had had that effect. However, the Estimates seemed to show that the reduction was due in the main to the decrease in the number of men; and to the decrease in war material; in the gun factories, in the Royal laboratory department, and in gun carriages. In the gun carriage department he found a reduction of £33,935, in the gun factories £52,854, and in the Royal laboratory, £258,416, making a total of £345,205. If this were added to the decrease of expenditure on the men whom it was now proposed to reduce, it would be found that the two items made up the whole of the reduction of the Estimates. He doubted whether Sir George Lewis ever stated as had been represented by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White), that every soldier cost the country £100 on an average. What Sir George Lewis did say, probably, was that if the Army Estimates included 130,000 regulars, and that number was multiplied by 100 it would give the aggregate amount in pounds of the Army Estimates. It was equally true of the present and many previous years that if they multiplied the number of men for whom a Vote of money was taken by sixty-two and four-fifths, that would give the sum requisite in pounds, so, similarly, if they multiplied the number proposed to be reduced,—namely, 10,241 by sixty-two and four-fifths it would give the sum of £634,990. This year also there had been an item taken out of the first seven Votes, and transferred to Vote 13, which included barrack furniture. That Vote was the same this year as last—namely, £116,000, and if that were transferred back again and added to the sum he had already given, it would make £750,990, and if this sum were added to the amount he had given on the three departments of stores and war material, it would be found that the total sum came to within only £400 in saving over last year. Although, therefore, at the beginning there was an appearance of a saving of £1,250,000 on the Estimates, when they had deducted the actual cost of each man as in previous years, and added to that the actual lack of supply in war material, and the other item transferred of barrack furniture, these sums came to within £400 of the whole of these supposed reductions. The right hon. Gentleman ought to have reminded the Committee that they had been promised a greatly reduced expenditure combined with efficiency. Now, he could not think that the mere reduction of upwards of 10,000 men and a further reduction of war material could be considered as increased efficiency. He would first inquire into the cause of this reduced expenditure; next, the mode of carrying it into effect; then, its expediency as judged by results; and fourthly, the individual hardships it entailed. He trusted he should not be accused of party spirit, but it was matter of history that when the head of the present Government was trying to woo the constituency, for which he did not now sit, he started upon the great question of the day. It was not until near the month of November that he discovered the necessity of what was known to military men as "making a change of front in the face of the enemy," and not till then was the cry of increased economy heard. That, no doubt, was the first cause of the reduced army expenditure. As to the mode in which the reduction had been made, those who were present on Monday night, and heard the speech of the First Lord of the Admiralty on the introduction of the Navy Estimates must have thought it very curious that the reduction then proposed was planned on a totally different principle from that of the army. The First Lord of the Admiralty took considerable credit to himself (in which the Committee evidently concurred), for reducing the Navy Estimates without losing a single "blue-jacket," while the reduction of the Army Estimates was effected by reducing a large number of men. It might be supposed that the order for reduction came from the Treasury to both Departments on the same morning, that the Admiralty as the senior service claimed priority of choice as to the mode of reduction, and that one plan was to be tried in one service, and one in the other; or perhaps they had tossed up for it, and it had fallen to the luck of the First Lord to win, the result being that the right hon. Gentleman exclaimed, "I will keep the blue-jackets and sacrifice the clerks," while the Secretary of State for War said, "I will keep the clerks and down with the red tunics," and he was sorry to say the right hon. Gentleman took a few blue-jackets with them. The right hon. Gentleman's information seemed to him rather meagre in regard to the number of guns, gun carriages, and ammunition to be provided for. Nor did he tell the Committee whether the same amount would be expended in ammunition this year as usual, or whether there would be a saving in this item. The small arms were in a transition state, but he might ask the right hon. Gentleman, after he had supplied the whole of the Militia and the Volunteers with the present Snider, what number he would afterwards have in store, because he believed he was right in saying that no new rifles had been made during the last two or three years but muzzle-loaders only converted into Sniders. A large loan had been raised in 1860 for the construction of fortifications, and it was then understood that each year the Army Estimates should include an amount to mantle them with guns. About five-sixths of the fortifications had now been constructed, but one-sixth had not yet been mantled with guns. He asked what Estimate had been made for this purpose during the present year. Then, with regard to fortifications abroad, he believed an officer had been appointed by the Government of Lord Russell, in 1865, to examine into the condition of the fortifications at Malta and Gibraltar, and he wished to know if the right hon. Gentleman would lay the Report of that officer on the table. It was stated in the Estimates that a sum of £55,000 was still required for the works at Malta and £40,000 for Gibraltar. Why was there only £10,000 to be voted for the former and £15,000 for the latter? He was anxious to hear what the right hon. Gentleman had to say regarding the Army Reserve Fund. The balance of that fund, he understood, was to be transferred from the War Office to the Treasury on the 1st of January this year, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be kind enough to inform the Committee what arrangement was intended in case any half-pay officer wished to compound for the sale of his commission. He now came to the decrease in the number of men. Earl Russell appointed a Commission, because it was found impossible to obtain recruits, and they reported that, as our superiority at sea was somewhat diminished, 600 men per battalion were hardly sufficient for our home establishments, and in order to induce men to come forward in time of emergency the rate of payment was increased 2*d.* per day; but he doubted, if the necessity arose, that the right hon. Gentleman would be able suddenly to raise his 90,000 men up to 100,000. In regard to the colonies and the way in which the withdrawal of troops affected them, he did not pretend to be competent to judge; but as regards the interests of the mother country, he altogether denied the expediency of denuding our colonies of troops. In the event of a sudden war, as in the case of the Indian Mutiny, the battalions in our colonies were far more available than if they had been at home. Our colonies hitherto had been considered a sort of outwork to this country as regards military service, from and to which troops might be detached at any moment's exigency. It appeared from the right hon. Gentleman's statement that there was to be a reserve force, though nothing was actually settled in regard to it. It would be much wiser, then, not to reduce the regiments brought home until the nucleus of a reserve force had been formed. Until they had a reserve force this country, after the withdrawal of troops from the colonies, he thought, was in danger. It was said that the reduction in the cavalry was owing to the adoption of the squadron organization. But as long as he could remember the British cavalry had been worked by squadrons, and all that was now proposed was to extend the organization which prevailed in the field into the barrack-yard. But was it to be expected that five officers per squadron could do the work of six on that account? He believed this reduction of cornets was a great mistake. Cavalry were sent out a troop here and a squadron there, and the effect of the reduction would be that a troop or detachment would be sometimes left in charge of a non-commissioned officer. Now, recent experience of Fenianism in Ireland had shown how unwise it would have been to leave a troop in charge of a non-commissioned officer. One word as to the hardship which would be entailed on many deserving young officers if the proposed reduction were carried out. There were two classes of interest to be regarded—one which he might call existing interests, and the other more remotely vested interests; or, in other words, those who had the honour of bearing Her Majesty's commission, and those who were in training for that honour. There were 150 officers in the infantry to be reduced, or absorbed as it was called, and eighty in the cavalry, including the household regiments. Here, then, were 230 officers to be thrown out of employment, after having chosen a profession in which they expected to remain, and not to be cashiered. They were told that their services would be no longer required, which was practically the same as cashiering them. Many of those officers had been through various vicissitudes of climate, they had never been over paid, and to be treated in the manner now proposed was a rather harsh and summary proceeding, to say the least of it. Those who remained after coming home from foreign climates, instead of having a little leisure, would have to do double duty. Now, he considered that a very great hardship. Then with regard to the cavalry. The officers got for pay what might be called a high rate of interest on the sum expended on their commissions. They had to buy their chargers, and pay for their uniforms, and were put under stoppages for their forage; and now many of them were to be told that they would not be wanted any longer. With regard to the household cavalry, the saving to the Treasury would be very small indeed. The value of the twelve commissions that were to be reduced in the three regiments was £14,480; and if any hon. Member made a calculation he would find that it was no very high rate of interest that would make up the pay that these cornets received. He could not see the necessity of doing away with the cornets in these three regiments, whose duties were very onerous. In conclusion, he would plead in the name of his thirty brother captains, in the name of 200 subalterns, in the name of twice 200, the parents of these subalterns—that was as regarded existing interests, but with respect to remotely vested interests, in the name of the lads and their parents whose name was legion—and beg of the right hon. Gentleman to re-consider the case of those unfortunate dying patients, to stay the pruning-knife, and to confer instead the gift of the sword.

Lord Garlies

MR. O'REILLY said, that never before, during the eight years he had the honour of a seat in that House, had he listened with pleasure to a statement of military Estimates; but he had done so that night because he believed that those which the right hon. Gentleman had brought forward displayed a tendency to well-considered economy, and proceeded on a principle which might be carried further. He confessed that he took but very little interest in the discussions bandied about from one side to the other as to which had been the most economical; because there was no principle involved in the reductions which had been made of late years, and he had ventured on one occasion, with the approbation of the House, to sum up what had been done in that way by saying that nothing had been reduced but the men, and they had reduced themselves by the great falling-off which had occurred in the recruiting. A statement had been made by the late Sir George Lewis, which had been accepted by General Peel, that when once the House had voted the number of men everything was settled, for that £100 per man represented a fixed quantity which would never vary. He warned the House, however, not to wrap itself in fancied security on that account, because the sum was rapidly rising, and in a few years £100 would not represent the cost per man. He wished to say a few words on the reduction of the number of men. It would probably be repeatedly said that they were diminishing the strength of England if they consented to diminish the number of men on the Estimates. Let him call attention for a moment to what had been the number of men borne on the Estimates at different times, and what had been the cost. In 1837 the number of men voted, in round figures, was 101,000, and the estimated expenditure £8,000,000. In 1857 the number of men was 126,000, and the estimated expenditure £13,000,000, or correctly £12,993,235. In 1861, when the Army Estimates rose to their greatest height, and when Mr. Sidney Herbert in moving them described them as "enormous," and as the largest ever proposed in time of peace, the number of men was 143,000, and the estimated expenditure £16,000,000. In 1865 the number of men was 142,000, and the estimated expenditure £14,000,000. In 1869 the number of men was 125,000, and the estimated gross sum £14,230,000. It would be said, "Think of the increased demand for troops caused by our extended possessions in India." Now, he always included in the gross total the European troops in India as well as at home. Our demand for troops might be divided under these three heads—The force required for the defence of the United Kingdom and the Channel Islands, the force required for the defence of the colonies, and the force required for the maintenance of our Indian possessions. The number of our troops under each of those heads had been largely increased of late years, and they might be safely reduced still further than the right hon. Gentleman proposed, without in the least trenching on the security of the Empire. He would take the case of the colonies first; and he wished to grapple with the doctrine that we were bound to maintain troops in our colonies, properly so called, for their defence. He was not now referring to places like Gibraltar, Malta, and other military posts. It was simply idle to think of keeping efficient garrisons in time of war in our colonies proper. The moment a great coalition of foreign Powers was formed against us, that our fleets were worsted on the seas, and we were threatened in our island-home, what would be the first thing to do?—why, to withdraw every battalion from the colonies. An hon. Gentleman had admitted that even at the threat of war we should withdraw our troops from the colonies. What was that but saying that we nursed the colonies in time of peace to rely upon us for their defence, and that our first act in time of war would be to recall our troops from them? Now, in 1823, after the termination of the Great War, 43,000 men were deemed sufficient for the home service, and about 26,000 for the colonies. What the number for India then was he had not been able to ascertain. In 1831 the number of men for the home service was 50,000; for the colonies, 42,000; and for India 31,000; making together a total of 123,000. In 1841 the total number of troops rose to 134,000; and in 1851 to 149,000. Within the next decade came the addition caused, no doubt, by the great Indian War; and in 1861 the total number of European troops drawn from this country for home and foreign service was over 222,000 men.

Of these 74,000 were for home service, 55,000 for the colonies, and 83,000 for India. In 1866 it was 212,000, and in the present Estimate, the total number for 1869-70 was 195,000 men. In 1831 they had for India 31,000; in 1841, 40,000; in 1851, 45,000; in 1861, 83,000; in 1866, about 70,000; and for 1869-70 the number was 63,000. The increased demands of India accounted for only one-half of the increase in our total force between 1831 and the present time. Then, with regard to the force for the colonies, in 1823 it was 26,000 men; in 1866 it was 55,478; and in 1869-70 the right hon. Gentleman proposed to reduce it to 35,000 men, and during all these years our colonies, excluding India, had not largely increased. Now, if the force for India and for the colonies had not been diminished—as he contended it had not been—below the requisite standard, let them look at the figures of the home force. In 1823 the number of men deemed sufficient for home defence was 43,000; in 1831 it was 50,000; in 1841, 55,000; in 1851, 64,000; in 1861, 74,000; in 1866, 87,000; and now, under the right hon. Gentleman's reduced Estimates, they would have in the United Kingdom 92,000; or more than double the number thought sufficient in 1823. The true principle for the distribution of our troops was to preserve a sufficient army in India; to preserve a sufficient garrison for our military stations abroad; to concentrate the troops who might be necessary for China and Japan in one place as far as possible; to concentrate our forces in the same way at the Cape and our other great colonial stations; and to maintain a large and effective force at home for the defence of the country, and the support of whatever part might be attacked. It had been formerly thought that the country could be more easily "humbugged" into voting a large force if the troops were kept out of sight in the colonies; but the same jealousy in regard to the regular army did not now exist in the public mind as formerly. He therefore rejoiced to see not only the present reduction of the Estimates, but the change proposed by the right hon. Gentleman in the distribution of our force, which, he believed, would be attended with increased efficiency as well as with economy. The health of our troops, which suffered greatly in foreign climates, was a most important element in connection both with efficiency and with cost. The death-rate among our troops increased the moment they went out of England and the Mediterranean garrisons. At home the death-rate was about nine per 1,000; in India it was twenty-three per 1,000; and in China it reached as high as sixty per 1,000. In fact, when kept on foreign and unhealthy stations our troops not only cost us more, but they die far faster, thus involving a double loss to the country. In estimating how we could change the distribution of our troops, he would only refer to the infantry battalions. In 1866 we had at home, exclusive of the Guards, forty battalions; in the colonies, forty-nine; and in India fifty-two; but in January, 1869, the number of battalions at home was fifty-two; in the colonies, thirty-five; and in India, fifty-two—the same fifty-two; while the right hon. Gentleman proposed that in the current year there should be sixty-one battalions at home, twenty-eight in the colonies, and fifty-two, he presumed, in India. With regard to the number of troops which ought to be maintained in India he would express no opinion of his own, but would content himself with directing attention to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would find in his own Department a Report on the subject by Lord Strathnairn, who stated that 50,000 men would be a sufficient garrison for India, a number which would leave a margin of several battalions to be added to the home service. On the whole, he was of opinion that we might have sixty-eight battalions at home to seventy-three abroad, so that the proportion of service would be about six years at home to eight abroad, and if the right hon. Gentleman were able to reduce the number of battalions abroad he might also diminish the enormous depôts which we now maintained at home. Depôts were, in great measure, a dead weight in the army, as far as efficiency was concerned, and, in fact, they were the worst form in which men could be maintained. A considerable diminution, ought, therefore, to be effected in the number of depôts, and if this were done the right hon. Gentleman would be enabled to bring about another reform, which he had already aimed at with regard to shortening the term of foreign duty. He trusted he had been successful in showing that we might diminish the drain on the resources of England for the maintenance of an army of 200,000 men, without at the same time diminishing the efficiency of the service; and in considering this matter we ought never to lose sight of the fact that behind that army there stood an immense reserve force which did not formerly exist. Adverting to the question as to the cost of the administration of the army, the hon. and gallant Gentleman pointed out that in 1837 the total number of men was 130,000, and the total cost of administration £57,000, or 8s. 9d. per man. In 1865 the total number of men was 212,000, and the cost of administration £212,000, or exactly £1 per man; but in the present year the total number of men would be 195,000, and the total Vote £223,000, or £1 3s. per man. This was a subject which called for the careful consideration of the right hon. Gentleman. In speaking of our reserve forces the right hon. Gentleman had remarked that he felt great difficulty in arriving at a conclusion on the question of the Militia reserve. For his own part, he was at the time strongly in favour of the plan originally proposed by General Peel, although he confessed there was a difficulty, which appeared to him a grave one, with regard to any army reserve. The proposals in regard to them all amounted to this — that a small annual retaining fee should be given to a trained soldier in time of peace, subject to the condition that he should be liable to be called on, without any further pay, to enter the army in time of war. But the difficulty was, that at such a time the authorities always offered a large bounty to other men, even though they might be wholly untrained, to enter the service; whereas any advantage of this kind would be denied to men belonging to the reserve force. Referring to the subject of barrack accommodation, he drew attention to the circumstance of our having no fewer than 300 barracks in the kingdom at the present time, and contended that many of them might be beneficially abolished. It was objected that the Militia regiments should be limited to 960 men; but the rule having been heretofore to keep the Militia regiments 25 per cent under their strength, there was nothing lost by that proposal. There was another and a more difficult subject — the abolition of the system of purchase in the army — which would require attention; but it was only fair that the right hon. Gentleman should have time afforded him for giving that matter his serious consideration. There never would, in his opinion, be an efficient reform of the army till they got rid of the system of purchase. He regretted that the hon. Member for Hawick, &c. (Mr. Trevelyan), would not now advocate that change, as he had hitherto so ably done; but if the Government did not take up the question he would himself next year call the attention of the House to the subject.

COLONEL LOYD-LINDSAY said, he thought that the principle on which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) had proceeded to make his reductions was a sound one, and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would not only be able to carry out the reductions he had promised for this year, but that, proceeding on the same principle, he would be able to carry those reductions further in following years. At the same time he would urge upon the right hon. Gentleman that while, on the one hand, he withdrew some of the troops he ought, on the other, to give the colonies every facility and encouragement to perfect their own defences and strengthen their means of self-reliance. He did not desire to import the subject of the Volunteers into this debate unnecessarily; but he could not help thinking that the example of this country was sufficient to show that those who were engaged in many and different duties were still willing to give a portion of their time to acquire a knowledge of the use of arms sufficient to assure themselves against attack or invasion. The colonial Volunteers were, he believed, fully on a par, if not superior to the Volunteers in this country. He had the authority of a general officer who had been in the colonies, who had written to him the other day, and stated that when in Victoria, he found the Volunteers there an uncommonly fine body of men, well clothed, well armed, well drilled, smart, and subordinate. On two occasions he had taken them into the field for a week at a time, and he had every reason to be satisfied with them. They turned out about 3,000 men; their artillery was remarkably good, being in possession of both heavy and light Armstrong guns. He trusted, therefore, that every encouragement would be given to the movement in the colonies, and that even pecuniary assistance, if needed, would not be begrudged. The reduction of the West India troops proposed by the right hon. Gentleman was, he believed, a step in the right direction. Recruited, as they were, from the very lowest classes among the population, the four West India regiments were, he believed, not only of little real service, but they were regarded by the inhabitants with dislike and mistrust, because it was generally felt that in case of any difficulty or danger it would be better to be without them. In a letter from an Engineer officer at Barbadoes, the writer said it was the general opinion that in time of difficulty the troops would be a source of danger rather than security, and that the West Indies would be much safer without black troops at all, as their natural inclinations would lead them, in case of emeute or disturbance, to side with the lower classes. So far had that feeling gone that he believed the colonists of St. Vincent paid a detachment of the 47th Regiment in order to be certain of better protection. The officers were composed of three classes—those who, being too old to enter the Line, were thus enabled to get into the army by a side door; those who had been induced by bonuses to exchange into those regiments; and non-commissioned officers who had received promotion. The officers of each class alike would only be too willing to exchange into the Line. It was said that we ought to have these native troops for service on the west coast of Africa; but it should be remembered that the cost of maintaining these four regiments was something like £80,000 or £90,000 a year, and a saving to that extent might, he believed, be made without any corresponding disadvantage. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman should propose to reduce two batteries of artillery, which could ill be spared, because the Volunteers were deficient in this respect, and had to rely upon the regulars to supplement the deficiency. The increase in the home service arising from the withdrawal of troops for the colonies would, he believed, coupled as it was with the extra 2*d.* a day which had been granted to the pay of the soldiers, make the service infinitely more popular than it had hitherto been. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman was able to give instances of the growing popularity of the service, and that a better class of men could now be secured, as one proof of which he stated that recruits could now be sent to the depôts with railway tickets and not under the care of sergeants. At the same time he believed the resolution would be regretted in many of the colonies. It was advisable to retain the old soldier, and he would suggest that after ten years' service he should be allowed his six months' furlough and to re-enlist if he wished to do so.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had been much struck with the fact that the expressions of approval with which the right hon. Gentleman's speech had been greeted came chiefly from Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. Their policy was opposed to all change. ["No, no!"] They approved the Estimates because there was so little cutting down in them; but these Estimates had been received with qualified approval on the Liberal Benches, because hon. Members there were committed with their constituents to a policy of retrenchment. The reductions effected by the right hon. Gentleman were not so great as they desired; but they accepted them in consideration of the brief period within which the Government took Office, and in the next Estimates the country would expect a much larger cutting down. So far, the reductions seemed mainly confined to the rank and file. The higher offices in the army, such, for example, as the sinecure colonelcies, were left untouched. He had always understood that those colonelcies were reserved as the reward of distinguished military service. But two Royal Dukes held no fewer than five of them. The Prince of Wales was Colonel of the 10th Hussars and also of the Rifle Brigade; the Duke of Cambridge was Colonel of the Royal Artillery, the Royal Engineers, and of the Grenadier Guards. Now, he was not aware of any distinguished military service as yet performed by the Prince of Wales, and did not see why the Duke of Cambridge should hold a plurality of these appointments. He did not know whether any emolument was attached to those positions or not. If there was no emolument attached to them, it was high time that the country were told so, because undoubtedly there was a strong belief prevailing that emolument was attached to them, and that belief caused dissatisfaction. If there was emolument, he thought there was abuse.

LORD ELCHO said, he wished to bear his testimony to the admirable statement made by the Secretary for War. An hon. Member (Mr. O'Reilly) had said that he had been eight years in the House and had never heard with so much pleasure a statement made in introducing the Army Estimates. Now he (Lord Elcho) had been in the House for twenty-seven years, and during that time this was the first statement he had heard which seemed to shadow forth something like a better system, combining both efficiency and economy. The hon. Member (Mr. Anderson) had stated that on that (the Opposition) side of the House they were opposed to all change. Now he (Lord Elcho) occupying a neutral position, had no right to speak for others around him; but he himself had endeavoured to promote changes in military organization, believing that our military administration must be sadly in fault so long as £14,000,000 or £12,000,000 a year were expended with such miserable results, and believing also that payment by results here, as in education, was the real test. Then, as regarded expressions of approval, there appeared to him to be a great many cheers from the other side of the House, and Members who supported the Government seemed exceedingly well satisfied that their Secretary at War should have made so able a statement. He truly hoped that the speech of his hon. Friend (Mr. Anderson) would be well reported in the Glasgow Daily Mail. At this late period of the evening he would not enter at any length into the points in the statement of the Secretary for War. He thought the policy of endeavouring to withdraw troops from the colonies as far as possible was sound. There was one point on which he must sincerely congratulate his right hon. Friend. Some years ago he had resisted, in company with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the construction of fortifications in Canada. On that occasion they divided with a very small minority, and were beaten—horse, foot, and artillery. But he had ventured to make a little bet with his noble Friend the then Secretary of State for War (Earl De Grey and Ripon), that, in spite of the Vote in favour of these fortifications, not a sod would be turned at Montreal, and he won his bet. Whether through the influence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer or not, the policy of withdrawing troops from an indefensible line of frontier was now being adopted, and very properly so. With regard to the question of foreign service, it was most unjust that soldiers should be only four years at home and twelve abroad. If you wished men to volunteer readily you must allow them to be at least an equal time at home as abroad, and the change proposed by the right hon. Gentleman in this respect was satisfactory. The principle of shorter enlistments was also a sound one, as was that of not needlessly encumbering ourselves with munitions of war. There were certain points connected with the Estimates on which he might have something to say hereafter. But he must express his satisfaction at finding that his right hon. Friend was in favour of providing civil employment for old soldiers. He (Lord Elcho) meant to ask for a Committee on this subject, and hoped to receive the support of the Secretary of State, whose hands would be greatly strengthened by the appointment of such a Committee. As to the purchase system, it was the greatest mistake on the part of army reformers to touch it. The officers did not wish the system abolished; the non-commissioned officers valued civil employment much more than the prospect of a commission. Men experienced in the civil administration of the army were in favour of purchase, and economists should remember that it would cost £10,000,000 to abolish it. He wished the House to remember that military organization meant such a system as would provide an army complete in all its parts, and capable of immediate expansion whenever the exigencies of the country required it. At present the country had got nothing of the kind, and the great question for the Government to solve was how to obtain a sufficient reserve for the time of war.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he believed that more economies might be effected without diminishing the efficiency of our forces. He should at all times go in for the efficiency of the army and navy, and for placing in the field the greatest number of men at the least possible cost. He denied that either side of the House, or any particular class of Members of the House, possessed a monopoly of interest in that question. It was quite true that some of them were not military men, and they did not, therefore, venture to express their opinions with the same confidence as some of the hon. and gallant Members who had spoken. There were some things that they did understand, however; they understood business, and they knew that the contract system with reference to both army and navy had been a disgrace to us for years past. The purchasing functions of the Government had been shamefully abused. He, for one, felt that it was a discredit that the British Government, which was the largest, the best, and the safest paymaster in the world, should buy its articles in the worst possible manner, and, instead of going to the seat of manufacture, let them pass through three or four hands. He rejoiced at the excellent statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. He believed that it would be most satisfactory to the country; but he believed the country would expect that by this time next year the right hon. Gentleman would be able to afford further reductions without reducing the efficiency of the service.

COLONEL BRISE, speaking on behalf of the Militia officers, felt highly grateful for the efforts the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War was making to render the service more effective. He feared, however, that his efforts would not be as successful as could be desired if they were confined to the abolition of the property qualification for officers and an increase of pay and allowances. He strongly urged that greater inducements should be held out to Militia officers in the shape of commissions in the regular army. As to the Militia reserve force, he could only at that hour of the evening say that his experience of it had not been so favourable as he could have wished.

SIR WILLIAM RUSSELL thought that the policy which the Secretary for War had adopted in regard to the colonies was the only one which could serve us in time of war; and that which he had announced with regard to the reduction of men was, he believed, the right one, and it was, at any rate, one always recommended by the late Duke of Wellington. He hoped the Secretary for War would pursue the course he was adopting in regard to short enlistments, which, he believed, would tend to make the service much more popular than it now was. There was one thing in which the right hon. Gentleman should be very cautious. He was evidently under the impression that he had a reserve; but he believed that was a mistake which would be most fatal when a reserve was most needed. The only true reserve the country could have was the Militia as the first reserve and the Volunteers as the second; and those must be combined with the regular army so as to make it one great force. It was not wise policy, in his opinion, to reduce rapidly the ranks of the junior officers in the army.

MR. NEVILLE - GRENVILLE referred to the speech of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) as being more worthy of the hustings than of the House of Commons, and thanked the Secretary of War for the way in which he had introduced the Estimates. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to the Question he put early in the Session with reference to the Yeomanry Cavalry. He was perfectly sure that, so long as Government would accept the services of the Yeomanry, that gallant body of men would be willing to place their services at the disposal of their country, but they would never be content with the half existence which not calling them out implied. If Government thought lightly of the services of Yeomanry it would be much better to disband them at once; but if they valued that force it should be regularly trained.

MR. MACFIE, whilst thanking the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War for the information he had given, and for the light he had thrown upon the question of supernumerary officers of all ranks, wished to know whether it had been determined upon what system the military defence of the Empire was to be conducted in the future; whether the colonies had been consulted; and, whether the highest military authorities had given any advice to the Government on the subject?

GENERAL PERCY HERBERT expressed the satisfaction with which he heard of the right hon. Gentleman accepting the office of Secretary for War, and said that satisfaction had been increased by the speech the right hon. Gentleman had delivered, which showed that he had bestowed much attention and labour upon a difficult subject. The answers which the right hon. Gentleman had given to questions about military organization showed that he was satisfied with the strength of his position—that he was satisfied he had ample powers, and that he accepted the full responsibility of controlling everything connected with the army. Whilst taking no exception to the reduction of some of the batteries of the siege or dismounted artillery, he was sorry the right hon. Gentleman proposed that four batteries of field artillery should be converted into siege artillery. It should be remembered that field artillery was a force it was difficult to bring to perfection; that the proportion of field artillery we had now would be insufficient in the event of the Militia being called out along with the regular troops, and that there would be great difficulty in bringing it up to its fair proportion. The greatest reduction was to be made in the drivers, just the men of all others whom it was most difficult to replace, for their training required a considerable time, and we should require a larger number of them to give a proper proportion of waggons to the field artillery, and to enable us to increase the field artillery, so as to give due support to our Line regiments and Militia, and enable them to meet foreign infantry upon even terms. It must also be remembered that a great many drivers would be required for field ammunition. With respect to the Line regiments, he believed that 560 men were too few to constitute an efficient battalion. They had had practical exemplifications of this during the Crimean War. Previous to the outbreak of that war we raised the strength of the regiments that were sent out from 750 or 800 to 960. This increase, however, was effected by drafting the men out of other regiments; and the consequence was we soon had to send out regiments weak in numbers and embracing many raw recruits. This system was most injurious because it risked the fair fame of the British Army; and yet the right hon. Gentleman was following it. He spoke rhetorically of a battalion of 560 veterans, forgetting that recruits and sick men were included. When Marshal M'Mahon spoke of a cadre of 500 men being sufficient for a battalion in time of peace he knew there was a reserve of trained men, and that he could have battalions of 1,100 men at a fortnight's notice. But that was not our position; we had practically no reserves. The pensioners might be useful behind a wall, but they were unfit for the field. He disapproved, therefore, of that part of the right hon. Gentleman's scheme. There was room for effecting great economy—to the extent of £700,000 or £800,000 a year—by discontinuing the re-engagement of men after ten or twelve years' service. There was no more expensive article in the world than a re-engaged soldier. Three out of four of those re-engaged were not fit for the field, after five years further service, but they were able to earn their livelihood, and, perhaps, a better livelihood than if they had remained agricultural labourers. He would permit the re-engagement for the present of men who had risen to the rank of sergeant, but he would positively forbid the re-engagement of any man below that rank. Of course there would be a great advantage in retaining the non-commissioned officers, because sergeant-majors and others occupying that position were of a calibre which it might be difficult to find among younger men. In order to inflict the less hardship on the men it would be well, too, he thought, to follow very liberally the suggestion which had been made by General Peel, to the effect that when a regiment came home in ordinary quiet times those who had completed, say, nine years' service should not be required to complete their twelve years. The result of adopting that system would be that we should have trained young men, should anything occur to render their services necessary, in a few years afterwards, in the place of soldiers who had completed their service. A good deal might be done, he might add, in the direction of bringing about a greater union between the Militia and the army by getting Militia regiments to be connected with battalions of the Line, and sending commissioned and non-commissioned officers together with drums and fifes and bands to their head-quarters during the time when they were out for training. In time of war there would be no lack of Militia officers to enter the service. The suggestion of General Peel that there should be a certain number of men serving with the Militia and receiving extra pay as supernumeraries, and liable to be transferred at a moment's notice from headquarters to any branch of the service, was, he believed, a very good one, and he was sorry the right hon. Gentleman opposite appeared to speak slightly on the point, because in no other way could we, in his opinion, secure so large and valuable a Reserve Army.

MR. RYLANDS expressed his satisfaction with the statement of the Secretary for War, and with the reductions that had been effected. Our military expenditure since the commencement of the present century exceeded the National Debt, its amount being £965,440,916. The extraction of this sum from the country must have trenched considerably on the comforts of the poor. It was the duty of the Government in the interest of the community at large, and especially of the working classes, to do all in their power to diminish it. He was glad therefore that a considerable reduction had been announced to-night, and he hoped that there would be further reductions. He was glad to hear that the colonies were to be called upon to bear a greater proportion of the military expenditure connected with them. The cost of the force in the various colonies was put down at £2,589,886, against which there was put down a probable return of £352,000, leaving nearly £2,250,000 as the sum to be provided by this country. But this was not all, for in a note it was stated that this did not include the expense of administration and non-effective charges, nor the cost of accoutrements, barrack hospital and other stores, and probably the cost of the colonies to this country was not less than from £5,000,000 to £6,000,000. And what was there in return to show to the poor working classes of this country? We received no benefit whatever from Canada, for instance, where there was a large expenditure of money by the Imperial Government. We were met by hostile tariffs. It appeared to him there was no reason why we should not leave these important colonies to bear the whole of the expenditure for their own defence.

COLONEL NORTH, while thanking his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War for the clear and explicit statement which he had made in introducing the Estimates, said he would gladly have supported a Vote for a larger sum than was proposed to be taken, because he thought it was unfortunate that the army should be reduced at the present moment, when we had not anything like a sufficient reserve force. He wished, he might add, to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the position of the Cape Mounted Rifles, a corps which was originally composed of natives of the Cape, but which now consisted almost entirely of Europeans, the natives having one fine day deserted to the enemy. The corps performed the duties of cavalry soldiers. Notwithstanding that, the soldiers did not receive even the additional pay of soldiers of the infantry of the Line. With regard to the reduction in officers, he could not help thinking that the proposition of his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War was not a wise one. He was the more convinced of this from the statements of the hon. and gallant Member for Norwich (Sir William Russell). It was true that his right hon. Friend proposed to carry out the reduction in the easiest manner; but still it would stop promotion. With regard to the three regiments of household cavalry, he held in his hand a statement of the duties performed by the officers of those regiments, and certainly their duties were very numerous. On occasions of Drawing Rooms and other Court ceremonials the whole of the officers were on duty—the barrack duties being performed by the Staff. They had to do duty with escorts for the Prince of Wales and other members of the Royal Family, street parties, and the guards of honour. The hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House (Mr. Rylands) had spoken of the expense of the army for the last sixty-nine years. He would ask the hon. Member whether he had made any calculation as to the advantage which the mercantile community had enjoyed in consequence of the services of the army both up to 1815, when the Great European War closed, and since that period. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Anderson) delivered a speech which would have been more worthy of the hustings than of the House of Commons. If he had gone to the Horse Guards he would have had every information given to him there; and might have learnt that the Prince of Wales received no emolument from the Rifle Brigade, and that the Duke of Cambridge received none from the Engineers or Artillery. It was a gratification to the public as well as to the corps themselves that the Rifle Brigade should be commanded by a gallant Prince, the heir to the Throne, and that the Engineers and the Artillery should be commanded by a distinguished Prince who in the field of battle had rendered glorious service to his country.

MAJOR DICKSON was of opinion, from personal experience, that the cavalry regiments had not too many officers. It was a mistake to suppose that officers had no other duties to perform than those of field days. Their garrison duties were very numerous. He had known a case in which three officers of one squadron were killed on the field of battle, and a fourth wounded. Cavalry officers could not be supplied at a moment's notice in case of emergency. It required a year's training to make a cavalry officer fully acquainted with his duties. He called upon the Secretary for War to re-consider his decision on this matter.

SIR JOHN HAY observed that his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War had not spoken of any guns of greater calibre than twelve tons. There were at this moment nine ships being built, each of which would carry guns of a greater calibre than twenty tons. He believed that one eminent manufacturer was now making a gun of forty-three tons. He therefore hoped that his right hon. Friend had it in contemplation that guns of more than twelve tons would be required for some of our ships. He did not know whether it was the intention of the Government to have a separation of the sea service ordnance from the land service ordnance. Now, though separate departments might have charge of each ordnance respectively, he did not think it would be desirable, either as regarded efficiency or as regarded economy, to separate the manufacturing establishments. If there were separate manufacturing establishments, we should not have identical ordnance. On a memorable occasion guns from the fortress at Gibraltar re-placed guns on board ship; and other occasions might arise when our having identical ordnance on land and sea would prove to be of great advantage.

MR. CARDWELL thanked the Committee for the marked kindness with which they had received his statement. With respect to the observations of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), he would remind his hon. Friend of the old maxim that you should not start on a journey at a greater speed than you will be able to keep up. He thought it would not have been judicious of the Government to have been hasty and presumptuous in making great changes in the army before there had been time to consider them. The hon. Member for Glasgow had made an imputation, for the correction of which he was indebted to his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Oxford (Colonel North). What his hon. and gallant Friend had said with regard to the terms on which two illustrious Princes commanded certain regiments was quite correct. Their Royal Highnesses received no pay for those additional commands which they had been charged with holding in plurality, nor did their holding them keep any rich prize from deserving officers, while it afforded much gratification to the regiments themselves. He was not aware that there was any intention to separate the manufacture of the sea service ordnance from that of the land ordnance. When he spoke of 12-ton guns, he did so in reference to the column in the Votes for the guns for the land service, but all the demands of the navy had been complied with. Upon the question of the Reserves he might repeat what he had previously said, that he was endeavouring to obtain the best opinion upon the subject, with a view of turning the money for Reserves included in the present Estimates to the best possible advantage. With regard to the question of the contracts, he had to say that Sir Henry Storks, whose name was a guarantee for his perfect fitness for anything he undertook, was directing his attention to the whole question, with the view of ascertaining what was the best arrangement that could be entered into with regard to them. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Longford (Major O'Reilly) had spoken of the cost of the depôts. He agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend that that cost was much greater than it ought to be, and he hoped that he should be able to reduce it. With regard to the cost of the administration of the Army, it would be noticed that, owing to the operations of Sir Henry Storks, and to one or two appointments that had been made, including that of the Governor of Guernsey, certain salaries of a higher class had disappeared from the Estimates. With regard to any reduction in the lower places, he must wait for the Report of the Committee which had been appointed to consider the subject, but any reduction that would be made would be conducted on the principle of having a careful and considerate regard for the interests and feelings of those whose positions would be affected by the proposed changes. As long as these conditions were kept in view, he should be glad to carry into effect any scheme for retrenchment that the Committee might suggest. The right hon. Gentleman who had preceded him in Office (Sir John Pakington) had observed upon various points in his speech in a most courteous manner; but one or two matters to which he had referred required some explanation. The right hon. Gentleman had found some little fault with the reductions in our forces proposed to be effected by the present Administration. The reductions in Canada would not reduce the force below 4,000, which was nearly one-fourth more than the number of troops maintained there in 1853. The reductions in the eastern colonies would not be great, as the following figures would show:—In the Straits Settlements the number of troops proposed to be maintained was 1,722, as against 1,609 for last year, and in China, which included Japan, 2,266, against 2,685 for last year. He had been particularly desirous of reducing the force in Hong Kong, in consequence of the unhealthiness of the climate and the expense of lodging the troops. The changes that had been effected in the force stationed at that place and at Galle would result in a considerable reduction of expenditure, and in an improved distribution of the troops. The question of the quartermasters was a very small one, only involving an expenditure of a few hundreds of pounds, and really, amid the multifarious matters to which he had had to direct his attention, he had not had time to look thoroughly into a question which, though small in itself yet, as an increase of the non-effective Vote, required some attention. He would, however take the matter into future consideration. Then he came to a more important matter—namely, who was to be the head of the

Arsenal. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to think that this question was one of principle, whereas in point of fact it was one which must be solved by laying down sound practical rules, and when solved it would require considerable judgment and good temper on the part of those in authority to carry into effect the determination that might be arrived at in respect to it. All he could say to the right hon. Gentleman was that the whole subject of how far the management of that department was to be intrusted to the control department, and how far it was to be intrusted to the Director General of Ordnance, was one of the questions which the Committee would consider in the course of their inquiries, and as soon as he was aware of the result of those inquiries he would communicate it to the House. The finance control was one of the first questions the Committee would have to report upon; that Report he had not yet received, but as soon as it came into his hands he would also make known its purport to the House. The right hon. Gentleman had made some remarks upon the hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian), which he thought were undeserved. The hon. and gallant Member had really worked very hard during the period he had been in the War Office, and he could say with perfect sincerity that he had been very much indebted to him for the valuable services he had rendered him. His knowledge of military matters was very limited, and he had been greatly assisted in his labours by the suggestions which had been offered him by the hon. and gallant Member. The retirement of Artillery and Engineer officers was not as simple a matter as it appeared at first sight. Retirements from one branch of the service must be considered with relation to all the other branches. Only yesterday the case had been mentioned of what was called the supercession of officers on the English list by officers on the local Indian list, which was considered a grievance, because it gave commands to younger men. His right hon. Friend found that the actuaries raised considerable difficulties with regard even to a scheme of partial retirement. More time, therefore, would obviously be requisite to mature any general scheme on the subject. The question, moreover, of the mode of retirement would necessitate an Act of Parliament, of the introduction of which during the present Session notice had been already given. Until it was ascertained, therefore, how far such a measure was likely to prove acceptable to Parliament, it would be more judicious on his part to abstain from making any proposals of his own, which would be dependent on that Bill for being carried into effect. As to proposed changes in the cavalry, all he could say was, the endeavour had been to effect these in such a way as, while laying down principles of economy for the public benefit, to occasion as little inconvenience and injury to individuals as possible. His belief was that they had effected the proposed reductions in that spirit, and that when examined the changes would prove to be acceptable.

(2.) 1,760 Native Indian Troops.

(3.) £5,313,800, General Staff and Regimental Pay, Allowances, and Charges.

Friday, 12th March, 1869.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Hypothec appointed.

PUBLIC BILL—First Reading—Bankrupt Law
Amendment (Ireland)* (30).

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE, in moving that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Law of Hypothec in Scotland, said that, as many noble Lords were probably strangers to the law of hypothec as it obtained in Scotland, it would be necessary to enter into some explanation of its operation. In the first place, the Scotch law of hypothec was analogous to, though not precisely identical with, the law of distress in England and Ireland—a law which gave to the landlord, if the tenant should be unable to pay his rent, the right to distrain upon his crops or furniture. In fact, it gave to the landlord the first claim upon either crops or furniture, and entitles him to receive his rent before any creditor could recover any portion of the debt owing to him. This was not altogether a new question. In the year 1864 a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the subject, and in 1867, under the late Government, an Act was passed which was introduced by a noble and learned Lord who was then Lord Chancellor (Lord Chelmsford). That measure did to a certain extent remedy what was held to be a grievance. The passing of the Act, however, could hardly be said to have settled the question, for there had been in Scotland for some time a great deal of discussion upon the subject. Last Session the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Carnegie) introduced a Bill in the other House to abolish the right of hypothec. His hon. Friend did not succeed in passing his measure, but he (the Earl of Airlie) understood that he had again this Session introduced a Bill with the same object. He would not now discuss the provisions of that Bill, which was not before the House, nor would he speak of what might or might not be the fate of that Bill. He only referred to it because he understood one of the most important stages of the Bill was fixed rather late, and as there was a considerable pressure of Business in the other House, it might happen that the Bill might come up to their Lordships at so late a period of the Session that they could have no alternative but either to reject it altogether, without discussion, or pass it without due consideration. He thought therefore their Lordships would agree that it would be better to grant a Committee of Inquiry into this Act, so that they might be able to ascertain whether any further legislation upon the subject was required; and, if so, what ought to be the scope and tendency of such legislation. It was argued by those who desired the abolition of the law of hypothec that there was no reason why the landlord should have any priority of claim in the event of the bankruptcy of the tenant. It was said that this was unfair to the general creditors, and that it was injurious to the tenant himself, inasmuch as it induced a large number of occupiers to compete for farms, and thus raised the rent. It was said that the law was pernicious to agriculture, because, by its peculiar operation, it prevented the farmer from obtaining such facilities as he ought to have for procuring artificial foods and other things—indispensable to high farming. These shortly were the arguments which were used against the law of hypothec, and they were arguments which applied equally against the law of distress. Now, there was a great contrast between the great breadth of the principles which were laid down, and the very narrow and limited area in which it was proposed to apply them. The arguments which were urged, if good against hypothec in Scotland, were equally good against the law of distress in England and Ireland. He did not mean to say that there might not be exceptional circumstances which might justify exceptional legislation, and if it could be shown that the condition of agriculture was more backward in Scotland than in England and Ireland, and that on the whole the occupiers of land, as a class, were less comfortable and happy, and that the position of the agricultural population was altogether less satisfactory, then indeed a case would be made out for dealing with the question in Scotland, and leaving it alone in England and Ireland. It seemed to him that the burden of proof lay with those who demanded this exceptional legislation to show that such legislation was necessary and expedient in Scotland as, judging by the mode in which they proposed to proceed, they thought neither expedient nor necessary in England nor in Ireland. To compare for a moment what had been proposed for Scotland with what had been proposed in the case of Ireland. They were told by people who were entitled to be listened to at all events with attention and respect, that the land tenure question of Ireland was at the root of the Irish grievance. Now, in 1866 a measure was brought forward by the Government of that day which dealt with the question of land tenure in Ireland. It was introduced by the right hon. Gentleman who was then, as he is now, Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. C. Fortescue), and he (the Earl of Airlie) referred to that measure because he believed it was considered satisfactory even by the most ardent advocates of tenant-right. The measure failed, not so much on account of the opposition on the part of the tenant-right party, as on the part of those who advocated the side of the landowners. That measure dealt with the law of distress, and dealt with it in this manner—it abolished the presumption in favour of the law of distress, unless there was an agreement in writing between the landlord and the tenant that the right of distress should be retained; but the measure now asked for in the case of Scotland went beyond this. If the measure was carried by those who desired the abolition of the law of hypothec, the law would then over-ride any contract which might be made between the landlord and tenant. He was not there to discuss the merits of the proposition, or whether it was right or wrong—all he wished to point out was this, that the proposition made in regard to Scotland went very far beyond—as far as, he believed, beyond any proposition ever made even in the case of Ireland. Now, no doubt there were differences between the position of the landlord in Scotland and the position of the landlord in England; but it did not appear to him that the position of the Scotch landowner was so exceptionally favourable that he should be legislated for in such a way as to impair the security which he now had in reference to the holding of his land, and yet leave the English law untouched. In England, as their Lordships were aware, it was the occupier of the land who payed the tithes and rates; he also paid the property-tax, but he deducted the amount from the rent. On the other hand, there were charges upon the land and upon the landowner in Scotland which did not at all fall upon the land or landowner in England—and, in point of fact, the case with regard to England was reversed in Scotland. In Scotland the landlord was liable to payment of half the poor rate. He was also liable for the whole of the county rates; and, in addition to this, he was liable for the whole burden of the maintenance of the Established Church. Beyond all this, in Scotland the landowner was charged with building and repairs of schools. He was also liable for half the amount of the schoolmaster's salary, and for the building repairs of the house of the clergy, and for the building and repairs of the churches; whereas in England the church rate had been abolished. Now, in Scotland, for all these charges the landowner was liable, whether he received one penny of his rent or not; and he thought it would be a very proper subject for a Committee to inquire into, whether, supposing the Legislature should think fit to abolish the security which the landlord now had for the payment of his rent in the case of a bankrupt tenant, he should be left still subject to all these charges. There was another point. Supposing the law of distress to be abolished, how would that affect those who held what in Scotland were called heritable bonds, and in England first mortgages on landed estates? At present the security of the holder of the mortgage was as perfect as it could be; but his security for his interest could not be better than the security of the landlord for his rent. If the landlord agreed to pay the interest, the mortgagee stepped into the shoes of the landowner, and sequestrated the rent; and if the tenant failed it was clear that for so much of the interest his security was less than it was before. It was all very well to say that the mortgagee could foreclose, or require his principal to be paid. So he might, no doubt; but, in the first place, men who invested their money in mortgages on land generally did not want to be paid. What they wanted was to secure an easy investment of their money. If you diminish the security for the rent, it was clear that you depreciated the value of the land; and if that was so—if the value of the security was depreciated—one of two things would happen—either a larger margin would be required, or the rate of interest would be raised; and probably both would happen. But every one knew that the larger part of the improvements made on landed estates were made with borrowed money, for very few landlords could make them out of their incomes. But he would leave this matter to the attention of those Gentlemen who said that the law of hypothec stood in the way of the improvement of the land, and would ask them to consider whether, if they diminish the security, and supposing the security to be unpaid, that would not have the effect of diminishing the landowners' power of raising money, and thereby prevent or stand in the way of improving the land? Then it was said that the landowner ought to take care to get tenants with plenty of capital, and then there would be no doubt as to his rent. In general, owners of land were anxious to get tenants with capital, and for certain descriptions of farms there was no difficulty in getting tenants with abundance of capital. There was no difficulty in getting tenants with capital for farms which were of good soil and which were favourably situated as regards climate. There was no difficulty in getting tenants with capital for large grazings; but there was a large amount of land in Scotland which lay on the verge between the pasture land and the arable country, and was formed into small farms of not very good land, with a not very favourable climate. Those farms were occupied for the most part by men of an industrious and deserving class, who were, in the first instance, generally without any capital; and it was impossible for them on entering their farms to pay their rent in advance, or even to pay it within a short time afterwards. He knew cases where many of these men had risen from being shepherds, ploughmen, or agricultural labourers, but who were now in the occupation of very good farms, with very fine land indeed; but he did not believe that those men would ever have had the opportunity if it had not been that the landlord was enabled to give them credit for the rent they had to pay at first. For his own part, he saw no great cause for fear with regard to the landowner. He thought he would be able to secure his rent. They were in the possession of property for which the demand was great, and continually increasing, and they were in a position to make their own terms; but he did fear that, if this law of hypothec was abolished unconditionally, it would place a very great hardship on a very deserving and industrious class of men. What would be the consequence in the case of those farms of very moderate fertility and bad climate to which he had alluded? He believed that, if they took into account the expense of repairs, the landowner did not derive much more profit from them than he would have if they were in grass, in a state of nature; but, so long as his rent was paid, he preferred that these men should hold them. But if they imported into the contract the element of uncertainty, and made it very doubtful whether he would be sure of receiving his rents or not, what he would naturally do would be this—He would consolidate those farms, throw them into large grazings, and either stock them himself or let them to men of capital who would be able to pay rent. That was a change which could not be gone through without creating great hardship and suffering to those who might occupy those farms. He had seen in one of the local papers an account of a meeting held by members of the Rossshire Farmers' Club, which was largely attended by tenant farmers, who agreed unanimously to petition against the abolition of the present law of hypothec. If your Lordships would grant this Committee, he hoped they would be able to begin work soon after Easter, and he trusted that in a reasonable space of time they would place before their Lordships such information as would enable them to come to a right conclusion upon the question.

Moved, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the law of Hypothec in Scotland.—(The Earl of Airlie.)

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he had listened with great interest to the very able and clear statement of his noble Friend, who, he thought, had put the whole question before the House in a very clear manner. He thought it very desirable that this matter should be investigated by a Committee of that House.

The Earl of Airlie.

He entirely agreed with the general principle laid down by his noble Friend, that this question could not be considered only in reference to Scotland; he thought the Committee should consider the relation in which the law of hypothec in Scotland stood to the law of distress in England and Ireland, and to the existence of similar provisions—he was told there were such provisions—for the security of the landowner in other countries of Europe. It would be most satisfactory, having regard to the general principle of jurisprudence, and it would be found convenient for the Committee to inquire into the rights of the owners of the soil in this country and in Europe generally. On behalf of the Government, he fully concurred in the Motion.

LORD CAIRNS asked, what would be the form of reference, so as to enable the Committee to include an inquiry into laws with regard to other countries, and to all parts of the United Kingdom as well as to Scotland?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, the Motion referred only to the law of hypothec; but he apprehended it would be quite competent for the Committee to inquire into the relation of that law to similar laws in other places.

THE EARL OF SELKIRK was understood to approve of the appointment of a Committee, but desired to point out that the Act of 1867 had been so short a time in operation that its effect could scarcely be ascertained at present.

Motion agreed to.

And, on Thursday, 18th March, the Lords following were named of the Committee:—

BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the law of Bankruptcy in Ireland—Was presented by The Marquess of CLANRICARDE; read 1^a. (No. 30.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

Committee — Report — Consolidated Fund
PEEBLESSHIRE.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE presented a Petition from certain Electors of the Counties of Peebles and Selkirk, complaining that, at the last General Election, upwards of fifty of the voters had a qualification of an "illusory character;" that arrangements were being made for largely increasing the same description of votes; and praying the House to afford a remedy. He begged to move that the Petition be read by the Clerk at the Table.

Petition read.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, that the 50th clause of the Corrupt Practices Act, passed last Session, stated that no Return of a Member to Parliament should be questioned except in accordance with the provisions of that Act. He would therefore beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair, Whether it is competent for any hon. Member to present such a Petition; the time for presenting Election Petitions being limited by the 50th section of the Corrupt Practices Act of last Session? He wished therefore to know whether the Petitioners were not precluded by that Act from presenting this Petition?

MR. SPEAKER: As I understand it, the Petition is not one questioning the return of a Member. It merely sets forth a grievance which the Petitioners think requires the consideration of the House.

IRELAND—MUNICIPAL FRANCHISE.
QUESTION.

MR. M'CLURE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a measure to extend the Municipal Franchise in cities and towns in Ireland to the same classes who by the Act of last year are entitled to claim the Parliamentary Franchise?

VOL. CXCIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that he agreed with the hon. Gentleman that the municipal franchise in Ireland was in an unsatisfactory condition and required consideration, which it would receive at the hands of the Government. He was not able however to undertake to legislate on the subject at present.

INDIA—THE BANK OF BOMBAY.
QUESTION.

MR. NICOL said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, When the Report of the Commission on the Bank of Bombay is likely to be made public?

MR. GRANT DUFF, in reply, said, that the Bombay Bank Commission was issued by and had reported to the Government of India. The Report had not yet been received from India, and he could not therefore give a categorical answer to the Question, but his hon. Friend might be assured that there would be no unnecessary delay.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. CROSS said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General, When the Bankruptcy Bill will be brought in and placed in the hands of Members?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he regretted that the Bill was not now in the hands of Members; it would be, however, in a very few days. He might state that no small part of the labour of the draftsman had been owing to his endeavours to shorten it.

THE INMAN MAIL SERVICE CONTRACT.
QUESTION.

MR. GRAVES said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether a Contract with Mr. Inman for a Service from Queenstown to New York, on Friday instead of Thursday, on terms in other respects identical with those of the Contract now before the House, has been sanctioned by the present Board of Treasury; and, whether Mr. Inman, in agreeing to the change of day which was proposed to him by the Government, did not stipulate that all the other conditions of his Contract made with Her Majesty's Government should be maintained?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that to the first part of the Question of the hon. Gentleman he must reply in the negative. The matter stood thus—On the 9th of December last a Treasury Minute was made by the late Government, sanctioning the contract with Mr. Inman for carrying the mails from Liverpool to New York for a certain sum. That contract had been executed by the Postmaster General of the late Government, the Duke of Montrose, on the 11th of December. That contract, so far as the present Government were concerned, was still in force, and remained uncanceled, awaiting the pleasure of the House of Commons whether it was to become valid or not. A negotiation had been entered into between the Government and Mr. Inman that, in case it should be the pleasure of Parliament the contract should stand, Mr. Inman should convey the mails on a different day, the contract in other respects remaining the same. But that contract had not been entered into by the present Government. The only contract entered into therefore was the contract between the Duke of Montrose and Mr. Inman, and that, as he had said, still waited the pleasure of Parliament. It was quite true that Mr. Inman, in agreeing to a change of day, had stipulated that the terms of the contract should in other respects remain the same, and if it should be the pleasure of the House that the terms of the contract between Mr. Inman and the late Government should be accepted, then the present Government would be ready to execute the contract on the same terms in all other respects.

SCOTLAND—QUEEN'S REMEMBRANCER.

QUESTION.

MR. MILLER said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of Government to fill up the office of Queen's Remembrancer in Scotland, vacant by the death of Mr. Henderson?

MR. GLADSTONE said, in reply, that the office of Queen's Remembrancer in Scotland was of very considerable importance, as in him was vested the power of auditing accounts and controlling expenditure. He could not, therefore, give his hon. Friend to understand that no provision would be made for the performance of these duties. It was only yesterday that the account of Mr. Henderson's death had been received, and there had been no time for considering what alterations might be made in the present arrangements.

SCOTLAND—ASSESSMENTS.

QUESTION.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether it be his intention to bring in any measure during the present Session to repeal the 37th section of the Scotch Poor Law Act, 8 & 9 Vic. c. 83, and to provide that all assessments in Scotland shall be made on the gross rental; and, if so, how soon he will introduce the Bill?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, in reply, that it was his intention to propose a measure of the description alluded to by his hon. and learned Friend, and he would probably be ready to introduce it shortly after the Easter Recess.

POST OFFICE—LIFE ASSURANCES.

QUESTION.

MR. WELLS said, he would beg to ask the Postmaster General, Whether it is his intention to bring in a Bill for authorizing the grant of Assurances on Life as low as five pounds?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that a Bill was prepared, and would be shortly brought in either by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer or himself, which would, if passed, enable the Post Office to grant assurances on life for five pounds.

POSTAL—POSTAGE ON NEWSPAPERS.

QUESTION.

MR. STAPLETON said, he would beg to ask the Postmaster General, Whether he will be prepared at the commencement of the financial year to reduce the postage on newspapers, so as materially to facilitate their circulation in the rural districts?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON in reply, said, he had not the power, even with the consent of the Treasury, under the present Act of Parliament, to authorize the transmission of anything by post unless charged 1d. The subject, however, had been under consideration, and when the hon. Member for Liverpool

(Mr. Graves) should bring forward his Motion, he believed next week, he should be in a position to state whether the Government would be prepared to bring in a Bill to enable the Post Office to transmit newspapers, and, perhaps, under certain circumstances, other printed matter for a less charge than 1*d*.

EDUCATION IN LARGE TOWNS.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. MELLY: * I rise, Sir, to call the attention of the House to the numbers of young children in our large towns who are growing up without any education, unaffected either by the educational clauses of the Factories Act, or by voluntary efforts, and to move for a Select Committee to inquire into, and, if possible, suggest a remedy for, this serious state of matters. The great courtesy I received at the hands of the House last Session, on the two or three occasions on which I ventured to address the House on matters nearly touching the welfare of the industrial classes, has emboldened me to ask its attention to this subject, in which, both as a Liverpool magistrate and as a representative of one of our most populous industrial communities, I feel a very deep interest. I am well aware that, as this debate will show, many hon. Members would more ably have commenced this discussion, but I gather courage from the knowledge that this is no party Motion. Every hon. Member in this House has equally at heart the education of every child in this kingdom, and the time has not yet arrived at which any section of this House, pinning its faith to some particular measure, will assert that, by that means alone, can this desirable end be attained. I am met by an Amendment, which will be moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), declaring that it is inexpedient to grant the proposed Committee, because the information necessary for the framing of a comprehensive measure of national education is already in the hands of Her Majesty's Government. I do not know whether Her Majesty's Government will support the hon. Member for Brighton in that statement; but the information in question is certainly not upon the table of the House, nor do I know where it can be obtained. There have been countless blue books, and two principal inquiries into the state of primary education in this country. The Royal Commission of 1861 inquired into the general state of primary education; and the Select Committee, presided over by Sir Stafford Northcote, which reported in July, 1861, dealt with the condition of destitute and neglected children. But, out of the fourteen largest provincial towns, the educational state of Bradford, Stoke-upon-Trent, and Merthyr Tydvil are the only ones reported upon by the Royal Commission of 1861, and in its Report there are no figures and no information whatever as regards the three great provincial cities to which I propose to call the attention of the House. Again, the Select Committee on Destitute and Neglected Children reported only on the ragged and industrial schools of London and Bristol, and gave no information whatever on the points I desire to raise. The Committee said in their Report—

"There still remains a residue to be dealt with, though of its numbers the Committee have no evidence."

And it is on this question of their numbers I wish for information. Again the Committee reported—

"For children who have acquired criminal or vagrant habits provision is made by the Industrial Schools Bill. Until that measure has been tried, no other provision, at the expense of the State, should be made for this class."

Eight years having passed away since that decision was arrived at, information on that point is now required. What has been the result of the extension of the Factories and Workshops Acts? How has the Industrial Schools Act answered? At what cost are these schools carried on? We have been told that Her Majesty's Government are unable this year to deal with the great question of primary education, and that they will confine themselves to the passing, if it be possible, of the Endowed Schools Bill. That being so, inquiry might be very wisely and legitimately made by this House into the number of children at school in the great provincial cities, the cost of their education, and the kind of education they are receiving, also as to the action of the Industrial Schools Act, the effect of the extension of the educational clauses of the Factory Act to those large towns, and more especially the operation of the new legislation called the Workshops Act. These are matters on which it would be well that information should be laid on the table of the House. Some years ago, in a speech delivered at Halifax, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary (Mr. Bruce), whose views we can have no reason to believe have been modified by the high position he now holds, said—

“Any system worthy of being called national must be one capable, if not immediately, yet sooner or later, of grappling with the whole difficulties of national education—there must be no class unprovided for.”

I hold—and I am supported by many hon. Members in holding—that, if you will insist upon having—as you must insist upon having—a scheme of national education capable of grappling with every class of children, you will have to adopt a system of compulsory attendance and free municipal schools; but neither the Government nor the House, much less the country, will be prepared to adopt a measure of so drastic and novel a character, unless they are thoroughly convinced that the facts and figures will justify so extreme a course. We may have, in the first instance, to adopt an experimental plan, and we may have to deal in this novel manner with four or six or eight of the largest cities, before such a measure of education for the whole country can be proposed with any prospect of success. I may be asked, “Why have you not included the rural districts in your Motion; because the state of education in the rural districts is as deplorable as it is in the large cities?” It may be so, and it may not be so; but the ignorance in rural districts, serious as it may be, does not bring with it the drunkenness, the pauperism, the misery, the crime, and the excessive rates of which it is at once the cause and the effect in our large cities. I will not take up the time of the House by describing how, in our great cities, 300,000 or 500,000 persons are brought together, within an area of from five to eight square miles, subject to conditions for which our modern legislation has not provided. The parochial system has broken down; ministers of all religious denominations are completely overwhelmed with work and outnumbered by the destitution, misery, and irreligion of the thousands which surround them. The relations between employer and employed have become impersonal; we hardly know the numbers of the people we employ, and we deal with them not as units but in hundreds—as hands not men. The ever-widening gulf between rich and poor, who have ceased even to live near one another, so that whole districts exist in each of our great cities in which, if not the most respectable, the wealthiest, ratepayers are the pawnbroker at one corner, who takes the drunkard's clothes in pledge, and the gin-palace keeper at the other, who sells half-penny worths of gin to little children whose heads can hardly reach to his counter—the existence of organized and recognized professors of crime, and the professional mendicancy which is so largely encouraged by the many stupid people who give money indiscriminately in the streets—all these conditions of life in great cities constitute the almost insoluble problem with which we have to deal.

In support of the Motion I shall confine myself to large cities, and in speaking of the educational destitution of large towns I shall select the three principal cities of the Empire—Liverpool, our first seaport—Manchester, the metropolis of the cotton manufacture—and Birmingham, the centre of the hardware trade, which contain an aggregate population of 1,219,807. This is no invidious selection. There are no three cities which by voluntary effort, by sanitary legislation, by municipal action, and by private charity, have so distinguished themselves. The municipality of Liverpool has subscribed no less than £7,500 during the last seven years to the reformatory movement, and gives 1s. a week to the support of each inmate of the local industrial schools. By the liberality of private individuals, Liverpool maintained 626 children in her five reformatories, 950 in her nine certificated industrial schools, and 2,672 in her orphanages. Manchester has ever taken the lead in all educational, as in all political matters; her Education Aid Society has sent thousands of children to school during the last five years, and, had it been left to Manchester by a wise legislature to deal with the educational condition of her people, she would long ago have solved the problem for herself. The municipality of Birmingham stands alone in having established and maintained an industrial school; and her Education Aid Society, presided over by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon), who will second this Motion, has sent many hundreds of children to school during the last three or four years. If the condition of things I am about to show, exists in these cities which have done so much, what must be the condition of those other large towns which are behind-hand in the race of private benevolence, public action, and voluntary effort? It has been humourously said that there is nothing so delusive as statistics, except facts; but, until the statistics asked for are placed on the table of the House, we must take the most reliable figures we can obtain: this at least I can say, I have selected them honestly from the best sources, and I will use them fairly. One word to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary: I hope that when the Census of 1871 is taken we may at last obtain correct educational statistics. They were only partially given by the Registrar General in 1851; they were entirely omitted in 1861; may we not hope that in 1871 an end may be put to the discussions which take place about the correctness of educational statistics, by provision being made for a complete educational survey of the country? I deal with Liverpool first. Some time ago a few gentlemen, of both parties and of different religious denominations, met together with a view of taking measures to inquire into the educational state of the borough. They made a fair selection of three streets in each of the sixteen wards; they visited every house in those forty-eight streets, and they found, excluding infants, 5,890 children at school, and 6,443 not at school and not at work. From the Returns of the Registrar General there are 98,256 children of school age, that is between the age of three and thirteen, in Liverpool. The proportions arrived at by visiting three streets in each ward would, if extended to the whole borough, give 46,925 children at school, and 51,331 not at school. They not only visited the streets, but they visited every school, down to schools containing twenty or thirty children, and they found 45,677 children at school; a result amply confirming the conclusion drawn from their previous calculation. Public spirit in Liverpool is strong enough. There is no want of school accommodation; the disease lies deeper than this, and some more efficacious remedy must be devised. There are 15,991 vacant places in our existing schools, of which no fewer than 10,000 are in the schools intended for the working classes. Religious differences cannot be pleaded, for there is room for 6,000 in Protestant schools, and for 3,000 young Roman Catholics. Poverty cannot be urged; for without reckoning ragged day and evening schools there are 1,500 vacancies in the free schools. There is no juvenile labour, no employment for children under thirteen, in the town of Liverpool; the Factory Act, therefore, can have no operation; yet there are from 40,000 to 50,000 children of school age who are not at school. As a Liverpool magistrate, I assert that there are from 25,000 to 30,000 children in the streets of Liverpool who are learning nothing, if they be not learning habits of vagrancy, mendicancy, and crime. The chief constable of Liverpool has courteously undertaken to look into the subject a little closely. On a certain day, when the schools of Liverpool were open, and between half-past ten and half-past eleven in the forenoon, police officers were specially told off to count the number of children apparently under fifteen years of age who were "at large" in twelve streets and at twelve junctions, omitting all boys who had the appearance of going about their business, and all girls who had children in their charge. The police counted no fewer than 1,906 little girls and 2,692 little boys. On another day the police counted the children who were—the House will observe the bitter irony of the term—"at large" around the warehouses where sugar and fruit were being taken in, and along the line of docks where ships were being discharged—parts of the town in which such children had no business to be—and the number counted was 713—514 boys and 172 girls. Again the police counted the number of little children who were selling fusees in the streets at night, and there were 288 at six o'clock, and at eleven o'clock 127, of whom forty were little girls. I now come to the case of Manchester. The Manchester Education Aid Society has not confined itself to sending children to school, but it has collected some statistics to which reference may perhaps be made by the hon. Members for Manchester. The results arrived at, however, are these—there are in Manchester, as appears from the Returns of the Registrar General, 75,667 children of school age, of whom less than half are at school and less than a quarter at work, and there cannot be less than from 20,000 to 25,000 who are living the life of the streets. In Birmingham a canvass has been made of 52,573 children, of whom 37,112 were found to be of school age. There appeared to be fewer at work in Birmingham than there are in Manchester; and, of the 77,687 children the Registrar General reports existing in Birmingham of school age, no fewer than 18,000 or 20,000 are unaccounted for, and are no doubt receiving their education in the streets. To sum up, then, in the three towns 94,502 children have been visited; 25,002 were found at school, 29,128 were neither at school nor at work, and 12,661 were at work, making 66,791 of the school age accounted for. If calculations be based on these figures, the experience of this actual canvass gives this general result. The Registrar General puts the number of children of school age in these three towns at 251,710. Of these only 56,261 are receiving education in schools recognized by the House of Commons and to which grants are made; not more than 125,000 can be put down as attending any school whatever; not more than 55,000 are at work; and there are no fewer than from 65,000 to 75,000 children in these three towns — and we have no reason to believe that they are, in proportion to their population, any worse than all other large towns—who are growing up unaffected either by the educational clauses of the Factories Act, the Industrial Schools Act, or by voluntary effort. This is the result we have arrived at by our laissez faire policy of leaving everything to be done by voluntary effort, and our want of courage in dealing with the sectarian differences which have so long retarded educational progress. The time has come to put out the strong hand of the law to teach and, thus to, save this vast number of children. There is nothing exceptional in this state of things if we compare it with what exists in other parts of the world. The State of New York subscribes £1,000,000 sterling, or one-fifth of its entire taxation, to educational purposes, to a complete system of State free schools; and yet two years ago the superintendent of the State declared that there were 75,000 children within the city of New York who either attended no school or whose means of instruction were limited to the briefest possible period. Granting their system of enrolment to be perfect, we find that last year 222,526 children enrolled gave an average attendance of only 91,984. The superintendent sums up his Report in these words—"I will not ask, looking to these vast numbers, What shall we do with them? But I will ask, What will they do with us?" I am sorry to take up the time of the House with so many statistics; but I must attempt to answer this question — What are they doing with us? I turn to a table showing the increase of crime and the decrease of education in the three towns I have named. As we have sown so we are reaping. There is no question which is being so much pressed on our attention as that of the excessive increase of local rates. It is pauperism, the child of drunkenness, which again is the child of ignorance, which is causing this vast cry against our heavy local taxation. The Home Secretary, the other day, in answer to a Deputation on the question of the increase of crime, said he did not believe there was any great increase of the blacker descriptions and the darker sorts of crime; but the Home Secretary did not and could not say that there is no increase in the large centres of population of petty larceny, drunkenness, and of those smaller descriptions of crime which bring so many persons for the first time under the supervision of the police. In the year 1861 the apprehensions in the three towns of Liverpool, Birmingham, and Manchester, were 31,193, and in 1868 they were 52,098, and, whereas in 1861 the number of children apprehended was 1,749, in 1868 it was 3,720. A noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), for whom we all entertain the highest respect, and whose words, when he sat in this House, were listened to with deep attention, stated the other evening that he did not believe there was so close connection as was believed between the increase of crime and the diminution of education; but the figures which I am about to read by no means confirm the theory of the noble Marquess. In 1861, in the three towns, there were apprehended 1,244 persons who could read and write well, and 11,626 who could not read and write at all; and in 1868 the number who could read and write was diminished to 1,022, and the number who could not was increased to 20,032. The vast increase in the amount of local rates is thus easily accounted for. The total cost of the police force and gaols of Liverpool, Manchester, and Birmingham, has reached the frightful sum of £215,680, or 1*s.* 3*d.* in the pound on the rateable value of the property in the three cities. In the streets of those cities there are 75,000 children — were they in free schools they would cost £70,000 per annum. If these cities spent £50,000 a year out of the rates, supplemented by the ordinary Privy Council Grant, the expenditure would require a rate of only 3½*d.* or 4*d.* in the pound. A sacred proverb reads thus: "There is that which scattereth and yet increaseth;" this would be the sort of expenditure which, even whilst it scattered, would first economize and then increase the wealth of the community.

I have done what I promised in bringing under the notice of the House the number of children in our large cities who grow up in the streets, the ante-rooms of our gaols, and the nurseries which fill our reformatories and industrial schools. Now I come to the more difficult question—"How are we to deal with these children?" I maintain we cannot deal with them through the Factory Act, however widely we may extend its provisions, because they are not at work, and therefore do not come under its action. In Liverpool there are no children under the Factory Act, and but very few under the Workshops Act. In Birmingham, out of 37,000 children, only 6,237 were found at work; and, of the 18,380 children who can neither read nor write, only 2,981 would be affected by the Factory Act, even if it extended to every workshop or every errand-boy. Another visitation showed that, of 14,986 children who were visited, 1,542 were at work as errand-boys and nurse-girls, leaving 13,400 or 90 per cent untouched by the Factory or the Workshops Acts. But the Factory Act was never intended by this House to educate these children. It is a sanitary law, which the good sense and patriotism of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite forced upon us, not as a measure calculated to educate children, but to preserve their health and strength; to protect them from the grasping parents who might wish to sell their young lives by forcing them to work at an immature age. It was never intended to be the means, and it is quite a new idea to look to these labour Acts as educational agencies; no doubt it is very convenient to convert the great manufacturers and employers of labour into a school police; but it cuts both ways, as in large towns, where juvenile labour is very plentiful, half-timers are being gradually dismissed from employment to avoid the restrictions and interference of these Acts. According to the latest Returns furnished to me there are only 87,000 at the outside in all England — there were only 67,000 in 1861 — who come under the provisions of the Factory and Workshops Acts. Other Members will no doubt state that, under the Factory Act, children are receiving a very insufficient teaching, and that even these children are being neglected in an educational sense. The Factory Acts, looked upon as Acts to promote education, are defective in the extreme, and the House may rest assured it is not through their operation that we shall effect the object. Nor yet by the Industrial Schools Act. There are eighty certified industrial schools in Great Britain, and they contained on the 31st December last 5,465 children. They already cost the Treasury £68,000 a year. They are simply charity boarding schools at £18 a head per annum; and no community can afford by such agencies to educate 10 or 20,000 children. On financial grounds, and on grounds of political economy alike, I maintain that industrial schools must be looked upon simply as temporary and palliative measures, as excellent private charities, but to which a State contribution is hardly to be defended; and at the proper time I shall be ready to argue, that, in contributing such a sum as £68,000 per annum for the education, clothing, and maintenance of 5,465 pauper and neglected children, the State is overstepping the bounds of its duty to the honest and industrious taxpayer. These schools are utterly indefensible as a primary means of education. No town, no nation can afford to place in such schools every child whom they cannot educate by other means. Further, those institutions must have a most immoral effect on the honest and industrious poor, who see the children of the intemperate and improvident thus handsomely provided for. I have received letters on this point from the stipendiary magistrates of Liverpool, Manchester, and Birmingham—they are all to the same effect. They say that the Industrial Schools Acts, though absolutely necessary at present, are most extravagant in their operation, and that nominations to these schools are already sought for their children by the poor, as if they were the objects of honourable competition, and not a disgraceful sentence to a pauper prison of children whose parents had failed to do their duty. That is the condition to which we are reducing our people by blinking the great difficulty of dealing with the children in our large cities by legislation of an honest and fearless character. It is to the workhouse and not to the industrial schools that really neglected and destitute children and orphans should be sent. We ought not to have two such systems at work. Education should be kept entirely separate from lodging, maintenance, and clothing. The State can wisely and safely give the one; but to give the other, except through the legal action of the Poor Law, is to pauperize the community. It will be said the industrial schools are necessary because workhouse schools are inefficient, and their inmates imbibe a taint of pauperism from which they never get free. Then let us make our workhouse schools better; but, on any large scale, to extend this new system would be alike extravagant and impolitic. We cannot effect, then, our object by the extension of the Factory or Industrial School Acts, so neither can we attain it by the Bill of the Home Secretary and the Vice President of the Council, compelling the erection of rated schools. That is a great step in the right direction, and I hope that a Bill of that character, based upon those principles, but supplemented by the principle of compulsory attendance, will be introduced, and to such a Bill I will give my most energetic support. But we do not want any more schools. There are 13,182 vacant places in the public Government-supported schools of Liverpool, Manchester, and Birmingham—what we want is scholars, not schools. The Rev. F. Watkins, National School Inspector, Yorkshire, reports—

“In my district, which in this respect is not behind others, school accommodation is much more, I will not say than is needed, but than is used. In the day schools not 58 per cent of the space provided for children is occupied by them. In other words, the schools are nearly half empty.”

Mr. J. G. Fitch, British and Foreign School Inspector, Yorkshire, reports—

And I might indefinitely multiply this evidence. Neither can the problem be solved by simply establishing free schools. The experience of the Education Aid Societies of Manchester and Birmingham is conclusive on this point; they have tried the experiment of free schools by giving thousands of free tickets which were never used. The Manchester Society has issued 35,000 tickets for school, and every case has been carefully investigated. It shows the apathy and indifference of many parents to education, that in one year 9,000 of these school orders were not used, although the fees in some cases were partially and in others entirely paid. The first year 74 per cent of the school orders were used; the second year, 54 per cent; the third year, 45 per cent; the fourth year, 37 per cent; and the fifth year, when the operations of the society were restricted for want of funds, 60 per cent. At a cost of £7,500 the society has sent some 4,000 children to school during the last five years, but they have only raised the average attendance at the public schools of Manchester by 2,387, thus showing that in many cases they were paying for those who had previously paid for themselves. The experience of the Birmingham Society is similar. It has not limited its sphere of usefulness to the careful collection of such statistics as those I have placed before the House. Following the example of the Manchester Education Aid Society, the Birmingham Society issued in one year 4,729 free school orders, and of those only 3,097 were used, while 1,178 were never presented. This accounts for the increase in the school attendance in Birmingham of 2,987. What is the verdict at which the Birmingham Society has arrived after an experience of three years, and a large expenditure of money? The society says—"By paying the full amount of the school fees, and not calling on the parent to pay any part, we have fully tested this matter, and the general conclusion—the result of actual experiment—seems to be that the poor are divided on the matter of education into two classes—one class prevented by poverty from sending their children to school—these are making good use of the society's free school orders, and are sending their children with satisfactory regularity; the other class care nothing about education, and will take no pains to send their children to school, though the fees are paid for them. The Committee, without affirming the principle of compulsion, are therefore forced from these facts to conclude that this class of children can only be brought under instruction by a compulsory law; and that, in the absence of compulsion, they will grow up in ignorance and vice through the apathy resulting, in a great part, from the ignorance of the parents themselves." This appears to be borne out by the statistics. In this town there were found 9,044 children whose parents could not afford to send them to school, and 10,852 whose parents do not assign reasons for keeping them away. In the former class of cases the test of inability was the non-receipt by the parent of 3s. per head per week for each member of the family, exclusive of rent. The Manchester experience is to the same effect: in eighteen districts they found 7,604 children not at school, for whom the parents could have paid in 3,333 cases. By Factory and Industrial School Acts then, and even by free schools supported by local rates, we still fail to meet the difficulty. I believe that the only legislation by which we can deal conclusively with the question is that which will enforce the attendance at school of the children in our great cities. Earl Russell lately moved in the House of Lords a Resolution affirming that every child has a moral right to the blessings of education. Then, if their parents be so ignorant and degraded that they will not claim these blessings when placed within their reach, we, the House of Commons, are responsible to those children for securing to them, at any cost, the privileges of school teaching. It is by that means, and by that means alone, that we can stop drunkenness, and pauperism, and crime, and thus diminish the taxes of the great cities; and this proposition is made to a Parliament in which all classes are represented. In days gone by, it might have been asserted that the wealthier members of the community were legislating for their own benefit in matters affecting those not able to protect themselves. We, at all events, who represent the large towns have been elected exclusively by the ratepayers, we are responsible to them, and it is in the name of a large majority of those ratepayers we ask you to enforce compulsory attendance at school. The House has precedents enough to act upon in this matter. First, the Vaccination Act, by which you compel every child to be vaccinated, and fine the parent if he neglects to do so. Ignorance is more dangerous than disease, and disease is not more contagious than crime. I would rather see a child of mine with the disorder from which vaccination is supposed to protect it, than allow it to be in the streets, subject to the imminent risk of immorality, and the greater moral disfigurement of crime. In the Factory Acts you have again asserted the principle of compulsory attendance at school. You have already there laid down the rule that the child must go to school, but only if he goes to work. Can a greater anomaly be conceived? If the child is already learning the rules of decency, order, obedience, and industry in a manufactory, it shall be compelled to learn to read and write. But if the child is in the streets gaining habits of vagrancy, intemperance, and felony, then, and then only, shall it be free to learn no other lesson. In the Health of Towns Act you have far more largely invaded the sacred liberty of the subject. There is no measure in any country that is so severe in its provisions. I am told by the medical Officer of Health of the town of Liverpool, that, under the Health of Towns Act, he has, and exercises, the power of visiting, through his subordinates, 6,000 sub-let houses—not registered lodging-houses, but sub-let houses—in which two families of working men may happen to live together—at any hour of the day, or any hour of the night, to count the number of persons in each of the rooms, and to see whether the provisions of the Act are exceeded. A Legislature wise and strong enough to enforce, and a people sensible enough on sanitary grounds to submit to, such a measure as that, are a Legislature at whose hands we may ask, and a community that will gladly accept, a measure comparatively so mild and harmless as one to compel the attendance of children of school age at school. And, if we have the power, I take it we have also the right. The right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Goschen) knows that this question is intimately connected with the difficulties which arise from the vast increase of local rates, and he says that to make education compulsory would only be the natural consequence of the law which makes the maintenance of children compulsory on the community. Mr. Lingen, the highest official authority on the subject of education, compendiously exposed the inherent defects of the present system, when he said that a system of education could not be at the same time voluntary, efficient, and universal. There is a unanimous testimony on this point from almost every quarter. A large number of Members during their canvass and in their election speeches have proposed this measure or commended it, and more than one Member on this side of the House has had to promise to support it before he could obtain the honour of a seat in this House. One might suppose that inspectors of schools would be the last to advocate a measure supposed to be so greatly opposed to the system under which they work, yet, in the last Report of the Privy Council, no fewer than eleven out of the twenty-eight inspectors advocate compulsory attendance in one shape or another as a last resort. Mr. Moncrieff, National School Inspector for Kent, says—

“ I have for years held the same language—that all our teaching was powerless for effective good so long as nothing was done to compel the attendance of children up to a reasonable age.”

Mr. Oakley, British School Inspector of the northern counties, says—

“ Without compulsion in some form or other, whether direct or indirect, a number of children will never be educated at all, and of those actually at school a considerable proportion (those who leave for permanent work before they have come up to the exceedingly moderate degree implied by the second standard) will continue to forget everything they have learnt by the time they are twenty years old.”

Lastly, I will read the testimony of one whose name will be received with respect and honour in this House. Mr.

Mr. Melly

Matthew Arnold, the Inspector for Middlesex, says—

“ Throughout my district I find the idea of compulsory education becoming a familiar idea with those who are interested in schools. I imagine that with the newly-awakened sense of our shortcomings in popular education—a sense which is just; the statistics brought forward to dispel it being, as every one acquainted with the subject knows, entirely fallacious—the difficult thing would not be to pass a law making education compulsory; the difficult thing would be to work such a law after we had got it.”

Then the question I have to answer is—How would you work it out? In the first place, I would build or buy free municipal schools, and plant them like Martello towers against the invading armies of pauperism and intemperance in the poorer districts of all our large towns. They should be supported, two-thirds by municipal rates, and one-third by grants from the Privy Council in case they came up to the Privy Council standard of efficiency; but no grant should be given them unless they came up, in every respect, to State requirements. I would give power to the schoolmaster of each school—whom I would pay by numerical results—by means of a school beadle, appointed by the master, or rather by the Municipal Council of Education, to summon and fine the parents of every child found, after fair notice, in the streets between the hours of nine and twelve in the morning and two and five in the afternoon; and I would do nothing more, because nothing more would be required. Speaking on the authority of the chief constable of Liverpool, and of other men who have studied the subject, I believe that, if you give such simple powers as these to the municipalities of our great cities—if you begin, not with any Permissive Act, but by compelling municipalities to rate themselves, and if you give the power of summoning the parent of any child not at school during school hours—you will soon sweep the streets of the thousands of children now found in them. If you place that power in our hands we shall carry it out and thus fill the schools you have compelled us to erect. With these three agencies, the certified industrial workhouse schools, the free schools, and the present denominational schools, we should approach to a solution of the problem. I may be asked, and I am bound to answer the question, “How would such a proposal touch the existing schools?” For, as the Duke of

Argyll says, in his recent work on Law in Politics—

We have a magnificent system of denominational schools, and by that system we are educating 1,500,000 of our children; and, as has been well said, there can be no doubt that the poorest class have a far better as well as a far cheaper education open to them than the poorer portion of the middle class. This is so; it is offered to them but they do not accept it; and the lower portion of the middle class and the upper section of the artizan class do accept it; and thus the existing schools are largely invaded by a class for whom neither the House of Commons nor private subscribers intended either grants or subscriptions. There is no question on which it would be more difficult to adduce statistics, still less to give names, but every one knows there are a large and increasing number of the well-to-do artizans and the smaller order of shopkeepers whose children attend these schools. As Eton, Harrow, and Rugby, built and endowed for the lower and middle classes, have been invaded by the rich, so the national primary schools have been invaded, and in some instances even monopolized, by classes for whom they were neither intended, nor are they now supported. And the Revised Code, to which I gave my hearty concurrence, has encouraged this state of things, and, by its inevitable working, has rather reduced the numbers of poor and neglected children who attend the national primary schools. The master, paid by results, prefers the well-dressed regularly attending children of a more respectable class, and the cold shoulder is not unfrequently given in the national schools to the very children for whom they are endowed and maintained. On this very ground I am not afraid that these schools will not hold their ground. In the next place the free municipal schools must necessarily be secular schools, because you cannot compel the ratepayers to subscribe for the teaching of a religious faith with which they do not agree. They must be secular, because you cannot compel the attendance of a child at a school where a creed is taught in which its parents do not believe. But this will be at once the very strength and safeguard of the present denominational schools. These schools, as Mr. Lingen says, are the proprietary schools of the religious denominations. They are in fifteen cases out of sixteen—the figures are as 15·49 to 1·25—connected with, often form a part of, the churches and the chapels of various religious denominations, and those who belong to these chapels and churches, and who are now the managers and committees of these schools, will continue to send their children to them, while others of the same class will do so even in greater numbers than now; for a stigma will naturally attach to the free municipal school, and there will be a disinclination on the part of such parents to allow their children to mix with the class of children attending them. There is no greater mistake than to suppose—no hon. Member does suppose—that the working people are all of one class. There are as many different sections, as many social castes, as many political and religious prejudices, among them as there are among those above them; and the well-to-do Conservative artizan, and the small Radical shopkeeper, will continue to send their children to their Church and Dissenting schools, and will send them even to a larger extent than at present. We have a confirmation of this in the evidence given before the Royal Commission—

“So far,” says Mr. Norris, “from high fees emptying a school, I have found that of the schools in my district—Chester, Stafford, and Shropshire—the most expensive are the most popular.”

And instances are given, both by Mr. Norris and by Mr. Cumin, in which the raising of the fees was decidedly popular with the parents, and was followed by an increased attendance of children. In a word, then, I believe that a system of free secular municipal schools and compulsory attendance, far from doing any damage to, would give a great impetus in our large towns to the system of denominational schools; I believe that parents who now send their children to paying schools would not only continue to do so, but would send them in larger numbers, and pay higher fees; and thus, without injuring the existing schools, you would have solved the difficulty of insuring the blessings of education to the whole population.

In conclusion, I have endeavoured to show the necessity for inquiry; to prove that the community desires, and that the Legislature has the right, the power, and the authority of precedent, to compel the education of the children for whose welfare it is responsible. I have endeavoured briefly to allay the fears of those engaged in an excellent but inadequate work. I have now but to thank the House for the courtesy and attention with which they have listened to a dull and dry statement. 3,000 years ago it was written in the Talmud, that—"By the breath of the school-children shall the State be saved." I believe that the converse of the proposition holds good to-day. There is no cloud so dark and dangerous in our political horizon, no blot so foul upon our social system, no stain so deep upon the Christianity which we all profess, as the existence of the 75,000 children of whom I have spoken, and of perhaps 500,000 children of whom these 75,000 are the type, who are growing to man's estate to be a curse instead of a blessing to the community in which they live—to be a cause of poverty, instead of a source of wealth, to the nation that has given them birth. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Amendment.

MR. DIXON, in seconding the Motion, said, that, after the very explicit declaration of the Government that legislation on this question was impossible this year, he felt most anxious that the House should, at any rate, do something towards preparing a basis on which legislation might take place next Session. The statistics which had been so profusely quoted by his hon. Friend (Mr. Melly), although they seemed to be based upon an authority which ought to be sufficient, were in many cases utterly denied. He (Mr. Dixon) proposed to confine his remarks almost exclusively to what had taken place in Birmingham under the auspices of the Education Aid Society, which was established there. Last Session the noble Lord the then Vice President of the Council (Lord Robert Montagu) made some disparaging remarks with reference to that society. He hoped that further reflection and information had induced the noble Lord to regret those aspersions, for the society was composed of all the leading men in the town—men of all sects and parties, who represented the activity and life of the town, and their statements had been before the public for twelve months, and had not, to his (Mr. Dixon's) knowledge, been in a single instance controverted.

Indeed, an able and laborious school inspector, Mr. Capel, whose opinion he had asked in reference to the facts laid before the country by the society, had authorized him to say that, so far from having over-stated, they had understated the facts of the case. There were at present about 83,000 children in Birmingham, and, deducting one-third for those whose parents were able to pay entirely for their education—an ample deduction—there remained 55,000 children of the working classes—that was to say, of the class that might be supposed to frequent, or ought to frequent, the elementary schools of the country. The first effort of the Birmingham Education Aid Society was to ascertain the number of the children at the schools, and from a return furnished by the managers and masters to their visitor, they found that only 19,500 children were present there at one time. The Returns of the Committee of Council gave only 13,000 as the number in the inspected schools, and therefore they had 6,500 that were in schools of a more or less inferior description—some of them so inferior that it was doubtful if any education of value was given in them. If he added to the number he had mentioned the workhouse and charity school children, he should probably get a total of 21,000 in the schools out of 55,000, leaving 34,000 who were not at school at all—so that about 36 per cent, or little more than one-third of the children of the working classes in Birmingham, were ascertained to be in schools at the same time. Further investigation would show that the upper portion of the working class sent their children to school in a much larger proportion than that, but the other part, or the lower stratum of the population in the large towns, scarcely sent their children to schools at all. The houses of the parents of more than 45,000 children were visited, and the visitors of the society ascertained that only 42 per cent of these children between the ages of three and thirteen were acknowledged by their parents to be at school; and, as they had reason to believe that the parents had given a highly-coloured description of the state of things, he was inclined to believe that their statements might be taken as a full corroboration of the returns from the schools. He wished to ask the House whether there was any sort of good reason why boys in large towns between the ages of five and eight should not be at school? If they were not at school, they were sure to be in the streets, and yet it was found that, according to the statements of the parents, only about one-half of the children between these ages were at school. He would defy anyone to put forward any excuse which could palliate the grievous wrong thus done to those young children. Not satisfied with those two modes of inquiry, the persons conducting the investigation ascertained from the families of the young people that, out of 7,000 young persons between the ages of fourteen and fifteen who had left school, only 50 per cent could honestly be declared able to read and write. Being desirous of gaining still further particulars respecting the real state of the education of young persons between the ages of thirteen and twenty-one, the Education Aid Society fixed upon Mr. Long, the second master of a training school near Birmingham, to procure the necessary information; and that gentleman went to the factories and selected for examination 529 males and 379 females, who in his opinion might be taken as fair samples of their class. He examined them, and reported that, of reading and writing, nearly one-half of the number knew nothing or next to nothing; that in arithmetic and general knowledge more than three-fourths failed, or nearly so; and only one-twentieth showed anything like a satisfactory degree of attainments. The Government should verify these facts, and give the stamp of official sanction to the society's declaration as to the state of education in Birmingham, and, he might add, in other large towns. The result of the examination of Mr. Long was this—that out of all these young persons examined there were only 4 per cent, or one in twenty-five, that attained the fourth standard and passed in reading, writing, and arithmetic. Was the education of the working class advancing, or was it retrograding? Recently he saw a statement made by a society in Manchester, that after thirty years' voluntary efforts, education in that city had actually gone back as regarded the proportion of children actually at school. He could not say whether that was the case, but he knew that in Birmingham, in 1857, 42 per cent of the children between the ages of seven and thirteen were at school; in 1867 the number did not exceed 44 per cent. That showed an advance of 2 per cent; but he was inclined to believe that the investigation in 1857 was more searching than the later inquiry, and that consequently the advance of 2 per cent was rather nominal than real. In all towns there appeared to be an increasing mass of children left untaught, and for whom the existing system did absolutely nothing. The principal visitor of the Birmingham Education Aid Society expressed his belief that 6,000 or 7,000 of the 34,000 children not at school in Birmingham belonged to families whose average earnings per week did not exceed 2s. per head. Now the cost per head per week in the workhouse for food only was 3s. per week. How did the families of these 6,000 or 7,000 children live? He had asked that question of a working man, and the answer was, "They don't live, Sir, they starve." It was this class which served to raise the fever-rate and the death-rate. He was told that there were 1,000 of these children unable to go to school for want of clothes. What were the educational agencies at work in these large towns to meet and overcome that horrible state of things? He admitted that the Industrial Schools Act was a beneficial measure, but under it only a small portion of the neglected children could be taught. There was another Act which ought to have effected much, but which had done nothing—he referred to the enactment known as Denison's Act. In 1866 he applied to the Board of Guardians to know the number of children belonging to out-door paupers between the ages of four and ten, who were not attending school; and he found that there were 1,521, the whole of whom ought to have been at school, if the provisions of the Denison Act had been properly carried out. The Birmingham Education Aid Society implored the guardians to put Denison's Act in force, and yet there were at that moment 1,893 such children as he had referred to, between the ages of four and ten, for whose absence from school there was no sort of excuse, and after all the efforts that had been made only 10 per cent of those children attended school. Great hopes had been based on the operation of the Factory Acts, but in many cases the result even of carrying them out most perfectly would be insufficient; and he thought that those who looked for much from them would be disappointed. It was said—though he did not endorse the calculation—that only 7 per cent of the children in Birmingham could come under the operation of the Acts, if fully carried out. Mr. Baker, one of the inspectors, estimated the number of children in factories in Birmingham employing upwards of fifty hands, before the Act came into operation, at 3,000, and there were only now 234 at school. The effect of the Act had been that the manufactories had been emptied of children, but the schools had not been filled. With respect to the work which had been done by Government, there were 13,000 children in the inspected schools—and although he was not satisfied with their education, it was certainly the best they could obtain under the present system. The number of children attending those schools was only progressing at the rate of 1,000 per annum, and the increase in the number attending inspected schools did not necessarily mean an increase in the total number of scholars, because many were merely transferred from uninspected schools; and it would be impossible that we could feel satisfied to wait until the whole of the 34,000 had been gathered in by the existing system. The Education Aid Society had tried to effect that laudable object, and by paying the whole of the school fees they brought in about 5,000. But the society was based on voluntarism, which was a weak reed to rest upon, and now they sent but little over 2,000 to school. They had implored the town to come to their aid, but there was little hope of their being able to do more than just keep up the present number. He had been asked to beg of a Minister of State to visit Birmingham, and attend the society's annual meeting, in the hope of thereby attracting a large audience and drawing a considerable sum of money out of their pockets. What the society now got came from a hard working and over-taxed few, who were ready to make sacrifices for the benefit of these poor children, but who found their resources insufficient to meet the increasing demands made upon them. Were this Committee granted, he anticipated that the investigation of facts and figures would lead, even in the present Session, to legislative measures of practical and immediate value. The Industrial Schools Act, to which many said they might have recourse, had been carried out in some places, but in most others it remained a dead letter. There were many who agreed with him in thinking that it, as well as Denison's Act, ought to be made compulsory. Why should they not say that with out-door relief should go education to the children of the recipients? It would, no doubt, increase the cost and burden upon the ratepayers, but only for a time; and they would speedily obtain a full reward, not only in the blessings that would fall upon the children, but in the saving of charges on the rates. He agreed with the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Melly), that, if we were to have a real and effective effort made for the purpose of grappling with this great mass of ignorance in our large towns, we must no longer rest on the system of voluntarism or its twin sister denominationalism. That system would not reach the masses in those great and populous districts. It had been proved over and over again in our large towns that it was unequal to the task. If they desired to make education a reality, and to diffuse its blessings generally throughout the country, they must remove its basis from the methods of voluntarism to the taxation of the country, and he believed that what was required might be provided almost at once. It was not necessary that they should interfere directly with existing schools, but that they should direct their eyes to the destitution which existed, which had not been reached, and could not be reached by any other plan than that of State support. Could the new Parliament, elected largely by working men, permit the continuance of a state of things dangerous to the prosperity of the nation, which working men regarded with the greatest apprehension, and for the removal of which they were willing and anxious to make any sacrifices which the House could call upon them to make? Of course it would be necessary that the schools to be provided by the ratepayers should be unsectarian, for the time was gone by when the money of the State could be applied, directly or indirectly, to religious education, and what was occurring with regard to Ireland showed that dogmatic and religious teaching was a matter which the State ought not to interfere with. He had never heard a difdifficulty started by working men in opposition to compulsory education. During the four months of the great contest at the last election in Birmingham, he never attended any meeting when the question of education was referred to, at which the opinion was not loudly expressed that compulsory attendance at schools was required. As to the hardship of carrying it out, how should the working man feel it, when they submitted voluntarily to hardships that were far greater, obeying their trades union committees, and striving in thousands for weeks and months, upon half rations, to carry out the objects they deemed right? In doing this, they did what was incomparably more difficult than that which would be asked from them under such a plan as was proposed. Had they not submitted to the burdensome operation of the Factory Acts which, by one stroke of the pen, deprived thousands of families who were already on the brink of pauperism of the very means of keeping their heads above it? Could they want more illustrations of how much these men would bear, when they were told that, by the operation of one clause of the Reform Act of 1867, no less than 15,000 summonses and 5,000 distress warrants had been taken out in one town, indicating an amount of suffering which could hardly be conceived? Those who had before them a prospect of the education of thousands of children, now neglected, and growing up in the nurseries of pauperism and crime, would respond with unanimous enthusiasm to the call made upon them, and say—"Give us a measure which may be enforced by the arm of the law, against those who would oppose the rescue, through its salutary operation, of these poor innocents from a life of possible degradation and crime." He had no doubt himself that they would find it was the best and wisest course to make those schools for destitute children free schools. The difficulty would no doubt be great, but the result also must and would be great. All those children who were now in the denominational schools of the country—schools which undoubtedly had done great good—were in reality charity children, for were the assistance at present afforded by the rich withdrawn, the schools would vanish from the face of the land. He had often said himself that, if he were a working man, he should be ashamed to send his children to a charity school, though he would be glad to do so to an independent school maintained out of the taxation of the country, to which he contributed his fair share, and in the management of which he had some voice. He had been returned to that House to represent there more than one-third of a million of people, and in the course of his canvass he had found three sentiments uppermost in the minds of the working classes—a desire for justice to Ireland in the disestablishment of the Irish Church; justice for themselves in the abolition of the ratepaying clauses; and justice for their children in the extension and improvement of national education. He believed he owed his election to the feeling that, if returned, he would do what he could to place their claims before the House. With that responsibility, he appealed to Ministers to take up this great question without delay, to give it their full and serious consideration, and to let the country, know at as early a period as possible, what were the principles on which their measures would be based, in order that they might receive ample criticism, and, when necessary, modification. He would ask them to be courageous in their measures, and look to their effect upon those whose children would be benefited. When those who had now political power placed in their hands for the first time wished to use it in the greatest and noblest work in which they could be engaged, and when, on the other hand, dangers of the most formidable kind were to be apprehended from neglect of their demands, he hoped Ministers would see that their just and reasonable expectations should be fulfilled.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the state of Education in the great Provincial Towns,"—(Mr. Melly,) —instead thereof.

MR. FAWCETT said, that, in asking the House not to grant this Committee, he hoped it was not necessary for him to assure the hon. Gentleman by whom it had been proposed, that he (Mr.

Fawcett) made the objection in no spirit of hostility. He agreed in the main with the opinions expressed by his hon. Friends who had brought the subject forward; his object was the same as theirs, and the only difference between his hon. Friends and himself was that, they thought that granting the Select Committee would promote the education of the people, whilst he thought that, if it had any effect at all, it would most probably retard legislation on the subject. It had been his duty on more than one occasion to object to the growing frequency with which Committees were granted in that House. Great and often unnecessary expense was thereby incurred, and this was by no means the worst evil. His experience in that House had shown him that a Committee often enabled the Government to shift responsibility with regard to important questions from its own shoulders to those of the House. No Committee could ever do good, unless it took evidence on both sides; and the speeches of the two hon. Gentlemen made it abundantly evident that it would be impossible for a Select Committee to investigate the enormous mass of materials which they had brought forward. He thought the Government had in their hands abundant matter to enable them to frame a comprehensive scheme of national education. They had the Report of the Duke of Newcastle's Commission, which made its inquiry in 1861; and he had no hesitation in saying that a more complete and exhaustive investigation than was made by that Commission had never been carried on by any Commission or any Committee. But, in addition to that Report, they had the annual Reports issued by the Privy Council, the Reports of the inspectors, and also the investigations of two or three Select Committees. He, therefore, hoped that the Government would not grant this Committee. He would ask his hon. Friends to consider for a moment what must be the result, if their Motion were agreed to. The Committee must take evidence in support of the various views put forward on national education; and it would scarcely be possible for them to close their inquiry and make their Report before the close of the present Session. If they did not, and the Government attempted to legislate at the beginning of next Session, it would be said to them—"You appointed a Committee which has not reported. It is unfair, therefore, of you to talk of legislating on the subject." He hoped, therefore, the Government would say, in reply to the Motion of his hon. Friends—"We have enough of information at hand to enable us to legislate next Session. If we find that any of the facts on which we intend to rely want verification, we shall send down competent officials to the particular locality respecting which inquiry is necessary, and there have an investigation on the spot." He agreed with his hon. Friend in thinking that national education was one of the greatest of all questions that could be considered by Parliament. The Commission of 1861 reported that, under the system of grants from the Privy Council, we never could have an effective plan of national education. One of the great objections to that system was that under its operation the wealthiest parishes sometimes received the largest share of the grants, and that the poorest sometimes received no aid at all. According to the latest Returns, out of 14,800 parishes, 9,700 did not receive one farthing of assistance from the Government. That grave defect of the system arose, he believed, from the rule adopted, and perhaps necessarily adopted, by the Privy Council, that no parish should receive any assistance unless it was already provided with the comparatively expensive luxury of a certificated teacher. Another evil connected with those grants was that in rich parishes, where superior school buildings were erected, and where the schools themselves were munificently maintained, a class of children found their way into the schools for whom national schools were never intended. Since the Commission of 1861 reported the educational problem had become simplified. At that time a powerful party—the voluntary party, led in that House with so much ability by his hon. Friend the Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines)—had to be conciliated; but since then that party had found that, in politics, there was no general rule without an exception, and with admirable frankness they now admitted that, by voluntarism, we could not educate the most neglected class of our children. It had been said that things were improving, and that if we only let our present educational agency go on for a few years longer, the country would become sufficiently educated. He would only say that, in England, no inconsiderable portion of the population could neither read nor write, while in Prussia, Saxony, and the New England States, it was rare to find a child who had not the rudiments of knowledge. In London, he believed, something like one-half the children who ought to be at school were not at school; and the same thing was said of Manchester and other large towns. It would be said that, in 1867, the compulsory provisions of the Factory Acts were extended to every branch of labour except agriculture. He admitted that this was so; and he was willing to admit also that, after the Reports of the Commissioners, who had inquired into the condition of the children employed in gangs at agriculture, it was in the highest degree probable that those provisions would be extended to agriculture. There would be something in that argument if all the children of the school age, who were not at school, were at work; but on this point there had been some appalling discoveries within the last few years. He was yesterday reading a speech of his hon. Friend the senior Member for Manchester (Mr. Bazley) who stated his belief that in that city more than one-half the children who ought to be at school were neither at school nor at work. That assertion was verified by a house-to-house visitation. Out of 11,000 such children, it was found that 5,200 were either at school or at work, while 5,800 were at neither. It would appear, therefore, that in Manchester—and, no doubt, it was the same in other places—the largest proportion of the children whose education was now neglected could not be got at by even the most rigid application of the Factory Acts. Again, though he was as much in favour of those Acts as anyone could be, they had this disadvantage, that undoubtedly they were an interference with the employer; and it was found in many cases that, rather than put up with this interference, employers tried to get rid of children's labour. Consequently it often happened that a number of children were dismissed from employment by reason of the Factory Acts, while the ignorance or poverty of the parents prevented their being sent to school. But if compulsory attendance at school were enforced in the case of all children, then those children who were now dismissed from labour would not be driven into the streets, but would be sent to school, and, at any rate, they would derive a great advantage from such a change in the law. Those who subscribed most generously in aid of the voluntary effort were the very men who were now coming forward to say that it was impossible to have a satisfactory system of national education founded on that plan. He had received a letter yesterday from the Secretary of the Manchester and Salford Educational Aid Society, informing him that in consequence of the falling off in the amount of the subscriptions which that Society had lately received, they could afford aid to only 4,000 children at the present time, whereas they formerly assisted 10,000; and that where they formerly gave 4*d.* they could now only give 3*d.* or 2*d.*, and where they formerly gave 2*d.* they now only gave 1*d.* The letter further stated that the educational efforts of the society were to a great extent frustrated by the indifference of the parents, an assertion that was supported by the significant fact that during the past year they were compelled to dismiss 1,500 children who were receiving aid, in consequence of their irregular attendance at school. What was the remedy for this indifference on the part of the parents to the advantages which were offered to their children by means of education? The House would recollect that in 1867 the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department and the Vice President of the Council introduced a Bill for permissive rating, but the lapse of twelve months showed them that they had not advanced far enough on the right road, and consequently their Bill of 1868 was a measure for compulsory rating. He earnestly hoped that still further advances would be made, and that when the subject was again dealt with compulsory rating would be supplemented by compulsory attendance. He was certain that a Bill for compulsory rating alone would not meet the educational requirements of the people, and he believed that the country would never accept of a compulsory rating Bill which did not contain a provision for compulsory attendance. No one could say that the popular ignorance was attributable to a deficiency of schools, because the facts that had been brought forward that evening completely refuted that notion. He, however, by no means wished to be understood as saying that there were no districts where schools were not deficient, or that there were no places where the erection of more schools would not be a boon to the surrounding neighbourhood; but what he meant was that in every town and in every village in the country there was more school accommodation than was made use of by the children residing near it. He could point out village after village with which he was acquainted in which the schools were sufficiently good, but where the education given in them went for nothing, in consequence of the removal at an early age of the children who, when grown up, were unable to read or write with facility. Those children who remained and availed themselves fully of the educational advantages offered to them were the children of small farmers and tradesmen, whose parents could afford to pay for their education. It was the ignorance, the poverty, or the selfishness of parents which was the cause of their indifference to the education of their children. Some were too ignorant to appreciate the blessings of education, others were too poor to deprive themselves of the extra shilling or two that their children could earn for them; while others were so selfish that they would ruin their children and cast upon them the blight of ignorance sooner than surrender the earnings of their children, which they spent upon tobacco or gin. But then, it was asked, would compulsory attendance effect the object they had in view? He believed that no remedy would be found for the defects of the present system until the State recognized the great principle that it was as much the duty of a father to provide education for his children as to provide food and clothing for them. While deprecating as much as anyone Government interference with individual action, he thought that, when a clear and distinct duty which the parent owed the child was neglected, the State became the natural protector of the child, and was bound to interfere in its behalf. It had been objected that such an interference with the rights of the parent would be un-English; but that argument had been set aside twenty years since, when the compulsory education clauses in the Factory Acts were passed.

A short time since the Vice-President of the Council said, at Manchester, that as we had not scrupled to force compulsory education upon children who were at work in the factories, we should still less scruple to force it upon those who were not at work. Those were words of happy omen for the future, because he thought that the right hon. Gentleman was of too robust a nature for his opinions upon the subject to be altered by official life. A few days ago the Sheffield Town Council passed a resolution in favour of compulsory education, and there was no sentiment which was received with half such enthusiasm throughout the country as a firm determination to support compulsory national education. It was then objected that compulsory attendance was all very well in theory, but that it would not do in practice. But who was it that raised that objection? Certainly not those who would be affected by the change; it did not proceed from the working men. Had the system of compulsory attendance been found impracticable in Prussia, in Saxony, or in the New England States? The proposal did not emanate from doctrinaires or from political dreamers, but from the practical hard-headed men of business of the north of England. It was further objected that the adoption of a compulsory system would destroy voluntary zeal, but had the Poor Laws destroyed voluntary zeal for the relief of the poor? On the contrary, it had been recently ascertained that no less a sum than £5,000,000 annually was contributed voluntarily for charitable purposes. One reason why he was anxious to press upon the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department and upon the Vice President of the Council the necessity for combining compulsory attendance with compulsory rating was that the rating question in this country was every day assuming greater and a more serious importance, in consequence of the rates in many districts having attained the maximum amount to which they could be raised. Under these circumstances it would be impossible to induce people to assent to an increase in those rates for any purpose, unless it could be proved that such increase would lead almost immediately to their reduction. If a compulsory rate were sanctioned without compulsory attendance being enforced, what security was there that, when the rate had been levied and schools built and supported by it, neglected children would go into those schools? Judging from the experience of Government Grants to schools, was there not rather reason to suppose that the schools would be to a great extent used by those who ought to pay for their own education? But compulsory attendance once facilitating the education of children now neglected crime and pauperism would infallibly be diminished, in spite of what had been said by certain dignified persons in "another place;" for the country would never listen to the degrading doctrine that there was no connection between crime and ignorance. This argument would not fail to commend itself to the ratepayers, heavily burdened as they might be at this moment—"Bear the educational rate for a short time; it will eventually lead to a diminution of crime and pauperism, and, with the reduction of these, the burden of local taxation will also be sensibly diminished." Hon. Gentlemen opposite might probably contend that there ought to be no fresh additions to local taxation until the system itself, than which, he admitted, nothing could be worse, had been adjusted. If they would accept a suggestion from him, it would be that education and pauperism ought both to be regarded partly as a local and partly as a national charge. This he said, believing that localities were not separately responsible for the poverty and ignorance existing in them, the causes by which these were produced being partly local and partly Imperial in their nature. The religious difficulty he did not regard as insurmountable, for the people of this country were beginning to resolve that sectarian feelings should no longer stand in the way of education. He did not wish to introduce irreligious education, and there was no wish to do anything antagonistic to denominational schools; but, as practical men, they knew that schools which were supported by rates must be entirely undenominational. Those who preferred denominational schools would be free to establish and support them, and if any district liked to have denominational schools, it might altogether escape a rate if a Government inspector reported that it was sufficiently provided with schools. As to the advance of education generally, he would only remark that each year competition with foreign countries was becoming keener and closer, and English industry must succumb in the struggle if other nations had educated labour and we had not. Let the House reflect how ineffectual our vast material gains of late years had been to effect any marked improvement in the moral condition of the people. Free Trade had been established; the Corn Laws had been repealed, there had been an enormous development of our railway system, our exports and imports had trebled, and yet pauperism was ever coming upon us with giant strides. Pæans were sung over our growing trade, and yet, from a Return issued by the Poor Law Board not more than a month ago, he saw that during the last nine years the amount expended upon outdoor relief in the metropolis had increased by 130 per cent. Was not that a portentous fact? The more they spent in the relief of pauperism the more pauperism seemed to increase. Why not try to reverse our policy? Pauperism seemed now to feed upon the bounty of the State. Like unthrifty husbandmen, we permitted weeds to be sown and to grow up with the corn, instead of attempting to destroy the seeds of future evil. Compulsory education, if established, would only be required for a single generation. Let the nation once be really educated, and then they could do without a compulsory system. Mr. Mark Pattison, one of the Commissioners of 1861, who officially visited the Continent, said, speaking of Germany—

"Schooling there is compulsory only in name. The school has become so deeply rooted in the social habits of the German people that, if the law were repealed to-morrow, the schools would continue to be as full as they are now."

That extract was taken from the speech of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who yet declared soon afterwards—"You who wish for compulsory education are striving after that which is Quixotic and impracticable." He could only reply that the political events of the last few years ought not to frighten anyone from striving after that which was Quixotic and impracticable. Household suffrage was once a point of the Charter, but it became a triumphant political cry. Though young in political life, he could remember when the disestablishment of the Irish Church was regarded as a dream, and its disendowment as a mere piece of visionary enthusiasm. Twelve short months since the Ballot was never mentioned except to be treated with official ridicule. Now, the question had passed below the Gangway to the elevated region of the Treasury Bench. So it would be with education. If its advocates had truth and right on their side, all they need do was to persevere—and some were prepared to do this—to work hard in the House, and harder still out of it. They had everything to encourage them. The growth of public opinion on this question had been so rapid, so extraordinary, that he would venture to predict that before many years were past no Government, whether Radical, Whig, or Conservative, would be able to appeal to the sympathies of enfranchised artisans unless that Government was prepared to exert all its influence in support of compulsory national education. He would move, as an Amendment to the Motion—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient to grant the proposed Committee, because the Government has at its command the information necessary for the framing of a comprehensive measure of National Education; and this House is further of the opinion that it is most important that such a measure should be introduced with the least possible delay.

MR. ADDERLEY said, that amongst the educated classes of the country there was no dispute as to the fact that the present state of national education required to be improved. The only dispute was as to the best mode of effecting that object. He, for his part, could not quite agree either with the proposition contained in the Motion before the House, or in the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. He could not think that they wanted the Inquiry which was moved for by the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Melly), nor was he so sanguine as to think with the hon. Member for Brighton that they were in the way of immediate legislation. Having had the great advantage of three able and useful speeches, the House might as well pass on to the other Orders of the day. He wished, however, to congratulate the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent on his earnest and eloquent speech, which showed that his heart was thoroughly in his work. He was glad to welcome such a recruit to the ranks of those who were devoting themselves to so important a cause. There could be no doubt as to the statement of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stoke-upon-Trent, that large numbers of children were, in all our great cities and towns, running idle, and that meant really being trained for crime. The hon. Gentleman had admitted, however, that there were a great number of vacancies in the existing schools. This fact showed that many of the children who were idling about the streets were not unprovided for, but were absentees from the existing schools, and only wanted to be made to enter them. In asking for compulsory powers with regard to those children, as he had done, the hon. Gentleman was not asking for that which his Motion asked for, but merely for extended police powers; and his argument rather applied to the Habitual Criminals Bill of the Government than to an extended scheme of education. The police powers he really asked for would be no novelty, but had been granted in the Industrial Schools Act, and he seemed only to wish that children of the class he had described should be similarly compelled to attend the elementary schools of our large towns, just as the children of a very kindred class might now be compelled to attend the industrial schools. What sort of inquiry would the Committee, the hon. Member desired, have to pursue? To him (Mr. Adderley) it seemed that the House had already had an abundant, if not an excessive amount, of inquiry on that subject; and he thought it would be almost an abuse of the system of inquiry to go on year after year investigating the same subject, even precisely the same branch of the subject, and filling their Library with acres of folios containing evidence which had been repeated ten times over. There were several inquiries before the exhaustive inquiry made by the Duke of Newcastle's Commission. There had since been the inquiry by the Committee of his right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), which sat for two years, and presented two folio volumes of evidence. Another Committee, moved for by the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), had since sat. Besides inquiries by Committees, there had been a number of Bills introduced to deal with this particular subject. There was a volume of unpassed Bills in the Library. There was the Manchester Bill of 1850, which he had himself introduced as a hybrid Bill, and on which there was the longest debate that ever occurred on a local Bill—lasting from four o'clock until midnight. He had never ceased to regret that this Bill did not pass, for he thought then, as he thought now, that the question could not be more satisfactorily dealt with than by allowing large towns which were willing to try the experiment by taxing themselves, and give the country the benefit of the result of the experience thus gained. Next came the Bill of his right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), the Borough Bill of Lord John Russell, and Mr. Cobden's Bill. Besides these Bills various Resolutions had been passed by the House. All this proved that if the House had not made up its mind how to act, it had, at least, before it the materials for so doing. The hon. Gentleman, moreover, was positively asking the Government and the Opposition to stultify themselves, because the present Home Secretary had introduced two Bills, and the Duke of Marlborough had, as President of the Council last year, introduced a measure in the House of Lords, including clauses expressly on the subject of these very children. The hon. Member asked these Ministers and ex-Ministers to affirm by his Motion that these Bills had been introduced without sufficient information or inquiry. But while a Committee was inexpedient, some measure was doubtless required. He had himself wished to call the attention of the House to the subject this Session, and to move a Resolution, but the Secretary of State for the Home Department having announced that the Government had their hands full of other subjects, and, besides, were introducing Bills relating to education, had almost precluded themselves or any individual Member from introducing any general measure on the subject this Session with success. The Government had not only other public measures on hand, but they were about to propose two important measures which were distinctly preparatory to a general measure of education. The first was a very wide measure on school endowments, and the country would reasonably say, "Prove that you have made the best use of the funds you possess before you ask for more." The next was the Bill on the subject of Rating, and the House would not be able to debate the various proposals for aiding national education until they knew on what basis the incidence of the proposed taxation was to fall. For himself, he had come to the conclusion that soon after these preparatory Bills legislation on the general subject was not wanted. The existing system had not yet been carried out to the utmost extent. It would be far better, at least, to try to do so than to have a complication of two systems, one of which would be in the way of the other. The matter might, he thought, be dealt with by further Minutes of Council. He was glad to find that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stoke-upon-Trent in his speech did not contemplate the constitution of anything like a new class of schools, because it was rather the tendency when a want was discovered to provide a new remedy instead of making the most of what existed. Nothing could be worse than the needless multiplication of different kinds of State-aided schools. The number of classes of such schools in this country was, in his opinion, already excessive. There were schools for the poor generally, aided by the State; there were reformatories, industrial schools, and pauper schools, besides art and science schools. He thought they had already made a needless distinction between the reformatory and the industrial schools, which were really intended for the same class of children—the idle and those who had committed a theft were only the bud and the fruit of the same tree. The evils of such a distinction were three-fold. In the first place, by treating the industrial schools as schools for honest children they treated the reformatory schools as penal schools. Now, a reformatory ought never to be considered as a penal institution at all. The child was punished in prison, and then the State undertook to make up for the neglect of the parents by giving the child the education they had neglected to give him. It was monstrous to treat a child penally for six years, or during all his childhood. Another evil of this needless multiplication of schools was that schools became divided among so many different Departments of the administration that the House could not obtain a comprehensive view of what they were voting in the way of education, and never knew what they were undertaking. They looked into the Estimates and saw so much charged for primary schools and so much for fine art schools; but that was only a small part of the public funds devoted to schools. There were pauper schools under the Poor Law Board; the reformatory schools were placed under the Home Secretary, as if they were an affair of police; while others were under the control of the Committee of Council on Education. He contended that all aided schools ought to be placed under the management of one central educational department. He had long advocated that view, and he was glad to find that the House was beginning to be of the same opinion. It would be a most material improvement if all the educational institutions to which the State contributed were brought under that one Department over which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, (Mr. W. E. Foster) presided. That was a very good reason against any new kind of schools. What, then, did the hon. Member for Stoke want?

MR. MELLY explained that he had already said he wanted free municipal schools, supported out of rates and with no religious education given in them, as supplementary to the denominational schools now existing and supported by voluntary contributions.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he apprehended these were merely accidental features of the system. What he understood the hon. Gentleman really to want was a larger number of elementary day schools in towns. How they were to be supported, or how administered, was a different question. The subject had been dealt with in every Bill that had been introduced, by every Committee and every Commission, and was to be found in every Report. It might be dealt with by the House in the shape either of a Resolution or a Bill. The question was, should they supplement the present system by local rates? His opinion was, they should try to carry out the Treasury Grant system more efficiently. He was not ready till that had been fairly tried to propose any supplement from the local rates. It was another question—whether the denominational system had failed, and whether a purely secular system should be substituted for it. That question also might be dealt with in a Resolution or a Bill. He confessed he should wish to see the denominational system further carried out. It had not been completely successful, but it had done wonders. Its success was increasing, and by the zeal exhibited in its support, he thought it might be carried out so as to complete its work. In his speech, made a few days ago, Earl Russell seemed to think the denominational system must be abandoned; that the voluntary support on which it was based had failed; that it had thrown the work too much on the clergy and the ministers of religion; and that the burden it imposed was a very unequal one. To make the system more efficient he said we must allow the State to take more power, and he referred to the example of Ireland, where the State gave, not as in England 60 per cent, but 93 per cent. The State being so large a contributor could deal more peremptorily with the question. But, after all, in Ireland the system had practically reduced itself to the denominational system. The Roman Catholics and the Protestants had each schools for themselves. Therefore he did not think the argument of the noble Earl was borne out by his illustration. He thought it would be well to try a little longer whether the Treasury could not supplement the denominational system, at the same time stimulating the private effort which it encouraged throughout the country. With regard to the Motion of the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent, he thought the hon. Member had made a wise distinction between town and country. He understood the hon. Member's Motion to refer to those large towns where numbers of children were left neglected in the streets. There the hon. Gentleman was right. The hon. Member had given them the statistics of four of the principal towns, and he (Mr. Adderley) thought these towns might advantageously be dealt with in the first instance. The reason why Scotland had gone so long without an Education Bill, or receiving its fair share of the Treasury Grants, was that the proposed Bills attempted too much by embracing the whole country. The old endowment of the heritors' tax provided for the counties, but the towns required a different provision. This was the difficulty, and if a Bill had been introduced for the larger towns, it would long ago have passed. He wished the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent and the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) would introduce a hybrid Bill—it was not yet too late in the Session—for the purpose of enabling those two great towns to show the way, and to rate themselves for elementary day schools. He believed those towns would be ready to avail themselves of such a power, and of the experiment thus made the rest of the country might take advantage. The rest of the proposition was to give the power to the police to take vagrant children from the streets and convey them before a magistrate, and, unless reason were shown to the contrary, to send them to school, charging the parents or guardians for their schooling. That proposition had nothing novel in it, and might be contained in a very short Bill. It would simply apply to elementary day schools a power already given to the police in the Industrial Schools Act. He did not think upon the whole that the House ought to consent to any further inquiry.

MR. BUXTON said, he certainly could not agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) that the country was ripe for the revolutionary change in our educational system which he advocated; but he was not sorry that his hon. Friend had brought before the House that broad question which was agitating the minds of all those who took an interest in the well-being of the people—the question whether they should retain the present educational machinery; whether they should preserve their voluntary system; or whether they should copy that system of the compulsory attendance of children combined with the compulsory maintenance of schools which prevailed elsewhere. Now, while he differed from those who advocated such a sweeping change, he heartily sympathized with them in their disappointment at the shortcomings of our present system. It certainly as yet was very far from accomplishing all that we might have hoped from it. It could not be denied that there were in all our great towns large masses of children who were neither at work nor at school, and that even of those who were nominally receiving education a very large proportion never got beyond the merest rudiments, and derived little if any lasting good from the schooling they received. With these deficiencies, some impatience would naturally be felt at the inadequacy of our educational machinery. The remedy proposed was two-fold. The leading proposal was to make the attendance of the children compulsory, as in Saxony and Prussia. No feeling of tenderness for the parents would deter him for one from adopting compulsion. Society was suffering grievously from their shameful apathy with regard to the education of their children; and the House had a perfect right to insist upon their doing their duty. The only question was, whether the thing could really be carried out. As the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council most justly said at the Manchester Conference, it was very wrong for Parliament to pass laws without carefully considering whether they could be enforced, because it inevitably weakened the respect of the people for law when they found it shuffled aside. There lay the gist of the question—whether, if such a law were passed, it could be carried out; and he could not see what machinery at present existed for enforcing it. One thing was clear—that the police must not be called into action for the purpose, nor yet the clergy; and it remained to be seen whether any other effective agency could be created. Again, some ridicule had been cast upon the phrase that had been occasionally used about this matter, the phrase that it would be un-English to apply such compulsion to the parents. He was not to be frightened by a phrase of that sort from doing what was necessary. But, after all, they would find themselves powerless if they went against the grain of the national mind; and certainly it was undeniable that our people have not been accustomed to the system of parental government—the meddling superintendence over their private concerns—to which the people in many parts of Europe had been broken in. And it was, in his opinion, a sound practical objection to say that the political habits of our people were out of keeping with the system it was proposed to introduce. At the same time, it was difficult to tell beforehand how far this would really be found a practical impediment. It was very possible that the working classes might hail this system as a real boon to them, or that, at any rate, they would very quickly learn to adapt themselves to it. This, then, was exactly the case in which it would be desirable to go on by way of experiment; and an admirable opportunity of doing so was offered. Why not permit Manchester, Liverpool, and a few other great towns which appeared to be very anxious to adopt the plan of compulsory attendance to do so? The experiment would furnish them with trustworthy facts by which to decide the question whether the system could be made to work well with the English people, and in what way efficiency could be best insured. The true object of the second proposal was to get rid of the present system of voluntary maintenance, and to establish a system copied from the Continent; by which the schools, instead of emanating from private sources, and trusting for maintenance to private persons, assisted by the Government, should be public institutions maintained by the locality out of its rates, though, perhaps, still aided from national funds. Admitting that those who took the lead in advocating the change did so from an earnest desire to promote the education of the poor, he must remark that they were supported by others who were extremely jealous of what is called the supremacy of the Church over education. If there were any proof that the influence of the clergy had been used in a mischievous manner; if there were reason to think that it had tended to make the people bigoted, or narrow, or sectarian, or if the people had been imbued by the clergy with ultra-ecclesiastical nonsense, then this objection would be well-founded, and a powerful motive would exist, for taking the education of the working classes out of such hands. But he could not discover any indication of such a pernicious influence. On the contrary, there were a thousand proofs that the children left school without any apparent taint of the kind whatever; and, in his opinion, it would be most ungrateful if they did not allow that this country owed an enormous debt of gratitude to the clergy for their strenuous, self-sacrificing exertions on behalf of the education of the poor. It was not necessary, however, to consider the interest of the clergy in the matter, either on one side or the other. The sole question was how could they best educate their children? Probably, if the whole question of education were before them for the first time, with no system whatever in existence, they would not adopt the denominational voluntary system; but it must not be forgotten that already the country had a gigantic machinery at work, which obtained the full concurrence, the earnest co-operation of the country, and which, though it did not as yet bear all the fruit expected and desired, yet had already wrought effects of infinite value. Already by means of this agency they had 1 in 7·7 of the whole population on the school books, while the proportion in Prussia—the best educated country in the world—did not exceed 6·25. Nor was it from want of machinery that the proportion was not a great deal larger. Everyone practically familiar with the subject knew that the still existing and lamentable want of education among the working class was only in a very limited degree due to the want of school accommodation; it was almost altogether due to the deplorable apathy of the parents. A very striking proof of this was afforded in Manchester. The Education Aid Society at Manchester—which had been at work for many years, strenuously exerting itself to encourage the attendance of children as well as to provide school accommodation—used to issue tickets to the children of the really poor, which enabled those children to go to school gratis; and yet in December, 1866, out of just 21,000 children who had received such tickets, less than 10,000 were found to be attending school. More than half the number were at home, although there was school accommodation for them, and every difficulty, except that arising from the shameful apathy of the parents, had been removed. No change from a voluntary system to a compulsory rating system would have any marked effect in increasing the number of children under education. And would it not be rash to sweep away a great and solid system, the fruits of the conscientious benevolence of the people, simply because it had not yet reached perfection? No one denied that it had worked marvellously well; and no doubt it was becoming every day more and more efficient. It had been shown the other day by Earl de Grey and Ripon that last year the number of schools inspected had increased by just 1,000; the number of children present at inspection was more than 1,500,000, an increase of 136,000; the average annual number attending was 1,241,000, an increase of little less than 100,000, while the number of certificated teachers, of assistant-teachers, and of pupil-teachers, had all largely increased. The system, then, was neither decaying nor stationary; it was growing vigorously, and was really adapted to the feelings and wishes of the people, and to the circumstances of the country. Then, again, there was the matter-of-fact difficulty which they were bound to take fully into account—the pressure of the rates. Already they were producing very disastrous effects in many parts of the country. They caused very great suffering, especially to the lower portion of the middle class and to the working classes, and sunk many into pauperism who would else be able to keep themselves afloat. Perhaps the worst effect of the present high local rates was that they so greatly discouraged the building of houses for the poor. It was a serious thing to increase this mischievous burden, and it seemed rather rash to throw the support of our schools upon this precarious and painful source of income, when, in doing so, voluntary contributions amounting to fully £500,000 a year would perforce be extinguished. He would not touch upon the religious difficulties to which the proposal of his hon. Friend would give rise beyond observing that it would never do to stir up against them the conscientious feelings of the people. This religious difficulty did not arise, as many seemed to think, from mere sectarian bigotry; there might be a little of that in it, but the people of this country had a profound conviction that their children should be brought up in the fear of God, and with a knowledge of their Christian duty. That feeling did not deserve contempt, and no system could flourish that did not fully recognize and respect it. Upon the whole he thought they ought to go on feeling their way towards something better, but maintained that the country was not prepared for the radical change which the Amendment of his hon. Friend (Mr. Fawcett) appeared to indicate.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, as the representative of a large constituency, he begged to offer his warm thanks to the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Melly) for having brought this subject so ably before the House. No one knew better than he how fit the hon. Member was to advise the House on the matter; it had been the study of the hon. Gentleman's life. The right hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley) had apparently not fully apprehended the point of the hon. Member's Motion, which was the importance of inquiring into the actual number of a very special class of children in large towns; he did not desire a general educational inquiry, but very properly wished to sift to the bottom the many startling statements continually circulating of the large number of children in the manufacturing districts totally destitute of education. Hardly any of the Commissions that had sat had reported as to the actual number of children who, from the poverty of their parents, could not attend school. The Factory Acts would, no doubt, very shortly meet the wants of a very large class of children who went to work, and would also be extended to the agricultural population as well, which would be a great benefit, and likely to meet the wants of the great labouring class of the population—namely, of those who were willing to work. Then, there was another class with regard to whom they had statistics—namely, the children of out-door paupers. With that class, the Duke of Newcastle's Commission very wisely proposed to deal at once by making it compulsory on the guardians to grant relief only on condition that the parents should give the children education—the charge for that education to be thrown on the rates. No less than 288,000 children were proved to be receiving out-door relief. There was also a destitute class of children who were not working, and who were not known as out-door paupers. The House would probably recollect the very startling returns sent from Manchester, the accuracy of which had been denied by the officials of the National Society. With respect to Liverpool, returns had been drawn up by the chief constable, but he did not think that entire reliance could be placed upon their accuracy. The chief constable had put down the number of children who passed through the streets at a particular hour as destitute of education. But many of those children had probably been at school some part of the week, and therefore he doubted very much the complete accuracy of the startling figures with regard to Liverpool. He could speak with some experience with respect to London, as he had long had to do with the East-end. The Board of Education started by the present Archbishop of Canterbury stated that there were from 180,000 to 200,000 children in the metropolis destitute of education, but those figures were torn to pieces. Then, the managers of the Bishop of London's Fund put the number at 100,000, while the Ragged Schools Union stated that 30,000 children were still as destitute of education as the 30,000 now under instruction in the ragged schools of London. His point was this—that the accounts were so diverse that, before we were led into any great change in our educational system, which it was said would be made next year, it would be well to have accurate Returns of the number and condition of the educationally destitute children in the larger towns. He would, therefore, venture to suggest whether, instead of a Committee of that House, it would not be very much better, if Her Majesty's Government saw their way, to send commissioners to the five great towns of this country to make inquiries as to the special condition of this great class. If the House would allow him, he would, before he sat down, enter his protest against the doctrine laid down by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) as to the great change for which the country was prepared with respect to education. He had had a great deal to do with the artizan class in London, Staffordshire, and Liverpool, and his opinion was that, ardently as they desired education for their children, they would not be satisfied unless it had stamped upon it some distinctive religious character. He did not say that it should be the religious opinion of the Church to which he belonged, but the point was this—that they were determined that their children should be taught a distinctive creed of some sort; and he should be sorry if those who were the warm advocates of education were to mar the progress of the great cause by a vain, futile, and, as he believed, hopeless pursuit of secular education.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he entirely agreed with the noble Viscount (Viscount Sandon) that the thanks of the House were due to his hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Melly) for the manner in which he had brought forward this question. His hon. Friend had taken great pains with the subject, not merely with a view to that debate, but practically for years, and they must all see traces of that in the remarkably clear and able statement which he had made to the House. He also agreed with the noble Viscount that the class of children to which he had called attention was distinct in itself. No doubt the condition of large numbers of children in our large towns, and not least in the largest towns, was one which had serious claims upon their attention. He believed his hon. Friend was correct in the words which he used when he spoke of the

That was a very strong—he must say a fearful statement, but he believed it was strictly true. It was said by the hon Member for East Surrey (Mr. Buxton) that the system might be worked by the co-operation of the people. But those children got no education, because there was no co-operation on the part of their parents. They escaped the action of the denominational system, because their parents were not of that class that could be attracted by any one religious system. They escaped our Factory Acts—which had done great good—because very many of them were the children of parents who could not find work, or did not care to find it. Consequently, we had this fearful state of things—a large portion of the nation growing up in our large towns without education, and ready to become members of the dangerous classes. It was said by a noble Marquess in “another place” that education did not diminish crime. That was one of those paradoxes which none but great men ventured upon. Probably the noble Marquess intended to say that education did not diminish vice. Was there anyone who had to do with crime in the country that doubted that education diminished crime? This was most certainly the case—that, as civilization increased and wealth accumulated, the temptation to crime also increased; but education, giving men more head-power to resist temptation, tended the reverse to diminish crime. It was because this class of persons destitute of education had been growing up to such an extent that this right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department felt the extreme difficulty of suppressing the criminal classes, and it was on that account that we found ourselves engaged in the consideration of measures which he believed were necessary, but which our ancestors would have felt repugnant to the principles of English society. He agreed with the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) that the time had gone by for Committees.

Viscount Sandon

The time for Committees had passed, and the time for measures had come, and he believed for comprehensive measures. It might be asked—"Why not bring forward measures, then?" But no one would wonder that the Government had not brought forward a comprehensive measure this year. With what they had to do, it was practically impossible. To attempt to solve this question would require a Session in which it would be, if not the principal work, one of the principal. His right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Adderley) had certainly a plan in his mind by which to meet the difficulty, and that was by altering the present Minutes of the Revised Code. Well, he wished he could agree with his right hon. Friend, because that would certainly be a very summary mode of settling the question; but he believed it to be impossible. He did not imagine for a moment that the House would attempt in that way to make the changes which would be necessary to turn the present system into a national system, which, to use the words of the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy), would bring education home to all the children in the kingdom. That was a hard work which was before the Government and the House. It was one of the hardest problems that any Government could have to grapple with. If there were no educational system at all it might be easier to make a national system; but the problem they had to solve was how to change the present partial denominational system into a national system with the least possible injury to that which existed at present. They wanted to touch those large numbers who were growing up out of the reach of voluntary efforts, without taking away from the education of those who were now reached. His noble Friend Earl de Grey, in "another place," the other night gave the statistics of what the present system was doing. The present system was doing a great work. There were last year 15,500 schools under inspection, with an average attendance of 1,240,000 children. But he had lost hope that this system could be expected to do much more than keep pace with the increase of population among the classes which frequented the schools. The hardworking artizan who cared about education took advantage of the present system, as did also the men who could be persuaded by religious bodies to entrust them with the care of their children. But those with whom it was now necessary to deal belonged to neither of those classes; and the danger arose from that cause. That was one of their greatest difficulties in that work—how they were to meet the wants of those who were uncared for without injuring those who were cared for? Another branch of the subject which had been touched upon that evening, and which must be touched upon whenever they attempted by any measure to solve that problem, was this—that while it was quite clear that neither the country nor the House would consent to one religious denomination being aided more than another, nor to the public money being given to religious teaching—although he believed they would consent to public money being given for secular teaching in schools which also imparted religious teaching—yet he believed that the feeling of the country would be quite as strong, on the other hand, against any check, discouragement, or interference being offered to religious teaching. It might be true, as was sometimes charged against them, that they felt more anxious about the religious instruction of those who were not so well off as themselves than they did about their own, and that remark would apply not merely to themselves but to some classes below them. But however that might be, they would be misleading themselves if they imagined that there was not a large portion of the working class who also cared about religious teaching, and he did not believe it would be popular—even if they were to condescend to consider only what was popular—to have such a system of national education as would really check and discourage religious teaching. Then there were other difficulties; for instance, that of rating, which appeared to be felt by many hon. Members, although he thought, if they looked at the mere pecuniary part of that matter, they would find that a 3*d.* education rate would soon be more than paid back by the diminished poor rate and prison rate which would result from it. There was also the difficulty as to upon what conditions they should give aid from the Consolidated Fund, and likewise the question of what security they should take that good teaching was imparted.

It had been mooted that evening that some of the securities on which the State now insisted should be relinquished. He expressed no opinion now on that point, but it was a most difficult part of the subject. Then they came to two questions started by the hon. Member for Stoke. The one was whether the schools ought to be free or not, and the other was whether they should look forward to a compulsory attendance. The time had not really come yet for them to express an opinion on either of those points; but he was rather surprised to find that his hon. Friend (Mr. Melly), with all the study he had given to that question—a study scarcely exceeded by that devoted to it by any one among them—should seem to suppose, as he (Mr. W. E. Forster) gathered that he did, that they could establish free schools to any extent in a large town, and that those free schools should not swallow up all the other schools there and make it necessary that they should all be free. Much argument could, perhaps, be used in favour of free schools, even although they might have that consequence; but he was sure they must approach the question whether the schools were to be free or not—and especially if they were to be free schools supported by rates—with the belief that, if they introduced any large number of free schools, the free school system would entirely prevail in the districts which were provided with them. They would not find that the hard working artizan, who with difficulty paid his rate, would allow that the children of people not so hard working or more poor than himself should be admitted to a free education paid out of his pocket, and that his own children's education should not be free also. Then there was the question of compulsory attendance, with respect to which some words of his own spoken at Manchester had been quoted. He thought the argument that it was un-English to compel the father, who was bound and also able to do so, to perform the duty of educating his children was an absurd argument, and it was one from which they had taken all the force by compelling him, if he sent his child to work, to submit to his education. But, while still of that opinion, he was afraid that this much remained un-English; not the mere principle of compelling a father to pay for the education of his child, but here comes the un-English part of the matter—the difficulty, according to English plans of government and English modes of thought, in putting machinery in operation that would make that compulsion anything more than a mere brutum fulmen and waste of power. The experience of the Continent was often quoted. The hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) would tell them that they might go from one part of Germany to another and they would scarcely find a single child who was untaught or unable to read and write, and that the principle of compulsion, though universal, was not now necessary, because almost every parent would send his child without its enforcement. But let them not deduce more than they ought to do from that argument; because he doubted whether it was not correct to say that, if compulsion had not existed at one time in those districts, there would not now be no longer any need of compulsion. But such compulsion, interfering with the daily life of her citizens, England never had; and he much doubted whether the English people would assent to it. America was rather more of a case in point, and the experience of New England was really curious in that matter. The School Inquiry Commission (of whom he was one) sent over an Assistant Commissioner to examine into the education of the New England States of America. The gentleman chosen was the Rev. Mr. Fraser, whose writings were well known to hon. Members on both sides of the House. Mr. Fraser made a most able Report, in which he stated that there existed a law of compulsory attendance at school in New England. Mr. Elihu Burrit, a gentleman well-known and much respected in this country, at a meeting in the Midland Counties, quoted that statement, and entirely denied its correctness. He was accordingly requested by some of his Colleagues in the Commission to find out whether it was really correct or not, and he went to Mr. Adams, who, before he came to England as American Minister, had taken a most active part in the working of the system of education in New England. He asked Mr. Adams who was right—Mr. Fraser or Mr. Burrit? Mr. Adams said Mr. Fraser was wrong and Mr. Burrit right, and that he was perfectly sure there was no such Act. The Commissioners then asked Mr. Fraser how he came to make that mistake, whereupon Mr. Fraser proved by the most unimpeachable evidence that the Act did exist. But what was the real fact of the matter? The Act existed, but it had been found to be so contrary to American feeling that it was not made use of for so long a time that its existence was entirely forgotten. Now, he had stated that once or twice before, and since he first did so, attempts had been made in New England—and he did not know with what amount of success—to put that Act in operation, arising, perhaps, from the necessity they laboured under, through the large number of emigrant children that went to them from the Old World. It would, he thought, be very instructive for them to see how far these efforts to put the Act in force in New England succeeded. Allusion had been made to the number of Bills which had been brought forward. It was quite true that he and the Secretary of State for the Home Department had tried their hands at a measure both last year and the year before; and their experience showed the difficulty of the question in a way hardly noticed that night. Their measure of the year before last was the result of the practical thought and labour of several gentlemen of different sects and different political views, but who agreed in a common desire to give the best system of education to the town of Manchester. That Bill, if it had been accepted by the House, would, he believed, have at that time met public opinion. Public opinion had progressed between the year before last and last year. He and his right hon. Friend made a change, and whereas their measure of the year before last was only for permissive rating, their measure of last year contained compulsory powers of rating in districts which could be proved beyond dispute to have no other mode of providing schools. He believed that their Bill of last year also would have met public opinion. But they had observed that the converts they obtained to their Bills were obtained a few months too late. Very powerful support was given to their Bill of 1867 when they found it necessary to bring forward their Bill of 1868; and now, when at this time it was quite impossible for them to try legislation again on that subject, he saw that a great organ of the daily Press, which gave them quite the cold shoulder last year, had come in this year to the principle of their last year's measure. That showed the great difficulties with which the Government had to deal. And then came the precise question which had been brought forward by his hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-upon-Trent as to whether a Committee could help the Government in any way. Now, he confessed that when the hon. Gentleman's Motion was placed on the Paper he looked at it with an earnest desire to derive help from it if possible, for the work to be accomplished was so hard and difficult that assistance ought to be sought for in every quarter. But he agreed with the hon. Member for Brighton and the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Adderley) that the proposed Committee was not very likely to be able to help the Government. Such a Committee could do two things. It could make suggestions and it could obtain information. Now, without wishing to undervalue suggestions which might be offered by a Select Committee, he must express his belief that the time for suggestions had gone by. It was, he might say, almost a fearful thing for the Government to deal with so difficult and important a question as that of education; but still it was the business of the Government to do so, and he could not see that any advantage would arise from seeking help from the suggestions of a Committee. Moreover, he did not think that suggestions relating only to the state of education in three or four large towns would be of much use, as he concurred with the right hon. Gentleman opposite that, although in dealing comprehensively with the subject, regard ought to be had to the various conditions of different parts of the country, yet it must be handled in such a way as to embrace the whole of England. Then a Committee might examine witnesses and elicit information, but this would hardly be of any assistance to the Government. He had, however, been seriously considering in company with Earl de Grey and other Members of the Government whether there were any means by which, acting on the hint given by his hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-upon-Trent, they could put themselves in a better position to deal with the subject. Thus he was led to the anticipation of the noble

Viscount opposite (Viscount Sandon). It would, in his judgment, be advantageous for the Government to obtain a statistical return of the actual amount of elementary education in three or four of our large towns. If, therefore, his hon. Friend should think fit to withdraw his Motion, he should be prepared to place upon the Paper, in the course of a few days, a Notice of Motion for a Return as to the number of schools and scholars in Leeds, Liverpool, Manchester, and Birmingham. The Government would also endeavour to form an opinion as to what kind of schools they were. The Government would not ask the House to grant them compulsory powers to obtain that information; but he believed they would be able to set at rest the doubt which had been raised as to the authenticity of the statistics of education in those large towns. For his own part, however, he put great faith in the returns which had been obtained by the Manchester Society and the Birmingham Society. With regard to Manchester, he knew the gentlemen who had undertaken to prepare the returns, and he believed that the Birmingham returns had also been prepared with great care. Still, as their correctness had been disputed, it would be an advantage for the Government to endeavour to ascertain how far they were correct. His hon. Friend had not laboured in vain in bringing the matter before the House, and, in conclusion, he would express a hope that his hon. Friend would, under the circumstances, withdraw his Motion.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he had been induced by the reference made to him by the Vice President of the Council to make a few remarks on the subject before the House. Although Germany might be spoken of as a country which governed its people very much by means of centralization, yet the same could not be said of Switzerland. He was well acquainted with the latter country, and also with Saxony, Prussia, and Würtemberg. Having travelled in every part of Saxony, where he was an employer of labour, he could bear testimony to the fact that there was scarcely a child of ten or twelve years of age in that country, whether in the city, the field, or the mountains, who could not read and write correctly and with ease. When Lord Stanley was Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, he made inquiries of our legations abroad as to the state of education on the Continent. Accordingly, our Secretary of Legation at Berne (Mr. Rumbold), made a Report, in which he stated that the Swiss people, while proud of their free institutions, were wisely convinced that their only sound and lasting basis was to be sought in as comprehensive and as widely spread a scheme of public education as possible. The same gentleman went on to show that, after little more than thirty years, the spread of education had been such that the Swiss could now boast that there was hardly a child within the limits of the Confederation who was incapable of reading or writing, with the exception of those who were physically or mentally incapacitated. This result Mr. Rumbold attributed to the result of compulsory education. The Report further stated that in the Grand Duchy of Baden penalties for the non-attendance of boys at school were almost unknown, and that in the Grand Duchy of Saxe-Weimar no fine for non-attendance had been imposed during the last forty years. He (Mr. Mundella) had himself examined large schools in Saxony, and conversed with the heads of schools, and they had assured him over and over again that the idea we had that it would be necessary to call in the aid of the police was absurd. In Switzerland, in the canton of Zurich, there was an Educational Board; every house was registered; the children were all registered; and all children were required to attend school when six years of age, and continue to do so till twelve years old. Between twelve and fourteen they were allowed to work half time. Of course the schoolmaster looked after them, and not the policeman. If the parent did not send his child to school the master reported him to the Board, who fined him a franc or so. But, in point of fact, compulsion had become almost unnecessary, for it was considered as disgraceful there for a parent to deny his child education as to refuse him necessary food or clothing. In Saxony there were one in six of the population attending the schools, from the sixth to the fourteenth year, and of these 97 per cent were in constant attendance, and it was not only the extent but the quality of the education that was admirable. If poor Saxony and poor Switzerland accomplished this he could never realize to himself that it could not be accomplished in England, the richest country in the world. He believed that the feeling was growing stronger and stronger in the country in favour of a compulsory system of education. He had no desire to detract from English institutions, but he wanted his countrymen to have the same advantages as were possessed by foreigners in respect to education. Our rural districts were even behind the great towns. While acknowledging the great sacrifices which had been made by the clergy of the Church of England in promoting education, he must point out that some great districts were neglected because they did not happen to have clergymen who were awake to the importance of this question. Within four miles of Nottingham, for instance, there was a parish containing 3,880 inhabitants; and a personal visitation made a year and a half ago showed that the number of children between the ages of eight and four and five and twelve was 750. And yet there were less than fifty at school. In consequence, however, of the efforts made by the excellent rector, and the munificence of his Friend the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley) and some of the landed gentry, schools would, in the course of a week or two, be opened in that place. At present there was only school accommodation for 100 children. No one was more ready than he to admit that the English people possessed splendid natural qualities, and if to those were added the blessings of education, he believed the cost of securing those blessings would be more than compensated for by the diminution of crime, pauperism, and that squalor which unhappily prevailed so extensively in our large towns. He had taken pains to inform himself as to the educational status of nearly 12,000 young persons engaged in work, and he found that while 20 per cent of them could not write a letter decently, there were 50 per cent who could not read or write at all. Such a state of things was, he maintained, disgraceful to a Christian country, and he hoped the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks (Mr. Disraeli), who, on the opening night of the Session, spoke of a system of national education as being absolutely necessary, would find an echo in all parts of the House, and that we should soon have every child throughout the kingdom enjoying the advantage of receiving instruction, as was the case in those countries upon the Continent to which he had referred.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, he wished only to state that the inhabitants of Manchester would not have shrunk from the operation of a Parliamentary Committee of Inquiry, if it had been thought necessary to appoint one. They did not feel that they were in a very forward state on the subject of education; but on the other hand, they were not so bad as some places. On the whole, he believed that they were better than the other Lancashire towns. In Manchester thirty-three out of 100 persons could not sign their names on marriage. The worst town in it, in an educational point of view, was Preston, which was represented by two Gentlemen on the other side of the House. In that town there were forty-nine persons in every 100 who did not sign the marriage register. He held in his hand an official Paper, which showed that, in several counties of England, there were districts where more than fifty in 100 made a cross in signing their names, and it was noticeable that those districts had the fewest boroughs where the educational state was lowest. It was a conviction which was very generally entertained, and which he himself shared that, unless we could devise something more efficient than the present system of education, we should have a great amount of ignorance in this country to the end of time. It ought, therefore, in his opinion, to be as soon as possible replaced by some more comprehensive system. There was the theological difficulty which had been referred to by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett). But in his intercourse with working men he (Mr. Jacob Bright) had always found that they cared very little for theological instruction at school. There was nothing he was more convinced of than this, that when a working man sent his children to school, and paid the school-pence, he paid for secular instruction and not theological, and would simply ask where he could obtain the best intellectual results. If he did not do so, he would show very little sense indeed, for he had abundant opportunities of giving his children religious instruction at home, and in the Sunday schools attached to the various churches and chapels which covered the face of the country. There was also the financial difficulty, and undoubtedly the results in Saxony described by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), and those existing in New England, in Switzerland, and elsewhere, were not to be obtained without considerable expense. He was willing that the country should pay for such results, and he believed it was able to pay for them. He saw the difficulties connected with local taxation, the burden of which was so loudly complained of; but if they could get rid of some of the burdens of Imperial taxation, the local taxation would be more easily borne. Now, we were saving this year between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000 and he believed that that saving ought to go on for four or five years to come in the same ratio. The constituencies of England had come to the determination that our expenses should be reduced, and if the reduction should continue in the same proportion, we should soon save a sum equal to one-half our whole local taxation, and we could then afford to be generous so far as the important matter of education was concerned. He had often remarked in that House the jealousy which existed in regard to the efficiency of the public services, and he sometimes thought it was made a cloak to cover great extravagance. He trusted the time would come when the House would be jealous about the efficiency of another service—one not less important than Army or Navy—he alluded to that service in which so many earnest and devoted men were engaged, who were endeavouring to carry instruction to the poor and helpless children of this country. He believed it was necessary to legislate on this subject, and he agreed with the Vice President of the Committee of Council that the Government alone could take it up effectually and successfully. He ventured to think that a Government which had shown so much ability in grappling with that great question of the Irish Church might, when that was removed out of the way, undertake a question so important and extensive as the present.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he thought it was not only natural but very desirable that the subject of education should once more be brought before the House at the opening of a new Parliament, and he for one felt very much indebted to the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Melly) for the manner in which he had introduced it to their notice. He must, at the same time, express his satisfaction at finding the Vice-President of the Committee of Council was not prepared to accede to the hon. Gentleman's Motion. In his opinion we had had sufficient inquiry on the subject already—[Mr. BRUCE: Hear, hear!] —and he was happy to find that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department seemed to concur in that view, for, as a Member of the Committee of which he himself (Sir John Pakington) was Chairman, and which sat two Sessions, the right hon. Gentleman must be aware that that Committee had exhausted the question. If he had to decide between the Motion of the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent and the Amendment of the hon. Member for Brighton, he should feel inclined, he must confess, to vote rather in favour of the latter. The House was amply furnished with facts, and it now only remained for it to grapple with those facts, and to proceed, as soon as it could conveniently do so, to legislate on the subject. He had repeatedly said that we should never solve the great problem of national education until we had arrived at the fulfilment of two conditions—the one the existence of a strong Government, the other the existence of a Government which was not only strong but determined to settle the question. The first of those conditions was realized, and he was well aware that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, as well as the Vice-President of the Committee of Council, had long had the subject sincerely at heart. Under these circumstances they had a right to expect that the question would be settled, and it was time that it should be settled. Further inquiry was not wanted. And on another point he was obliged, though reluctantly, to differ from the opinion expressed in a very sensible speech by his right hon. Friend the Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley). His right hon. Friend argued that inquiry was necessary, but then went on to urge that there should be a further trial of the present school system. Now he (Sir John Pakington) thought that the present system had been tried long enough, and what they wanted was a better one, which he hoped would be framed in a bold, statesmanlike measure by the present Government. It could not be expected this year. The manner in which the Government had arranged their business, and the late period at which the Session commenced, made it unreasonable to expect that the Government should grapple with the question this Session. But he must, in candour, state that, as they could not be expected to grapple with the question this year, they had taken the next best and most judicious step by bringing forward their Endowed Schools Bill. In saying this he did not mean to commit himself to the details of that measure, which in Committee would require a good deal of consideration, and, perhaps, of alteration. But the Bill dealt with one of the most important questions connected with education—namely, the painful and absurd extent to which a vast amount of endowed property throughout the country, devoted originally to purposes of education, had now become useless. The Government deserved credit for having, as a preliminary step, taken up that question. They were a strong Government; among their Members were men capable of dealing with the question as well as anxious to do so; and he trusted that next Session there would be no more inquiry, but a comprehensive measure upon this subject.

MR. HENLEY said, he rather regretted that the Government had refused to appoint this Committee, and he could not say that the reasons assigned by the Vice President of the Council appeared to be satisfactory. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the subject was full of difficulties, and nobody who had paid attention to it would think of controverting that proposition. But, as nothing was about to be done just yet, he asked whether meanwhile we had as much information as it was possible and desirable to have. One or two things had been said by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) as to which he confessed he should like to have had more information than was forthcoming at present. The hon. Member stated that, in spite of all the changes which had occurred in the Government examinations of the assisted schools, the result of an inquiry to which he was privy showed that, if the children who passed through these schools ever learned anything, they certainly had not done so in such a way as to retain what they learnt. That statement certainly seemed to be one worthy of consideration, supposing it to be well-founded. The hon. Member also stated in a very emphatic manner, that which at all events, seemed to be his own belief—how far it had spread among others he did not inform the House—that people were likely to feel degraded by having their children educated at schools that were assisted by donations, and to feel that they were being educated at charity schools. Now it might be worth inquiry how far the parents of children educated out of the rates might not feel pauperized. At all events, that was a question raised by the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham. He (Mr. Henley) would express no opinion one way or the other. In these days it would not be right or decent to use “an ignorant impatience” which was employed fifty years ago in reference to taxation, but there certainly was a very intelligent impatience about local taxation; and this, again, was a point on which further information would have been desirable. There was another question on which Parliament might have profited by inquiry—a question which the Vice President of the Council seemed to put entirely aside when he said that any system which was adopted must be a comprehensive one. This was saying, in other words, that special cases in special districts must not be considered, but that there must be one Procrustean rule extending over the whole country. Now, the proposed inquiry was one into the special cases of the great towns, and it might not have been useless or unworthy the attention of the Government to ascertain, by reference to the circumstances of these great towns, whether it was right to have but one rule applying to the whole country. All that he heard during the debate—and he could not hear very well now—made him regret that the Committee was not granted. If, as the Vice President of the Council had stated, the subject was full of difficulties, the more information they could get the better, even if sometimes they got the same facts twice over. The question was one in which every person in the land—high or low—was interested, and though Parliament, no doubt, had a great deal of information on the subject, that was no reason they should shut out more, and

MR. CARTER said, that the question which had been suggested—whether rate-supported schools might not pauperize the people, might be answered by another—how far did the higher classes feel pauperized by certain of the higher schools? He was glad that the Government had not acceded to the request of the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Melly), because he looked upon the hon. Member's proposition as an attempt to make an invidious distinction between the large towns and the other districts of the country. He agreed with the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) in thinking that the large towns were, to a great extent, mere reservoirs for the ignorance of the country, and that a large proportion of the uneducated belonging to the agricultural and other districts, came to settle in the large towns. As an instance of this, he would cite a few statistics relating to the agricultural district of Stoke-upon-Trent, with which the hon. Gentleman, who had introduced the question, was connected; and these would show that the whole of the ignorance of the country was not concentrated in the large towns. By way of contrast, he would first give some figures with respect to Leeds. That town, in the year 1861, had a population of 207,000. One-sixth of that was 34,500. Now, at the present moment, there were 11,300 children in the Government-assisted Schools in Leeds, leaving 23,200 children to be accounted for. On the other hand, he found it stated in a Report recently issued by the Privy Council that, according to the testimony of the Rev. A. F. Bonar, there was in a certain district immediately adjoining Stoke-upon-Trent, an agricultural population of 325,564, one-sixth of this number was 54,260; and there were at this moment 12,700 children in the Government-assisted schools in the district, leaving 41,500 children to be accounted for. Thus, in Leeds, one in seventeen attended the Government schools, while only one in twenty-five attended them in the district to which he referred. If, therefore, there was to be any inquiry how far education had progressed, they must not merely take in the large towns but the agricultural districts, which were in a worse condition. In the same Report, it was stated that education in that district had actually deteriorated; that in a parallelogram of 450 square miles there were only three assisted schools; and that there were forty-four villages, each of more than 500 inhabitants, where there was no school whatever assisted by the Government. It stated that at Lockington—one of those villages—the managers intended to discourage the attendance of children after the age of infancy, because learning tended to make labourers dissatisfied with their condition, and less civil and obliging to their employers. In a village immediately adjoining, the inspector stated that the clergyman had used all his powers of persuasion to induce the farmers and respectable inhabitants to support the school, but without effect, and, out of an income of £100 a year, he had to give £20 a year to sustain the school. They had been told that legislation on this subject was unnecessary. Now, within the last six months, he had addressed as large assemblies of working men as any man; and he had no hesitation in saying that in the large towns the people were almost unanimously in favour of a compulsory system of education. We educate our paupers, we educate our criminals, we educate all those who hang themselves on to the sects, but we leave a large class, between the pauper and criminal on the one hand, and the sects on the other hand, totally uneducated. What we require is a system which shall take hold of this class, educate them, and so prevent them from becoming the paupers and criminals of the land.

MR. MELLY said that, after the courteous way in which he had been met by the Government, and after their promise to give him even more than he could expect from the Committee, he was, of course, willing to withdraw his Motion. He thanked the House for the kind manner in which he had been spoken of throughout the debate.

MR. HERMON said, he wished to state that when the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Dixon) branded the borough of Preston as being the worst borough in Lancashire in respect to education, the statistics from which the hon. Member derived the information that out of 100 persons only forty-nine were able to sign their names on marrying must apply to a past generation, and not to the present. He was happy to say that Her Majesty's Inspector of Schools had reported very favourably of the state of education in that borough. Preston was a large manufacturing town, and if the children there were not properly educated, that circumstance would be an argument against compulsory education, because the children in the factories were obliged to attend school or else quit their employment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

MR. CRAUFURD, in rising to call attention to the system of creating faggot votes in Scotch counties under the Reform Act of last Session said: Sir, we have heard during the debate which has just concluded a great deal about the effects of education on crime. That is indeed a very wide question, and I think we might show in reference to it that education has not yet gone so far as to stop such crimes as the adulteration of food and of drugs, and, moreover, that it has not stopped the people of this metropolis, in large numbers, from resorting to false weights and measures; while, further, it has not the effect of suppressing the manufacture of counterfeit coin. On the contrary, education has given facilities for all these crimes; and with regard to the manufacture of counterfeit coin, which at the present moment comes more within my immediate cognizance, I may state that chemistry and galvanism have been brought in to assist in producing imitations of Her Majesty's coins to great perfection. But, Sir, the counterfeit to which I desire to call the attention of this House is one of a somewhat different kind; and I think that hon. Members on both sides of the House will agree with me that this is a crime often not regarded politically as a crime at all. We have heard that in politics, as in love and in war, everything is fair. We have also heard a good deal about education in politics. The right hon. Gentleman, the late First Minister of the Crown (Mr. Disraeli) took it into his head one fine day to go down to the capital of my country, the City of Edinburgh, in order to tell us that he was going to educate us himself in matters of politics. Sir, this question of education is connected with these faggot votes to which I am about to call attention, and this is a matter also intimately connected to a great extent with the progress of the party now sitting upon those (the Opposition) Benches. I do not desire, in the matter which I am going to picture, so far as I can avoid it, to make it a party question, because I believe, with regard to the crime to which I am going to call attention, that it is one with which both sides of the House are more or less tainted—I mean the creation of what are called faggot or fictitious votes. I think history tells us that, although this has been done by both parties, it was begun by the Gentlemen who sit opposite. Soon after the passing of the Act of 1832, the manufacturing of faggot votes in Peeblesshire was commenced by gentlemen of the Tory persuasion. To use the explanation given in 1837 by Mr. Horsman, in that very able speech in which he brought before the House the question of the manufacturing of votes—he confessed that my countrymen were too honest to be bribed, and too independent to be bullied, but that in some constituencies they were not too numerous to be swamped by these fictitious votes. The party then designated the Tory party were not the popular party, or at any rate had not in Scotland the representation of the popular feeling. Shortly after the enfranchisement—the real enfranchisement—of the people of Scotland by the Reform Act of 1832, it became with that party a serious question how far they should take measures to prevent the entire extirpation of the party. It became a matter of self-preservation; and as self-preservation is a law of nature, they would say that they were justified in keeping their hold of the counties. No one can doubt that it began with the Tory persuasion in 1833. That it was tried by Gentlemen on this side of the House I do not mean to deny, and I do not condemn the system one bit the more because it came from the other side. On the contrary, we who are identified with the popular party, and are supposed to represent popular opinions, are more to be blamed than the Conservatives if we indulge in practices like these. More than that, the evidence goes to this extent, that although the thing was done by gentlemen of Whig persuasion, in self-defence, not to be outnumbered by these fictitious votes, many of them were afterwards so convinced of the error of their ways that they gradually bought back the votes they had themselves created. But I should rather leave to those gentlemen who have always been the opponents of popular principles the odium of having created this class of fictitious votes. Now, what were the means adopted by those who introduced the system? There was introduced into Scotland, under the Act of 1832, a perfectly free, fair, and independent franchise, and among others, the possession and ownership of property of the value of £10 in counties constituted a qualification, and the qualification included life-rents. It was enacted that the actual possession of an annuity or life rent-charge of £10 and upwards upon the land was a sufficient qualification for a vote in the counties, and it is to this class of voters that I wish particularly to call the attention of the House. The system grew up, and small properties and blocks of houses were charged with life-rents—not in the ordinary way, where the proprietor parts with the fee but retains the life-rent for himself; but life-rents were created by proprietors retaining the fee themselves and granting nominal life-rents to a number of persons upon some piece of land or block of houses just sufficient to give each a vote. To show that in all these transactions there was no real bond fide change of proprietorship it is only necessary for me to say that most of the transactions were of this nature—A life-rent of £10 was created and sold to the person who was to be constituted a voter. No money passed, but a bill for £200 was granted by the life-renter to the owner of the fee. The interest upon that amounted to £10, and the interest on the bill was set off against the £10 life-rent. In fact, the whole transaction was a mere paper transaction; and this, supplemented by an oath before the Sheriff or proper officer, constituted the position of the voter. A very large number of these gentlemen were put upon the electoral roll simply upon the strength of these fictitious qualifications. And, mark, they were not gentlemen belonging to the county in which they got the qualification, but gentlemen residing in distant counties—in some cases gentlemen actually residing in London. It will be found, by referring to the roll of the county, that those gentlemen appear as owners of life-rents of £10, £12, or thereabouts—just sufficient to give them a vote. The ingenious method by which an attempt was made to give a semblance of reality to the transaction may be imagined from the fact that upon the register the voter is described by name, and put down as the recipient of so many pounds, one as proprietor of one-fourth of one-fourteenth; another as proprietor of one-twelfth of three-fourteenths; a third as proprietor of one-eighth of one-seventh of some wild spot. But if any Gentleman would make an arithmetical calculation, he would find that all these various fractional parts would come to one and the same thing. I hold in my hand the roll for the county of Selkirk, and I find on it the names of gentlemen who live in this part of the country, gentlemen who are writers in Edinburgh, gentlemen who are in the army serving in distant parts, but not one living in the district. Since 1832 there has been adopted a different system from that which prevailed before it. For instance, in Scotland we have what are called superiorities or feus—a system of granting feus upon a perpetual fixed rent, with the reservation of certain rights to the superior. They now grant feus, and the land is parcelled out into feu-rents beyond its value, and thus fictitious feu-rents are created. In the evidence given before a Committee of this House, it was shown that those parcels of land had been given out among gentlemen who had been brought into the county to over-ride and overpower the local vote. Whatever may be the opinion of hon. Gentlemen as to the extension of the franchise, I believe not one will defend a system which endeavours to destroy a constituency by infusing into it a large alien element which will swamp the free opinion of the constituency. Whether it be the opinions of the Liberal or of the Tory side, it is all the same for the purposes of my argument. You have no right—you Whigs especially—to go into a Tory county any more than you Tories have a right to go into a Whig county, and try to overturn local opinion by bringing with you a crop of strangers who have nothing to do with the interests of the county. My Motion, as a matter of course, refers to the smaller counties, because it is obvious that in the larger counties the difficulty of working this objectionable method is far greater. It is only in the smaller counties, that by the introduction of fifty or 100 strange voters, you can overturn the local opinion of the county. The county which the hon. Baronet (Sir Graham Montgomery) represents gives one of the most marked and notorious instances of the working of this system. I am glad to see my hon. Friend where he is, and I do not wish to say anything that would be unpleasant to him or his constituents; but my hon. Friend gained his election, in a constituency numbering something like 800, by the small majority of three votes, the numbers being 361 to 358; and when you come to analyze the voting, you find in the majority that there were about fifty faggot votes—the votes of people who were all strangers to the county of Peebles, gentlemen who resided in Edinburgh, and, indeed, all over the country, and who never lived in the county of Peebles in the whole course of their lives. Therefore it is quite clear that but for this half-hundred of buckram troops he would have been defeated by a majority of more than forty. Now, is it right that any constituency should be treated in that way? There is a further matter in connection with the county of Selkirk well worthy of the attention of the House. There is a notorious building in the town of Selkirk—an inn which rejoices in the name of “The Fleece.” While the county of Selkirk had a separate representation this inn was a favourite property for creating faggot votes for the county, being capable of qualifying some ten or twelve. But under the provisions of the Reform Act of 1868, the town of Selkirk is incorporated with the Border Burghs and the remainder of the county of Selkirk is annexed to the county of Peebles—the two together returning only one Member. The old faggot votes qualified on “The Fleece” having thus become useless, I am informed that “The Fleece” is now for sale, and by a curious coincidence “The Tontine” hotel at Peebles is likewise in the market, and the ostensible proprietors of “The Fleece” are about to transfer their business to “The Tontine.” These are the ingenious arrangements which the extreme education of the Scotch Conservatives enables them to carry out. But the system is not confined to Selkirk and Peebles. I received this morning an exceedingly interesting communication from the town of Rothesay, in the county of Bute. It will be remembered that in the election of 1865 the county of Bute returned Mr. Lamont in the Liberal interest. Last year a Gentleman of different political opinions was returned, and the writer of this letter from Rothesay states that in the county of Bute there are about 110 faggot votes in a constituency of 1,073. Of these 110 there are not more than fifteen resident; and about eighty have been created since the Liberal victory of 1865. This is the way the system is worked. They take a house belonging to some gentleman conveniently ready to sell and, curiously enough, they happen to find for that block of a house as many purchasers as can be qualified on it. Thus, for instance, on one “house and pertinents,” at Craigmore, Rothesay, there are eight voters registered as follows:—Alexander Boyle, Captain, R.N.—place of abode, London; W. S. Stirling Crawford, Esq., Melton; Charles Dalrymple, M.P. for Bute, New Hailes; Alexander Hamilton, Commander, R.N., Rozelle, Ayrshire; James Auld Jamieson, W. S., Edinburgh; Sir Michael R. Shaw Stewart, Bart., Ardgowan, Renfrewshire; William Stuart, Junr., M.P., Bedford; John Pettigrew Wilson, Advocate, Edinburgh. On another house there are six, chiefly belonging to Edinburgh; on another there are seven, almost all belonging to Glasgow; on another there are four, of whom one is the hon. Member for Lynn, brother of the Governor General of India, and so on. In all, there are about 100 gentlemen qualified in this manner as voters in the county without having lived in it in the whole course of their lives, or having any other concern with it, and that in a small constituency, where 100 votes are no mean weight to be thrown into one scale in the course of a contest. The writer continues in this way—

“You may be met with the assertion that faggot votes have been manufactured by the Liberals. This has been done to the extent of only four votes on a property purchased by our late Member, Mr. Lamont, much against the wish of his best friends. These votes have now ceased to exist, being recalled by Mr. Lamont.”

This is all we did in Bute, and the gentleman who did it was so satisfied of the error of his own ways that he recalled all these votes. Similar attempts were made after the defeat of my hon. Friend Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, when he was defeated in 1865 by the late Member for Renfrewshire, whose death we all deeply lament. On that occasion he put between thirty and forty gentlemen upon a block of houses in Pollockshields, for the purpose of restoring the balance of parties for his own side in the constituency, and he did it so ingeniously that, although objected to at the registration court, the votes were all sustained, except in one case in which the voter did not appear to defend his qualification. Here is the statement from a paper which I believe Gentlemen on the other side are not exceedingly fond of, whose large circulation throughout Scotland has been a topic of great envy, and they have attempted, but attempted in vain, to supplant the good teaching of that eminent and distinguished publication by circulating a halfpenny periodical. But then the halfpenny would not take. Tory principles in Scotland are so little palatable that they were driven to subscribe to promote and circulate gratis a paper of Conservative tendencies; and even that, I believe, has utterly and entirely collapsed. But here is the statement which is made by the Scotsman with regard to Sir Michael Shaw Stewart—

“Finding that he cannot be Member for Renfrewshire through the votes of the inhabitants of Renfrewshire, he has, along with his agents, passed a resolution that he shall be Member for Renfrewshire by the votes of the inhabitants of anywhere else.”

The writer then proceeds to point out what gentlemen of sound Conservative principles were put upon the property in Pollockshields. It may be said, “Oh, but probably the increase of the franchise has created a larger constituency in the smaller counties, and it does not follow that we can object to men being qualified in this way.” The great objection I entertain, however, is not so much to the qualification as to the fact that they are people not connected with the county. If you took your shepherds or your factors the case would not be so strong. But I will cite a case, stated by one of your own friends, to show that non-residence is absolutely necessary for the manufacture of these votes. I will quote the evidence of Mr. John Hope, a Writer to the Signet, who was examined before Mr. Horsman’s Committee, regarding thirty life-renters he had foisted upon two farms of Lord Hopetoun’s. He said—

Mr. Craufurd

“None of the thirty reside in the county. I studied as much as possible to obtain the consent of persons connected with the county, but there is great difficulty in getting people to take the votes. In 1837 I went about for nearly two months, and had the greatest difficulty in getting the number I wanted—17. In 1838 I only wished two persons, and I exerted myself as much as possible, and could only obtain one; and I had to fill up the other qualification with my own name, having reserved myself for such a contingency.”

The agent of the party is searching high and low—not, like Diogenes, seeking for a just man—but for a man who will accept these fictitious votes, and undertake to vote always in the way in which the proprietor wishes. But it may be said that these are matters concerning proceedings under the Act of 1832. What I complain of is that under the Act of 1868 the system is now being perpetrated, and, so far as I know, perpetrated by only one party in the State. By the Act of 1868 we supplemented the franchise of 1832. We gave the franchise to persons holding property below £10 in counties, down to the ownership of property of the value of £5 a year. The object of that enactment was—and I do not think that any Gentleman on the other side of the House will contradict me—that whatever the legal wording might be, the spirit and equity of the Act meant that you should enfranchise the small artisan, the small proprietor, the small shopkeeper, living in the county and belonging to the county, whose voice up to that time had not been heard in the Constitution. And what are you doing? You are selling properties to rich merchants in Glasgow, to rich proprietors in other parts of the country, for the purpose of multiplying £5 owners, who shall swamp and not represent the feelings and opinions of the county. No less a number than thirty-four of these voters are being created in this way in the neighbourhood of Peebles alone. Now, there is a curious piece of evidence connected with these transactions. A man, to obtain a vote, must be in possession for six months at least before the 31st July. I hold in my hand a copy of the register of seisins for the county of Peebles, and I find there thirty-four gentlemen registered as proprietors and life-renters on house property in Peebles, and if you look through the list, you will find that everyone of these deeds was signed on the 28th, 29th or 30th January last, just six months before the 31st July. They are not conveyances of separate houses, but of small portions of houses, many of them being half-flats, of the value of £5 to £7 or £8; and if any of my English Friends do not know exactly what a "half-flat" means, I will explain. It means a half-floor. These new proprietors comprise no less distinguished people than four Messrs. Kidston, of Glasgow, merchants and shipowners, who are registered upon a small house—so small that none of the tenants of the house have any vote at all. There are four rooms below and four rooms above. Each of these gentlemen owns two rooms on each floor—each, in fact, has got half-a-flat; and that is intended as a representation of property. A gentleman who owns a couple of rooms in an attic in a back street of Peebles is to be considered as a true and honest representative of the county of Peebles, while the people living in those same houses have no votes at all. I do not think that the House of Commons will consider that such proceedings are anything but a fraud. It never could be intended that the rich merchants of Glasgow should be registered in this way, simply and solely for the purpose of gaining a vote in counties with which they have no connection. But there is another feature. The property is sold, most of it, by one gentleman. There is only one agent for the buyer and the seller. Who is that agent? The political agent of my hon. Friend the Member for Peebles, or the political agent of his party in Edinburgh. The whole of this, I think you will agree with me, shows distinctly the object for which these properties have been transferred and have appeared upon this register. We do not know how many more fictitious votes of different kinds may have been manufactured. They need not be produced until the registration court is held. What I hold in my hand is therefore, at any rate, the least that has been done in the county of Peebles. Now, Sir, I do not want to be too hard on one county. I propose to ask the House to grant a Return on this matter, so that we may ascertain how far this system has been carried on in the various counties of Scotland. I have given the House as much information as I have on the subject, and I think they will feel with me that, before any plan of remedying such a great defect and so great a fraud upon the legislation of this House is devised, we should have sufficient information upon which to act. But I may be asked, "What remedy do you propose?" Well, if I were to propose the remedy which I wish, it would be the remedy which was suggested on every Scotch hustings throughout the last election—a remedy to which I believe every Member for Scotland on this side the House is pledged—namely, the equalization of the county and burgh franchise. But I know there are many eminent men on this side of the House who are not prepared to go to that length. The other thing which I would propose as a remedy is the condition that residence shall be necessary in counties as well as in burghs. I have had it objected to me, "Oh, but you will disfranchise an enormous number;" and some have said I should disfranchise a very large number of my own friends. Well, the view I take is that the remedy for any special evil should be based upon a principle; and when you have once found the principle that will be the true corrective, you should adopt that, no matter whether it is at the expense of your friends or your foes. My belief is that the vote is a personal privilege, and is not the privilege of property, though property has been for many years adopted in this country as a means of testing the qualification for a vote. The Tories, on the contrary, have always maintained consistently that the vote represents property; and therefore they only adopt this system upon the principle that it is the property that should vote, and not the man. I maintain that it is the person and not the property that has the vote; and I say that by making residence the condition we should give to every man in this country only one vote, and place every individual upon the same footing of political rights. That is the only true and just principle. Why is one man to have nine, ten, or a dozen votes, whilst his neighbour—poorer than himself, but perhaps far better in intelligence and knowledge—is only to have his miserable one vote? The hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), stated in this House on one occasion that he had votes for no less than twenty-five Members. I can myself vote for nine. In old days, before railways existed, it mattered very little how many of the counties a man had votes in, for he never could vote, except in very special circumstances, in more than one county. But now that by railways you can move about very rapidly, you have multiplied the power of voting, and have practically introduced into our political system that objectionable principle of giving votes according to the amount of property. I contend that this is not right, and I think I could refer to very high authority on this subject. An eminent lawyer, an honour to his own country and to his profession, made, in 1848, an exceedingly admirable speech upon this matter, and with the permission of the House I will quote a passage—

“The principle of the Reform Bill,” he said, “was not to give the franchise to the property but to the electors. The possession of property was taken, not as a qualification properly speaking, but as a test. It was held to be the test of two things: first, of the capacity to give an independent vote; and, secondly, of the territorial interest in respect of which a vote was given. The whole system of the Reform Bill is territorial. It does not make this or that man in any particular locality vote for all the members which Scotland sends to Parliament. Each man is to vote in his own locality. If it were desirable to go to Parliament for any remodelling of the electoral system, I am perfectly clear that the principle of residence under some modification or other is the only one that can secure true representation.”

Those were the principles uttered in 1848 by my right hon. Friend the present Lord Advocate, and I hope he will legislate on them in 1869. We are told it is too soon to meddle with the Reform question; and that, out of deference to the feelings I suppose of hon. Gentlemen opposite, we ought to let this matter simmer on till another Session. But if you do not legislate now, depend upon it that before next September the register will be crowded by these fictitious votes. I trust, therefore, that the Government will not hesitate, but at once find some remedy for this evil. The adoption of actual residence for county voters may be one way of effecting it, but as that may interfere with those who have long possessed votes, it would perhaps be wiser to go step by step. It may be done by enacting that all proprietors under £10 should be required to be resident in the county where they vote, or the condition of residence might be attached to those holding a qualification below that necessary for Commissioners of Supply. Others propose that a £20 or £14 qualification should be the proper limit; and with a view to test these various limits, I shall move for a Return that shall give us the non-resident owners of each county in Scotland, the value of whose holdings are under £100, £50, £20, £14, and £10, and then we shall see how far, by adopting any one of them, we should disfranchise the present voters. My belief is that if we adopt the £20 limit, we shall not disfranchise a single one. Our rule should be to adopt a limit that will not disfranchise any real bond fide voter. The remedy in the case of the life-renters is simple enough. It is that those who receive the life-rents should be infeft in the property, and so to make it a bond fide possession. There should also be a provision preventing owners being tenants of the life-renters. You may limit the life-rent under the Act of 1832 to meet the case of ministers and schoolmasters, who are very proper persons to have a vote. There is another mode of multiplying votes—by creating a number of joint tenants. This might be met by requiring personal residence in every case; but, inasmuch as the Act of 1868 provides that in small properties there shall not be more than two joint tenants possessing the franchise, that practically meets the evil; but as regards the life-renters and great proprietors and owners of property, the House will agree with me that we ought to adopt some limit, and not allow the county votes to be made by fraud. I only allude to the case of the hon. Member for Peeblesshire as an example, and not personally. It is simply an instance of the working of the system. The case of manufacturing votes in England may be cited, and we may be reminded of the votes created to promote the objects of the Anti-Corn Law League, and probably the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade will be alluded to as one of the greatest manufacturers of votes. I shall be twitted with that, but I would remind hon. Gentlemen that the creation of those votes was for a great public purpose. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen may laugh, but they cannot deny the fact that the votes created by the League were in furtherance of a great public object, whereas those created in recent times by the Tories were for personal aggrandisement, and there is a great distinction between the two. [“Oh, oh.”] I must further observe that the votes created by the League were, as I am informed, not faggot but bond fide votes. Be that as it may, I will go as far as any man in adopting a system of legislation which will put a stop to creating fictitious votes, and maintaining the honour and dignity of our Legislature. I hope I shall receive the support of the House in moving for the Return to which I have alluded.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Return, in a tabulated form, from each county in Scotland showing the total number of non-resident proprietors qualified to vote for a Member of Parliament, distinguishing in separate columns the number of those whose property in such county as shown by the Valuation Roll is of less annual value than £100, £50, £20, and £14, and also those at and under £10 respectively; showing the nature of the qualification whether Fiars, Life Renters, Superiors, or Feuars; also the number of such County Voters resident within any Royal or Parliamentary Burgh within each county respectively,"—(Mr. Craufurd),

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, that, after the pointed allusions which had been made by the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Craufurd) to the two counties he had the honour to represent, he felt called upon to make a few observations upon the subject before them. At an earlier period of the evening a Petition had been presented with reference to his seat, and he could not help saying that if this question had been raised in consequence of the small majority of three by which he had been elected, he thought it would have been much more straightforward had the ordinary course been adopted which was usual in cases where the return of a Member was sought to be set aside. It had been truly represented in the Petition that there were fifty votes of the kind referred to in Peeblesshire. These life-rents were of two kinds; some, which might be called the old life-rent votes, were created avowedly by the Conservative party in self-defence, for the practice of manufacturing life-rent votes was commenced by the Whig political agent in 1835; and the proof that the Conservative votes so created were bond fide lay in the fact that these remained on the register till the present day, whereas the others had long ago disappeared. The other kind of life-rent votes were of a later creation, having been created by gentlemen in favour of their sons, brothers, and other near relations. In such a practice there was nothing whatever to be complained of; on the contrary, he stood there prepared to defend it. It was a right and a proper thing, he maintained, for a gentleman having sons to interest them in the political welfare of the county where they were bred and born. And the reality of these life-rent votes had been proved on two or three occasions, when, the holders of the life-rents having become bankrupt, the creditors seized upon and sold this interest. With regard to the counties both of Peebles and Selkirk, he could state that before the last election the business of the registration courts occupied a very long time, occasioning enormous expense to those concerned, and ending in numerous cases of appeal to the Court of Session. The lists therefore were thoroughly scrutinized, and he did not believe there was a single vote upon them to which the character of an illusory or fictitious vote could for one moment be applied. The question of residence was, no doubt, an important one, but he should be sorry to see it made a condition of the franchise. It was a common practice in Scotland, in the smaller villages, for persons who had quitted them in early life to acquire property in them when their means enabled them to do so, without the slightest intention of residing in them; and there was no pretence for saying that there was any collusion between them and anyone else for the purpose of supporting any political party. If residence were made a condition of the franchise, all these non-resident owners would be excluded from exercising the franchise in those localities, the connection with which they so highly valued. The hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) truly stated that before the Select Committee in 1838 no point was more strongly pressed than the desirability of making residence a qualification of the franchise. But did the Committee adopt that recommendation? On the contrary, no one could read their Report without perceiving that they had arrived at an opposite conviction. Upon the general question as to whether the system of creating votes in support of a particular political party was right or wrong, he offered no opinion. But as a distinction had been set up in this matter between the cases of England and Scotland, he might refer to one instructive passage from the Report of the Select Committee of 1846, which considered this question as relating to England. The Report set forth that as the law stood facilities undoubtedly did exist for creating votes by granting rent-charges and splitting up small freeholds, and that such facilities had been taken advantage of by different parties at different times and in different degrees, for the purpose of increasing their electoral influence. In many cases these new electors were connected with their respective counties in no other way than by their share in the county franchise. That appeared to him quite as strong a condemnation of the system in England as anything which had occurred in Scotland. The hon. Member for Ayr referred to the proceedings of the Anti-Corn Law League; and it had been stated in the Scotch papers that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade was to address the House upon this occasion, and to declare his views. When the right hon. Gentleman did so, he trusted he would say whether he thought the Anti-Corn Law League were justified in the proceedings which they took to cut up with 40s. freehold votes the West Riding of Yorkshire, Surrey, and other counties. The proceedings of the League were all fully detailed in the Report to which he had just alluded; and if he was not mistaken, that body even went the length of advertising in the public papers, requesting persons to come forward and make purchase of these votes. He would not futher detain the House, but would express his own strong opinion that the Member for Ayr had made out no case whatever for Parliamentary interference.

MR. CHARLES DALRYMPLE said, the course taken by the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) might, perhaps, be justified if he could succeed in obtaining from the House a definition of what a "faggot" vote really meant. At an indignation meeting on the subject held in a Scotch town and reported in a newspaper, the large circulation of which, according to the hon. Member for Ayr, was matter of envy to Conservatives, two definitions of the word were given; and though he did not think that either of them was strictly accurate, he would state them, as they might amuse the House. One speaker said—

"If you turn to a dictionary for the word 'faggot,' you get as its meaning, 'a soldier numbered on the muster-roll, but not really existing.' Faggot voters in a county I take to be men numbered on the roll of electors, but not really existing."

Another speaker declared the meaning of the word "faggot" to be, "a bundle of sticks tied together for the fire," and added that "faggot voters were voters bound together by a political tie for the purpose of carrying fire and destruction to a bond fide constituency." The Member for Ayr said he did not bring forward this question in a party spirit, but immediately afterwards made use of this expression—"The Tories are desirous of having property, and property alone, represented." Sheltering himself under the example set the night before by an ex-Secretary of State, he (Mr. Charles Dalrymple) would venture to assert, with great deference to the hon. Member, that "a more nonsensical remark could scarcely be made." The speech of the hon. Member showed that he did not attach one iota of credit to the party lately in power for the part they had taken in the Reform Bill, or he (Mr. Charles Dalrymple) should say, that their share in that Bill ought to free them from any such ridiculous charge. The hon. Member for Ayr had alluded to the county of Bute, but was altogether mistaken in supposing that all the faggot votes there were on the Conservative side. A particular inquiry had been made into this subject, in consequence of an assertion that his (Mr. Charles Dalrymple's) return was owing to the faggot votes. The facts were these—At the last election, fifty-eight of these votes were given to the Conservative side and forty to the Liberals, the majority by which he was returned over his opponent being 165. He was ashamed to trouble the House about personal matters like these, but he was practically compelled to do so, after the course taken by the hon. Member for Ayr. It had been alleged, and truly, that he (Mr. Charles Dalrymple) was a faggot voter, but he had not recorded his vote in his own favour, although, according to the newspaper reports, that course, if he had thought proper to adopt it, would have been justified by the step which the very highest authority in that House had taken, in voting for himself. There was no connection, he was bound to say, between the recent election for the county of Bute and the creation of the vote in his favour. He would make one more remark, and that was with respect to some of the names to which allusion had been made. None of the names which the hon. Member had read to the House were those of gentlemen who were not more or less connected with the county of Bute. The hon. Member for Ayr justified the course taken by the Anti-Corn Law League, by the assertion that they only created votes with a high political object. Well, he could assure the hon. Gentleman that there was not a single vote made in the county of Bute which was not made with quite as high an object. After the late Reform Bill, the number of towns enfranchised was so great that the voice of the country districts was scarcely heard; so that if a landlord occasionally encourages his relations and friends to buy a qualification in his county, even then the landlord interest in the county would be imperfectly represented, as compared with the influence of the towns. As the hon. Member for Ayr had referred to Rothesay—and he would say that it was the only large town in his constituency—and though he had received support from a large number of the new electors there, he should have no objection to return to the Anti-Reform Bill settlement, and to make Rothesay one of the towns connected with the Ayr District of Burghs.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE: Sir, with regard to the Petition which has been presented this evening, the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Graham Montgomery) must have laboured under a misapprehension in supposing that there is any idea of raising the questions as to his title to sit in this House upon that Petition. The petitioners were, however, in my opinion, fully justified in setting forth the grievances under which they laboured in consequence of the large number of non-resident voters, who turned the scale in their unfortunate county, or rather counties. I say unfortunate, because that part of the country enjoys the unenviable notoriety of having been the scene upon which this battle of faggot votes has been fought for the last thirty years. I remember it being stated to me by a friend who is now no more, and who contested Peeblesshire thirty years ago, that if all the resident voters in that county had voted for him, there were enough of non-resident voters to turn the balance. Without examining very closely the accuracy of that opinion, which may, perhaps, be open to doubt, I find some proof of the statement in the Report of the Committee which sat on the question of fictitious votes nearly thirty years ago; in which the register of these two counties was referred to, and it was stated that the constituency was almost doubled under the system which had been put in operation. I will not enter into the question as to who began this system. I think that from whatever quarter it was begun it deserves our condemnation, and that it ought everywhere to be received with reprobation, in order that it may be checked in future. I trust that this House and the Government will think that now is the time when they should be alive to the necessity of taking steps in this matter. I am justified in saying this, because I made an appeal to the last Parliament on this subject. Although the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Dalrymple) says that it is not a party question, I was opposed to a man by hon. Members opposite. I made my attempt both upon the English and Scotch Bills, but, although I was unsuccessful, I predicted that the question would, in Scotland at least, crop up again. I admit that this question does not now occupy the same position as it did thirty years ago. The system as it then stood was full of the grossest abuse, and has been described by my hon. Friend (Mr. Craufurd) as almost amounting to an interchange of bonds which might be destroyed in the following week; but such a system could not exist under present circumstances, and the scrutiny which follows the voting. It is obvious that wherever we have low property qualifications the desire will be felt to bring persons from a distance as purchasers, in order to overbear the natural constituency. I think there is no class of people who feel a stronger interest in the franchise they possess than the residents in the Scotch counties which are the subjects of this discussion. I wish to impress upon the House that there is a strong disposition to get rid of the evil. Public attention has been attracted to this question and to the system by which property is registered in such a manner that the public can ascertain where and how they pass from one hand to another. In the present instance many of the properties are created by gentlemen connected with Edinburgh and Glasgow, who have no connection with these counties; this being so, the object of the manufacture of these votes is perfectly plain. It is a singular fact that in the Petition which has been sent from these counties, fifteen out of the 300 signatures are those of gentlemen who voted for my hon. Friend (Sir Graham Montgomery) at the last election. With regard to the remedy, I think that the application of some such test as you take in boroughs would be advisable. I think that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Ayr has taken the right course in moving for Returns which will be of service to the House in considering this matter.

VISCOUNT BURY said, that although he was now an English Member he had been the representative of a Scotch constituency; and, perhaps, because he did not now represent a Scotch constituency, he might speak more freely of the system of creating faggot votes. It was not often that Members were converted by arguments used in a debate; and he confessed that, when the hon. Member for Ayr rose, his idea was that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Craufurd) would have done well to recollect the maxim quieta non movere. He must admit, however, that he had been convinced by the arguments he had heard, and especially by those used by hon. Gentlemen opposite. They confessed that there was a vast number of faggot votes, but they contended that they represented the true and intelligent opinion of their constituencies. No doubt this was the case; but, if so, they had much better be returned by the intelligent voters of the district than by votes created in this manner. It was highly advisable that faggot voting should be discontinued, for the system neither reflected credit upon the hon. Members who were returned by it nor upon that House. He did not concur in the remark of the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) that a person possessing a large territorial position ought not to possess more influence than one who possessed merely a cottage. He thought that the territorial magnate must necessarily be in possession of more political influence than one who, to use a common saying, "had a lesser stake in the hedge." But, at the same time, he did not think that the creation of fictitious votes could by any possibility conduce either to the purity of election or to the honour of that House.

LORD GARLIES said, that after what had dropped from hon. Members opposite, the statement of the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) that this was not a party or personal question could hardly be said to have been substantiated. It had been said by hon. Members, that whenever a non-resident was registered on a £5 qualification, the vote must be taken to be a fictitious one. Now, he could only say he had several applications from gentlemen, of whom he had never previously heard, who happened to have originally belonged to the county he represented (Wigtown), requesting that his political agent might find properties on which they could secure a vote. [A laugh.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite might laugh, but, perhaps, it would not be very pleasant to them to be informed of the reason given for those applications. It had also been said that strangers had no business to possess votes in small Scotch counties; but if strangers might not vote in small Scotch counties, was it proper for large Scotch counties to be represented by Members who had no title in the county at all? If the principle were carried out, where would the hon. Members for Perthshire, Renfrewshire, and also the gentleman who sought to represent Dumfriesshire, now be?

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he must remind the noble Viscount (Viscount Garlies) of the fact that the hon. Members (Mr. Parker, Mr. Bruce) to whom he had just alluded had been returned not by faggot votes, but by the free and unbiassed liberal voters of the counties. That was beyond all dispute. The noble Lord objected to them because they were Englishmen—["No, no!"]—well, because they did not reside in the counties they represented; but if that was an objection in the eyes of the noble Lord, it was no objection in the estimation of the whole of Scotland. The fact only showed that, failing to secure good and true Liberal representatives in those counties they looked outside for them, and there could be no doubt those who had been selected did them the highest credit. With reference to the more general question, he did not envy the position of the hon. Gentlemen who had addressed the House from the other side on that occasion. In default of a shadow of argument in support of the present system it had been asserted that it was an admirable system by which a gentleman could assist his sons, nephews, and other near relatives to obtain votes in the county in which he lived. But the lists did not fulfil the hon. Member's own conditions. It appeared from the roll for the two counties of Selkirkshire and Peeblesshire, that the faggots were not sons and nephews of proprietors in those counties. They had not the most remote connection with those counties, but were persons from Berwickshire, East Lothian, Aberdeenshire, Edinburgh, Dumfriesshire, and other counties; and the parties had even gone as far as the county of Fife to import from that distinguished county the Conservative agent and his son. [Sir GRAHAM MONTGOMERY: There is not one of them on the roll yet.] He only hoped the Government would take such steps as would prevent their ever getting on the roll. Public feeling in Scotland was undeniably strong on this subject and was daily becoming stronger. The intention of the Legislature in passing the Reform Bill was that the bond fide opinion of the Scotch constituencies should be made known in the election of their representatives; and he contended that where a large body of non-resident voters were brought into a county, they swamped and destroyed the voice of the electors, and prevented a free expression of their opinion. He strongly advised the Government to deal with the matter with a bold and unsparing hand, and if they did so, he could promise them the support of every liberal-minded man in Scotland.

LORD HENRY SCOTT: Sir, the hon. Baronet who has just sat down has said that it is an unjustifiable act on the part of any person to increase his interest in the political condition of the county in which he resides by giving votes to his sons, nephews, and other relatives. I do not think that the hon. Baronet has given fair interpretation of what has been said on this side of the House. No one on this side has maintained for a moment that he has a right to create fictitious votes. The existence of fictitious votes is what is denied. Having long represented the Selkirk constituency, I can safely say that, with the exception of those votes which were put on the roll in 1835, and which are certainly open to the charge of being fictitious, there have been no such votes created in the county of Selkirk. In the Report of the Committee of 1838 on the fictitious votes in Selkirkshire, it is stated that it was not to be wondered at that in a small county where the parties were so equally balanced, they should struggle for the mastery; and they began—which made the first start it was immaterial to inquire—by creating fictitious votes; but these votes are now nearly exhausted by death, bankruptcy, and other causes. We have since had a certain number of voters imported from the neighbouring counties. They have bought properties, and paid for them with their own money, and they have a fixed bond fide interest in these properties. If you are going to alter the Reform Act, and say that a man shall not have a vote for any place except where he is resident, that is another question. That would be altering the Reform Acts of 1832 and 1868, providing that the county representation should rest upon property, and, however much the arguments of the hon. Member for the Ayr Burghs (Mr. Craufurd) pointed to manhood suffrage, I am glad those Acts did not assert that principle, and I hope the principle of a property qualification will always be maintained in the electoral franchise. If it can be proved at this moment that any man is a fictitious voter, let him be struck off. This is surely a matter strictly for the registration courts. Very recently, in the county of Midlothian, seventy joint proprietors in a small oil factory claimed to be placed on the register; they belonged to the Liberal party, but were objected to as fictitious, and the names were struck off the roll. I maintain that that is the proper way to deal with them. The Liberal party, although anxious to cast odium on their opponents in reference to the creation of fictitious votes, did not scruple to try and sustain those votes in the registration court. I only hope the Returns moved for will be given, because they may be of use to both sides of the House. The question should not be dealt with as affecting particular cases, but should be decided on a broad principle applicable to the country at large.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, the hon. Baronet who represents two counties of Scotland (Sir Graham Montgomery) is quite mistaken in supposing that I was anxious to address the House on this question; but he made some observations which I may be justified in attempting to reply to. He quoted, as an authority for what is now complained of, the course taken more than twenty years ago by the council of the Anti-Corn Law League. It may be a sufficient answer to the hon. Baronet to say that on that occasion the whole of the Conservative party in this House utterly condemned the course which was taken by the Anti-Corn Law League. I say, therefore, that unless hon. Gentlemen opposite have entirely changed their opinions on this matter, they must utterly condemn the practices to which our attention has been directed to-night. A Committee was moved for, I believe by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), and an attempt was made to show what bad things the Anti-Corn Law League was doing. One of the cases referred to in it was brought before a court of law—I think before the late Lord Chief Justice Tindal. He not only supported the vote, but declared that it was quite within the purpose and privileges of the British Constitution that the franchise should be extended by those means which were sanctioned by the law. But bear in mind that there was this distinction: the votes made by the Anti-Corn Law League were real votes, not sham votes like these which are being manufactured in Scotland. What we did was to ask the population of the counties, who, under the £50 tenancy clause had almost no representation, to avail themselves of the 40s. freehold franchise, and to purchase qualifications and become electors in their counties. I do not pretend to say there were no persons who bought votes in other and adjacent counties. I will not overstate the case at all, but the general course was to advise the populations of Leicestershire, Yorkshire, and Cheshire to buy properties in the counties in which they lived, and thus to enfranchise themselves. But judging by the statement of the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd), and other Gentlemen who have spoken, it is quite clear this is not the course which has been taken in Scotland. When you buy, or obtain these faggot votes, you cannot give me one of them; I am of different politics. It would be a breach of trust if I were to ask and you were to propose to give me one of them. You cannot sell them even, at least, if you were to propose that, you must sell them to one of your own politics. I can quite understand that that Gentleman who ran to and fro upon the earth—to find two or three different persons whom he could qualify—might have found great difficulty in discovering any specimens of the Tory persuasion in Scotland. If he had been willing to have as electors persons of Liberal opinions, no doubt he could have found persons who could have qualified without going out of his own village. Therefore, the difference is all the difference in the world. In our case the votes were real votes, and we held the property which could be sold, and could be left by will; but in your case your property—if it be a property—has none of these qualities, and in point of fact is no property whatsoever, and the vote is no real vote according to the principle of English law, and is a sham vote. You are doing that which the English law would most certainly condemn. I look upon it that making votes in this way, coming in among a constituency so small—they have in fact no large constituencies—as those county constituencies to which reference has been made—is really making war on the British Constitution. There are many ways of disfranchising a constituency. You may pass an Act and get rid in that way of all the electors; but if you introduce persons who are not resident in the county, and have no property in it, you may just as effectually get rid of the constituency, and as completely disfranchise it as if you passed a Bill for the purpose. Hon. Gentlemen opposite profess to defend the Constitution. I think if they consider the matter as it has been debated to-night they will feel that the course is not only foolish, but that it is wrong, and Gentlemen returned by votes of this kind must feel that they would much rather be returned by the uncontrolled expression of the real will of the whole constituency. The House has done a great thing within the last three years upon this question of the representation. It is, I believe, resolved, having given a wide suffrage, to endeavour to make the suffrage pure and real; and we have got rid of the foolish and ignorant idea of past years, that there was something injurious in having real representatives of the people in this House. Having come to that conclusion, why should not hon. Gentlemen opposite take the course which some gentlemen in Scotland, who would sit on this side of the House were they in it, have taken, and give up a practice which they themselves must condemn, and which whenever they speak of it as practised by a Liberal they condemn just in the same manner as we condemn it. If it should not be abandoned, it will, I should think, become the duty of Parliament to take some steps by a short Act or by the introduction of some words to make this fraud impossible? If you send a man to gaol for stealing a pocket-handkerchief, what should be done to a man who, in the face of the noble representative Constitution of this country, invades a county, and by means which the law never intended to sanction, and the principle of the law emphatically condemns, shall defraud the whole resident population of the county of the franchise, and of the electoral power which the law has conferred upon them?

MR. HUNT said, he had not intended to take part in this debate, but the vehement expressions of the right hon. Gentleman opposite induced him to make one or two observations. As one hon. Gentleman after another had risen and declaimed against the practices they were considering, he could not help making the reflection, "What hypocrites we all are!" The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down said that when the creation of faggot votes was instituted by the Anti-Corn Law League—

MR. BRIGHT: No. I did not say the Anti-Corn Law League created faggot votes; I said exactly the reverse.

MR. HUNT said, he was sorry if he had misinterpreted the right hon. Gentleman, but he certainly understood him to say that the Tory party condemned the creation of faggot votes by the Anti-Corn Law League. That was the impression he had given the House. ["No!"] If the right hon. Gentleman did not mean that, it was impossible to say exactly what he did mean; he stated that when the Council of the Anti-Corn Law League suggested the creation of faggot votes the Tory party objected. ["No!"] He (Mr. Hunt) thought they should not be unfair to one another; each party, no doubt, did its best to secure a predominance in the constituencies by every means the law allowed; when the effect was against the Opposition the Opposition complained of the practice; when the reverse was the result the other side complained. His hon. and gallant Friend behind him, (Mr. Dalrymple) had said that fifty-eight faggot votes had been polled for him and forty for his opponent; and no doubt if the numbers had been reversed his hon. and gallant Friend would have remonstrated against the practice. Judging from the vehemence of hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House, he presumed the balance of advantage through the practices referred to was on the Conservative side. It was, therefore, natural that right hon. Gentlemen opposite should make themselves out to be monopolists of public virtue and patriotism, and that their opponents ought to be reprobated. His experience had been that Conservatives of great territorial influence in counties were met by energetic Liberals getting up land societies and enabling cottagers to become freeholders by paying 1s. a week or 1s. a month until they purchased their houses. He had been present at registration courts when the question was fought out whether the freehold in question was worth 39s. 6d. or 40s. Now, what did the landed proprietor do to counteract this endeavour to upset his legitimate interest as the owner of 5,000 or 6,000 acres? Determined not to be beaten by the Anti-Corn Law League, or some other society in London, he thought that, as his eldest would some day inherit his property, there was no harm in his becoming possessor of a portion of it at once; so he made over some land to him, and perhaps did the same by a younger son, that both might throw their votes into the scale and defeat the ends of the land society, who, under the pretence of benefiting the poor man, designed to deprive the landed proprietor of some of his proper weight in the county. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had said that Chief Justice Tindal had laid it down that these votes were within the purpose of the law. [Mr. BRIGHT: Real votes.] But the question was what votes were real. If these practices ought to be put an end to let them have a Committee on the subject and see what should be allowed and what not. In his opinion they had wasted a good deal of time that night in raking up personal questions between this great man and that great man. The debate had not added much to the dignity of the House, for the question, if raised at all, ought to have been debated with much less acrimony and party spirit.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he did not at all agree with the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, in thinking that the debate had not added to the dignity of the House. On the contrary, he thought that his hon. Friend (Mr. Craufurd) had done good service in bringing the subject forward, and that the right hon. Gentleman had also done good service by the tone in which he had discussed the proposition before them. He agreed, however, with the right hon. Gentleman that the question ought not to be discussed in a party spirit, and further, he admitted that those on his side of the House were not entitled to assume that they were the sole depositaries of electoral purity. He recollected the beginning of this system in Scotland, and a more disgraceful or degrading system it was impossible to imagine. It was put in practice by both parties; he would not say by whom it was commenced, because he did not know. The question, however, ought not to be who began it, but who was to put an end to it. He hoped that would be the only question that would be asked in future. He had been in hopes that the system had come to a natural termination. The noble Lord who had addressed the House a little while ago (Lord Henry Scott) was quite right when he stated that since 1836 no fictitious votes had been created in the county which he represented. The practice had died out altogether since that time until 1865, when it was revived, and the other day indications were given that it was again going to commence. It was in vain to go back to the past, and to bandy recriminations in the matter; hon. Gentlemen could not but see that the times were changed, and that influences which were looked upon with a lenient eye before would not be tolerated now by the enlarged constituencies. The last Parliament had given a great boon to the people which had been received with gratitude and enthusiasm, and it was the duty of Parliament to see that the boon was protected and not abused. There was one great evil in the system complained of, and it was this—that it was as near a system of corruption as anything in which honourable men could engage could be. Parliament was trying to prevent electoral corruption, and yet, by this system, they would import into a county a set of voters who must in honour vote one way. In Scotland that evil was felt much more because the constituencies were so small. In large constituencies like the English counties the representation could not be affected by such a system; but in Selkirk and Peebles, if they were to allow non-resident voters to come in, they would over-ride the resident constituency. He would not say anything about the Anti-Corn Law League and its Council, further than that there was a great difference between their case and that which the House was now discussing; but this he would say, that he had always held that it was far more constitutional and far better for the country and the people to leave voting and the acquisition of qualifications to the natural course of things, and not to interfere in one way or another to increase the constituency. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt) had suggested that a Committee should be appointed, and that the matter should be inquired into calmly and deliberately. Whether that course ought to be followed, or the Government were to attempt to legislate upon the subject; or they were to wait to see what effect the expression of the opinion of the House might have upon the country, he would not at that moment attempt to say. But this he would say, that the course complained of could not be continued, for the people would not submit to it. It might be that the landed interest in Scotland was not so fully represented in that House as the landowners and perhaps some others might wish. But he could only say that territorial influence was to be acquired by other arts and other means—by sympathizing with the people, by feeling as they felt, and sharing in their sentiments. That was what would give the landlords an influence which they never could acquire by such a system as that which had that evening been brought under the notice of the House. He would beg his hon. Friend to withdraw his Motion, and the Returns would be granted, as a matter of course, if he would move for them on Monday.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MAIL PACKET CONTRACTS.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

Mr. SEELY said, he rose to move for a Select Committee to inquire into certain contracts entered into by the Postmaster General with Messrs Cunard and Mr. William Inman for the conveyance of mails to the United States. On the 20th of March, last year, on a Resolution moved by the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), a debate occurred on the subject of postal contracts, when the practice of giving fixed subsidies to special lines of steamers was condemned by almost every person who spoke on that occasion. It was likewise contended that in the several contracts which might be entered into all the companies should be placed on the same footing as to terms of payment and conditions of service. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt), who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, said—

"He did not think there was any real difference of opinion between the Government and the hon. Member who brought forward the Motion."—[3 Hansard, cxc. 2017.]

His right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade closed the debate, and recommended the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) to withdraw his Motion, and he did so. But anyone who would examine the contracts to which he was now calling attention would see that those two principles of no fixed subsidy and of equality of condition between the several contractors had not been complied with. On the 25th of June, last year, the hon. Member for Hampshire (Mr. Sclater-Booth), who was then Financial Secretary to the Treasury, in answer to the hon. Member for Montrose, said that—

"It was the intention of the Government in making new contracts for the conveyance of the mails to place all the companies on the same footing as to terms of payment and conditions of service."—[3 Hansard, cxvii. 2132.]

But, instead of equality, it was found now that Messrs. Cunard were to receive a fixed subsidy of £70,000 a year for two services a week, and Mr. Inman £35,000 for one weekly service, while the North German Lloyd were to have no fixed subsidy, but only the sea postage, so that what they should receive was to depend on the number of letters they carried. Then Messrs. Cunard were not tied to perform the passage in any given time, nor was Mr. Inman, but the North German Lloyd Company, which had no subsidy, were bound to a particular time, under a heavy penalty if they did not keep it. Again, Messrs. Cunard were to have a contract for eight years, if the House ratified it, and Mr. Inman for eight years also, while the North German Lloyd Company could be sure of their contract only for six months, when the Post Office might put an end to it, and he understood that the Treasury had written to the Post Office, recommending that it be put an end to. On the 20th of March, 1868, the right hon. Gentleman, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, said, that—

"According to the calculation of the Post Office the sum eventually agreed to be given exceeded by only £1,500 the sea postage they were likely to earn."—[3 Hansard, cxc. 2018.]

It was now admitted, however, by the Post Office that the loss was £22,500. But if the Committee which he moved for was granted, he would undertake to show that the loss, taking the sea postage only into account, would be much more like £40,000. The condition in former contracts that there should be a sorting-room on board the steamers had not been enforced in this case. It might be urged by the right hon. Gentleman opposite that the Government did the best they could, and that they had no option but to take the offers made to them. Now, he contended that there were other lines of steamers which would have been able to perform that service; but that was a question which was, perhaps, better fitted for discussion in a Committee. At the same time, he might mention that there were the two Glasgow Companies' steamers, the Hamburg steamers, the North German Lloyd's, and other Companies, with some of which he did not believe there would be any difficulty in arranging for the service to the United States—he believed that the Hamburg Company would have given them a Saturday service if required—and the Post Office could compel Messrs. Cunard to have taken ship letters at 1*d.* each, and there were penalties for delay. He was aware that it would be urged that it was necessary that the vessels should call at Queenstown, but the Hamburg steamers could be got to do that. The Inman line when it had a contract which did not bind it to call at Queenstown nevertheless did so. All last year the Inman steamers called there, having only the sea postage, and they would have gone on doing it. He maintained that it would have been quite easy to get as good services as those they had now obtained, and in support of the assertion he would read the opinion of the Duke of Montrose, when Postmaster General, expressed on the 24th of October, 1867. His Grace's opinion was given in these terms—

“The Cunard Company, though no longer under contract with us, would, it is well known, continue to despatch their ships as at present, and would assuredly endeavour, and very properly endeavour, to place the packets under contract with us in a disadvantageous light. It has been thought that we might put ship letter mails on board the Cunard ships. If we did so, the Cunard Company would, no doubt, endeavour to carry those mails so well as to make the public draw an unfavourable comparison between the foreign company which was within, and the British company which was without, the pale of a contract with the British Government.”

That opinion was contained in Parliamentary Paper No. 42, page 37; and it appeared to him almost to dispose of the question. By the contracts now on the table of the House they would get two good services a week for £105,000; whereas on the basis of the tenders issued in 1867 they might have had three good services weekly for the sea postage only—namely, one by Mr. William Inman's vessels, one by the North German Lloyd's, and one by the Hamburg Company. The contract for 1868 contained no fixed time within which the service should be performed, and no penalty for exceeding the time; whereas, in 1867 there was a fixed time, with a penalty. It was now proposed—excluding the route of the North German Lloyd's, which was to cease—to have one line of Cunard's quick steamers, one line of Cunard's slow cargo boats, and one of Mr. William Inman's vessels. They might strike out the Cunard's slow cargo boats, because they were generally overtaken by boats which left one, two, and in some cases three days afterwards. By the proposed arrangement they would also be tied for eight years, and would in all probability not get a daily mail during that period. Now, in 1866, Lord Stanley of Alderley, then Postmaster General, said he thought a daily mail was a very desirable thing, and that it might be obtained. So under these contracts they would discontinue, in all probability, the North German Lloyd's service—a good service, costing £12,000 a year, the sum which they received for postage; and they would get the service of the Cunard's slow boats on the Wednesdays for £35,000 a year. As to speed, the Cunard boats, which would be under no penalty as to time, went at the rate of 12 knots an hour by the measured mile. On the other hand, the Hamburg Company had one boat the speed of which was over 13 knots by the measured mile, four boats the speed of which was over 14 knots, and it was no extreme calculation to say that in all probability, before these contracts expired, they might have boats which would go 15 or 16 knots an hour. He was informed that the Messrs. Cunard were not building any new vessels, while other companies were building new vessels and fast vessels. And he prayed the House to remark that of the twenty boats which the Messrs. Cunard kept to perform these services there were only six fast and fourteen slow vessels; and whatever time they took the Post Office could not say they had not fulfilled their contract, because it had accepted those slow boats, and knew, therefore, that a good speed could not be obtained from them. The United States sent no mails by the Cunard cargo line. The form of tender issued in 1868 required the different companies to be bound to time, and the fourth clause contained a penalty for not keeping time. The Messrs. Cunard and Inman struck out those clauses. By a Return he had got from the Post Office he found that between the 1st of January 1869—the commencement of the contract—and the 8th of February the Messrs. Cunard and Inman's boats made sixteen voyages, nine of which exceeded time. In two cases the excess of time was one day and a half; in another case, nearly three days; in another, over three days and a half; and in another, over four days and a half. The proper time was twelve days. The North German Lloyd's vessels during that period made five voyages; and in two cases they exceeded time—in the first case four hours, and in the second eighteen hours. Would it not be better, therefore, to dispense with the slow boats and keep the North German Lloyd's boats? Again, he objected to contracts of this kind being entered into for a term of eight years, because they would in all probability be pleaded as an argument against any reduction of the rates of postage. The renewal of the contract with Messrs. Cunard in 1858 was alleged again and again as a reason why the postage should not be reduced from 1*s.* to 6*d.*, and it was stated by the Postmaster General that that contract entailed a loss of over £100,000, whereas by arranging with other respectable owners of ships the postage might have been reduced and a saving of £100,000 a year effected. He confessed he looked forward with great hope to the reduction of the postage between this country and the United States from 6*d.* to 3*d.*, or even a smaller amount. At all events, he felt satisfied that before long arrangements would be made for fixing the postage at 3*d.* Nay, he even went further and maintained that it would be wise for us to reduce the postage to 1*d.*, for he believed that the loss we should thereby incur would not be nearly equal to the amount we expended by reason of the contract entered into with Messrs. Cunard. He strongly objected to the system of giving fixed subsidies to particular firms. A kind of monopoly was by that means built up which was highly injurious to parties who did not share in it. On the 22nd of November, 1867, Mr. Inman wrote to the then Chancellor of the Exchequer a letter containing the following passages:—

"Any advantage given to them [that is, the Messrs. Cunard] can only injure the public service. . . . We have as good a fleet as the Cunards; our company is seventeen years old."

And in the same letter they expressed their willingness to take the sea postage. In another communication they stated that to give Messrs. Cunard a greater subsidy than the Inman Company would be to enable Messrs. Cunard "to underquote our rates of freight" and make Inman's ships go empty. No doubt these arguments were very telling as against Messrs. Cunard, but they could now be applied with equal force against Mr. William Inman. He understood, and in fact he knew, that Messrs. Cunard had informed the Post Office two days ago that if the Motion of which he had given notice were carried they would not call at Queenstown to-morrow. The Motion they alluded to was his original Motion, in which he asked the House not only to appoint a Committee but to withhold their approval of the contract until that Committee had made its Report. Since then, however, he had so modified the Motion that it only related to the appointment of a Committee. Now, he confessed that to his mind it was a somewhat strange and novel thing for a private company to place itself in opposition to the power of Parliament. He would say nothing about their want of patriotism, but it would be for the lawyers to determine whether, in the event of Messrs. Cunard's boat not calling at Queenstown to-morrow, they would not place themselves in a difficulty. At all events, the House of Commons ought not to allow itself to be influenced by a threat of this kind. He might likewise remark that the commercial men of London need not be under any apprehension that even if Messrs. Cunard should not call at Queenstown their letters would not be forwarded to the United States. He held in his hand the copy of an offer which a Hamburg Company had made to the Post Office to the effect that their boats for carrying the mails to the United States should call at Queenstown, and that they would comply with all the conditions in the contract of Messrs. Cunard, with the sole exception of that which bound them to allow the Government to purchase their vessels in the event of war; and they offered to carry the mails for £25,000 a year instead of £35,000.

MR. BAZLEY, in seconding the Motion, said, he wished to state why he disapproved the contract which had been laid upon the table. In the first place, the system of subsidies had long been condemned by this House, and he therefore regretted that this contract should have been proposed. Like his hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) he was a warm advocate of a 1*d.* postage to America. The mere freight of letters across the Atlantic would not cost more than £5 per ton, whereas 1*d.* for each letter would mount up to £140 per ton. There was ample reason, therefore, for supposing that a 1*d.* charge would give a sufficient profit to induce owners of vessels to carry the mails. If there were no monopoly, we might have a daily communication with America. The Secretary to the Treasury of the late Government, during a discussion which took place last year, stated that it was the intention of the Government authorities "to put an end to subsidizing lines of steamers and establish free trade in the carrying of letters;" and the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that he was desirous of seeing the postal service across the Atlantic self-supporting, and that it was in that spirit that future contracts would be entered into, but that it would not be advantageous to fetter the hands of the Government or lay down such a rule as was then suggested. He thought after such statements they would have some difficulty in explaining why these contracts had been so impetuously entered into.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Contracts entered into by the Postmaster General with Messrs. Cunard and Co. and Mr. William Inman for the conveyance of Mails from this Country to the United States be referred to a Select Committee of this House,"—(Mr. Seely),—instead thereof.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that as the Government did not propose to offer any opposition to the Motion for the appointment of a Committee he should not trouble the House with any very lengthened observations on the subject. He should like, however, to enter a little more into detail than he had been able to do in answer to a Question which had been put to him a few evenings before, with respect to the course which the Government had taken in the matter, and the reasons which had induced them to take that course. As he had stated in reply to that Question, the Government, when they came into Office, found that the contracts were completed, as far as it was possible, by the action of a Government, to complete them. They had been agreed to by the Government and the contractors; they had been approved by the Treasury, and actually signed, and had it not been for that provision which had of late years been introduced into all contracts of the same nature, that they should be laid for a period of one month on the table of the House, and not be binding if before the expiration of that time they had been disapproved by the House, it would have been impossible for the present Government to put an end to the contracts without a direct breach of faith with the contracting parties. The Government were perfectly aware that many Gentlemen on their own side of the House—many Members too, he believed, of the present Administration—were altogether opposed on principle to the granting of subsidies for the performance of postal service. They had, therefore, to consider whether they would make use of that power which the proviso in the contract placed in their hands, and take upon themselves the responsibility of recommending the House to withhold its sanction from contracts which had been entered into by their predecessors. They thought that, wholly irrespective of the policy of those contracts, it would have been very unwise and inexpedient that they should upset the action of their predecessors. They arrived at that conclusion on general grounds altogether apart from considerations of the policy of the arrangement. They were of opinion that the Government in future negotiations with commercial companies would be placed in a very disadvantageous position if such an element of uncertainty were to be introduced into their dealings as that, on account of a change of Government, engagements entered into on perfect good faith by both parties should be liable to be set aside. Besides he very much doubted, on looking at the Report of the Committee, on whose recommendation the proviso to which he had referred had been introduced into the contract, whether they ever intended it should be used for such a purpose. The Committee had pointed out that, under the system which then prevailed, the Department responsible for confirming the contract had very imperfect means of obtaining all the information which was necessary. They were also of opinion that the control which the House of Commons possessed over that branch of the public expenditure was very imperfect. With that view they introduced the proviso; but he did not find from the Report of the Committee that it had ever entered into the intention of any of its Members that the proviso should be used as a means of enabling any Government to upset the engagements of another. Under those circumstances the Government declined to take upon themselves the responsibility of recommending the House not to sanction the contracts. But they, at the same time, desired that if possible the House should have an opportunity, at an earlier date than that contemplated in the contract, of re-considering the whole arrangement. They had, therefore, entered into negotiations with the Cunard and Inman Companies with a view if possible to induce them to assent to a shortening of the term of the contract which was made by the late Government for seven years with one year's notice, or practically for eight years. They tried to get the Companies to agree to a curtailment of two years. On consideration the Companies refused to agree to any shortening of the term, but in the course of the negotiations Mr. Inman consented to alter the day of sailing fixed by the original contract from Thursday to Friday, which would be a considerable improvement on the whole arrangement. The Government certainly did not deem it to be their duty, because they did not approve of the whole arrangement, to act an over punctilious and somewhat pedantic part, and refuse to touch the contract even for the purpose of making in it what everybody must admit to be an improvement. He denied that there was any ground for saying that in the negotiations between the Government and the Companies there was anything which in the slightest degree diminished the freedom of action of the Government with regard to the contracts in Parliament. On the contrary, the action of the Companies in declining to agree to the shortening of the term which they proposed made it, to a certain extent, more difficult to defend in that House the contracts which had been entered into. He entirely repudiated the inference which he supposed was intended to be drawn by the Question which had been put to him by the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) that evening, that the Government in the negotiations had committed themselves to any greater extent than before. Having said thus much, he would very briefly state to the House what, in his opinion, were the advantages and the disadvantages of the arrangement, and why he thought the subject was one which might very well be inquired into by a Committee. It seemed to him that by means of the arrangement we should secure the continuance of that which we had enjoyed for a great number of years—that was to say, a very satisfactory and well-performed service between this country and America. Whatever might be the objections to the system, no one would, he thought, deny that the Cunard Company had conducted the service in a manner which, on the score of speed, regularity, safety, and general convenience, left nothing to be desired. The hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely) had made some observations about the boats which that Company now proposed to make use of, but so far as he was aware they had performed the service in the most admirable manner. The Company besides, he believed, pledged themselves—and he saw no reason to doubt the pledge—to perform those contracts in the same satisfactory manner. So that we should not only secure the advantage which we had hitherto enjoyed in that respect, but escape those disadvantages to which we should be subjected if the alternative course had been adopted. If the Government had refused to accept the offer which had been made to them by the Cunard and Inman Companies, there must for a time, at any rate, have been considerable inconvenience to be incurred. For a time we should not have the advantage of the ships of these Companies, and we should have to depend on the longer voyage which was performed by the German Company between Southampton and New York; while the mails would have to be despatched on a more inconvenient day for the commercial community, and we should have the further inconvenience of having our mails—he did not know whether the House would attach much importance to that point—conveyed not by a British, but by a foreign, company. There were, however, on the other hand, no doubt, disadvantages in the arrangement. It was much more costly than the alternative one at present, and would, he believed, very probably be more costly in future. But the great objection to which, in his mind, it was open was that it bound us for a long term of years to one particular arrangement. As the hon. Member for Lincoln had said, there was a very great desire—and he believed a growing desire—to reduce very considerably the rate of postage between England and America. It was quite possible that that desire might become so strong that this country would consent to give up something of the rapidity and the punctuality of the mail service in consideration of obtaining a very great reduction in the cost. Even should that not be so, it was possible that, by adopting some such system as had been adopted by the American Government, we might get the service performed at a greatly reduced cost, and with equal efficiency. But under the present arrangement our hands would be tied for nearly eight years, and it would become a matter of very considerable expense to the revenue to effect any material reduction in the rate of postage between the two countries. There were, no doubt, other considerations to be taken into account, but those appeared to him to be the chief advantages and disadvantages of the arrangement, and they were matters which, in his opinion, might very properly form the subject of discussion before a Committee of that House. He was also of opinion that the Committee might very well get through the inquiry and report to the House within the time which had yet to elapse before the contract became binding, and that the House would have an opportunity of coming to a decision on that Report. The Government were further of opinion that the subject was not one on which it was their duty to recommend any definite course of action to the House. The Government as a Government had done nothing to put an end to the arrangement which had been entered into by their predecessors, nor to induce the House to assent to that arrangement. The contractors, they thought, must have been perfectly aware that the decision of the question would rest ultimately with that House, and there was nothing which could render it necessary for the Government either to be the defenders of their predecessors in the matter, to dictate any particular course of conduct to the House, or to prevent a full and impartial inquiry into the whole case, which would enable hon. Members to form their own opinions on the whole case. For these reasons the Government assented to the appointment of the Committee, and if the inquiry were conducted in the spirit which he had suggested, it might, he believed, be terminated within the prescribed time.

The Marquess of Hartington

MR. GRAVES said, as it would probably become his duty to divide the House upon this Motion, he regretted that so important a subject should be brought forward at so late an hour—half-past twelve. It was not, apparently, a mere question of these particular contracts, but the whole principle of subsidies had been raised. The noble Marquess who preceded him had told them how tenacious a Government should be before upsetting the acts of a preceding Government; but what must have been the impression produced by the speech of the noble Marquess upon every candid and impartial mind? Upon his mind the impression certainly was that, though outwardly the noble Marquess desired to preserve neutrality, inwardly he desired that the acts of his predecessors should be upset. As to the hon. Member (Mr. Seely), his quotations about subsidies and his general objections respecting them would have been much more in place if made last year, but since March 20 of last year this House had confirmed and ratified a most important contract with the West India Royal Mail Company, extending that contract on terms infinitely more advantageous to the Company than those proposed in the present case. By preserving silence at that time the hon. Member was a consenting party to those contracts, and to the principle of subsidies. As to the statement that no time was guaranteed in the performance of this contract, the answer was that Messrs. Cunard had never guaranteed their time; but did experience of the way in which the service was performed show that there was any need for such a guarantee? Their own reputation was a far better guarantee than any condition as to the number of days and hours could be. Again, comparison was made with foreign companies, and one might really fancy that one was not in a British, but in a foreign House of Parliament, to see the evident sympathy that existed for foreign competitors, and the hostility shown to English companies. These foreign vessels were not built under such a survey as was imposed by our Government; they did not even come under a passenger survey; and he believed that there were 200 tons less weight of material in their construction than English vessels had to carry. That would account for speed in the foreign vessels, but he maintained that the Cunard and most of the Inman boats delivered their letters in New York sooner than the boats of any of the foreign companies. Some allusion had been made to the fact that Messrs. Cunard were building no vessels, but this House was to blame for that fact. It was the temporizing policy of Parliament and the uncertainty of the continuance of the contracts which had prevented Messrs. Cunard from building; but as soon as these contracts were ratified they were prepared to go on building the class of ships that were suited for the conveyance of the mails. A remark had been made by the hon. Member (Mr. Seely) which he hoped was unintentional—namely, that the owners of these boats should be compelled to carry the mails at 1*d.* a letter. On reflection, the hon. Member would hardly adhere to this remark, for it could not be the wish of Englishmen so to deal with those who maintained the maritime supremacy of this country; and it never was contemplated that the obligation placed on ships to carry letter-bags should embrace the regular mails of the country, for those, if forced on a ship-owner, could be frustrated by delay in delivery. Then as to the threat which, it was alleged, had been used to this House, the contracting parties had a perfect right, in case the House would not ratify the agreement, to act as self-interest dictated. It was true that when they first saw the Motion placed on the Paper, the effect of which would have been to annul the contract, they wrote to the Post Office to say that they felt themselves released from further obligations, and would not allow their ships to call at Queenstown. As soon, however, as they saw that the hon. Gentleman had amended the terms of his Motion—merely asking for a Committee—they wrote to state that it would not be necessary for them to act upon the previous letter. No such threat, therefore, was in existence. He presumed that what were required as essential conditions of any contract for conveying the mails between this country and America were rapidity, regularity, and safety. Cost was, no doubt, a consideration, but it was of secondary importance when compared with the other conditions, and the country would condemn any saving which was effected at their expense. Now, what were the facts of the case? In 1866 the Government of Lord Russell believed it was possible to carry on a proper service based upon a system of ocean postage and not of subsidies. They advertised for tenders, and some four were received; but the Post Office Report was that the public would practically only have two mails a week, leaving Southampton on Tuesdays and Fridays, and no foreign company volunteered to call at Queenstown. Messrs. Cunard declined to tender on the prescribed conditions, but sent in a specific proposal to convey the mails for a specific sum. That sum was considered too high, and ultimately an arrangement of a temporary nature was come to for the conveyance of the mails, at £80,000 for the year. Last year the attempt was renewed, and tenders were invited. Messrs. Cunard and Inman refused to tender, and the only parties who responded to the invitation were the North German Lloyd's, going once a week. Messrs. Cunard and Inman, however, sent in proposals of their own to carry the mails for ten years; the former for £100,000 and the latter for £50,000. The Government did not agree to this, but made a counter proposal to pay Messrs. Cunard £70,000 and Messrs. Inman £35,000 for seven years, and these terms were accepted. The gross postage received was £112,000, but the North German Lloyd's received £10,000 out of this sum, thus virtually leaving £100,000 to meet £105,000, the amount of the proposed guarantee. He did not wonder that the Treasury desired that the arrangement with the North German Lloyd's should be cancelled, seeing that their boat sailed on the same day, Tuesday, and was frequently outstripped by the Queenstown route. Contrasting this contract with two other contracts based upon subsidies, which had been virtually adopted by the House within the last two years, he did not hesitate to say that, taking efficiency and speed into consideration, there would be something inconsistent in adopting the Motion before the House. If any company deserved confidence it was the Cunard Company, which for thirty years had carried the mails, and had never failed to keep their appointed day, unless detained by the orders of the Government, and had never lost a letter or a life. When that Company commenced their career the carrying trade on the Atlantic was in the hands of the Americans, but now it was in the hands of Englishmen, and the Company, had, without recompense, adopted Queenstown as their port of arrival and departure, at a cost to themselves of £10,000. They had also, at a critical time, shown the value to the country of their magnificent service. He did not mention these facts to influence the opinion of the House, but to claim fair consideration for old servants. Neither was the Inman Company less entitled to consideration. For nearly twenty years they had fought their way on the Atlantic, and their vessels were as creditable to England as the Cunard's vessels. Allusion had been made by the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bazley) to a penny ocean postage, as if these contracts would interfere with the accomplishment of that idea. All he could say was that, seeing that a letter to Paris now cost 8d. postage for the same weight, the adoption of a penny postage to America must lead to an entire revision of the whole postage system. If a letter could be carried to New York for 1d., people would begin to ask how it was that a letter sent merely from one part of London to another cost just as much for postage. At all events these great experiments should not be tried at the contractors' expense, but at that of the country. Whatever might be the amount of postage, these contracts would not stand in the way of arrangement on that point. With respect to subsidies, there was no doubt that the tendency of opinion in late years had been in favour of doing away with them, and he had been inclined to adopt that opinion. But new circumstances had arisen which that House must not lose sight of. France and other nations had entered on a career of competition with this country in respect to carrying letters. France was subsidizing fast lines of steamers with heavy bounties to New York, to the Antilles, and to Mexico; and what did they get?—£350,000 a year, besides a loan of 10,000,000 francs for twenty years without interest. The French nation paid 16s. a mile for their subsidies; while under this contract England would pay 2s. 6d. Was that fair competition? There was an English company with which he was connected which ran vessels monthly between Valparaiso and

Panama. The French thought that their flag should appear in the Pacific, and a proposal was made to subsidize a company. The English company to avoid competition, offered to take the French mails for nothing. But the French Government, anxious that their flag should fly in the Pacific, paid to the Trans-Atlantique Company 8s. a mile for the carrying of the mails. Unless the House was prepared to deal liberally with the English companies, it could not be expected that they would maintain the steam lines. The establishments of the English companies had greatly added to the strength and power of this country, and had formed a great nursery of seamen for times of emergency. The enlightened Ruler of France desired to possess the same advantages, and this country, therefore, must not stand idly by, and treat a fair offer to carry the English mails in the way in which it was now proposed to treat it. He objected to the Committee which had been moved for, because the object was not to inquire into the terms of the contracts, but to upset the contracts after they had been ratified by the previous Government, and after the faith of the present Government had to a certain extent been pledged to it. He looked upon the Motion for a Committee as a systematic and organized attempt to get rid of the contracts. If the question was sent up to a Committee, they would have only twenty days to consider the matter, and ten of those days would be holidays. It would not, therefore, in his opinion, be possible to obtain a Report before the contracts would by time be ratified. He thought the House was the most competent tribunal to consider the question, and as a question of principle was involved in the matter he would take the sense of the House on it, though he was willing to have the debate adjourned. He had fair grounds for so acting, because the contracts, regarded in all points of view, were such as ought to be sustained. For £105,000—the whole of which sum except about £3,000, would be covered by the postage—there would be three services a week, all starting from Queenstown, and looking to the regularity, punctuality, and speed of the service, he believed that a more fair or moderate arrangement could not be made. The country would not be satisfied with so great and serious an alteration as was proposed, and on these grounds he asked the House to hesitate before they refused to ratify a fair, and equitable arrangement.

SIR FRANCIS CROSSLEY said, that as one who had a large connection with America, he was of opinion that we should be better served by free competition than by subsidies and engagements for eight years to come, especially as regarded the communication with a country our relations with which were increasing week by week, so that eight years hence we did not know how many steamers might be running, and how much better terms we might be able to make. He had no objection at all to a little foreign competition; on the contrary, when he found that anything was manufactured abroad better than it was in this country, he bought samples in order to display them here. He had no objection to the Cunard Company having a portion of our traffic, or the whole of it if they could work it as well or better than others; but do not let us give them a monopoly for eight years. The hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) had endeavoured to make it appear that this was a question of faith as between one Government and another; it was no such thing. The House was quite competent to deal with it, and, indeed, why should there have been an alteration of the law, giving the House a month to consider contracts, if they were to have no control over them?

MR. EUSTACE SMITH said, the contract with the Cunard Company did not come before the House now for the first time. Some years ago it had the exclusive conveyance of the mails of the English Government, and the subsidy was justified upon the ground that no other company could be found to perform the service with such speed and punctuality. Experience had shown that a company without a subsidy—namely, the Inman Company—had attained such a position that the Cunard Company had been obliged to treat it as a partner. If we were free and offered no subsidy at all, the result would probably be that in a few years we should have a daily line of steamers to America, equal either to the Cunard or to the Inman line. In no way could this House be accused of a breach of faith, either positively or constructively, if it refused to ratify a provisional contract; because any man who entered into a provisional contract with the Government for the conveyance of mails did so with the knowledge that it was within the province of the House to treat the contract as the contract with Mr. Churchward was treated.

MR. HUNT said, they were discussing the question under considerable disadvantages. There were upon the table of the House the contracts in question, and a Treasury Minute would throw no light upon them; but there were other Papers of the greatest importance without which the House could not come to a fair conclusion on the subject. Why were these Papers not produced? These contracts were concluded by the late Government some time before they went out of Office; there had been abundant time for the Papers to be printed, and if the usual practice had been followed they would have been placed in the hands of Members at the same time as the contracts themselves. The non-production of them was, no doubt, an oversight; possibly it was due to the confusion that might have arisen from the new distribution of business at the Treasury. It used to be the business of the Financial Secretary to the Treasury to lay these Papers on the Table; it was possible the Financial Secretary might have thought it was now the business of the Third Lord; and the Third Lord might have thought it was the duty of the Financial Secretary. At any rate, it was the duty of the Government to have produced them, and they had not done so; and he said it was the duty of the Government because the time allowed to the House to consider the contracts was so short. If the House was to pass contracts in review, a month was the shortest time that could be allowed, because there were often voluminous documents, and other business of great importance must have its place. In a Session like this, when men's minds were occupied with one great question, the time seemed particularly short. We had arrived at the 13th of the month; and the contracts having been placed on the table on the second of the month, more than half the time given for their consideration had passed before the necessary information was communicated. The Mover of the Amendment had had access to Papers at the Post Office, which, by the courtesy of the Postmaster General, he had also seen; but even if he had not seen them he should have had an advantage over other hon. Members, because his recollection would serve him as to what occurred when he was in Office. But this was not a position a Member of the House ought to be in ; he ought not to stand in a position of exceptional advantage. He much preferred that the House should be in possession of all information, and then he thought hon. Members would conclude that the course which was taken by the late Government was one which ought to be endorsed by the acceptance of the contracts. The Mover of the Motion appeared to know more about the contracts made for the last year than about those for the next eight years ; he dwelt largely upon the false estimate made by himself (Mr. Hunt) with regard to the postal service of 1868, and very little upon the estimate on which the Government undertook to enter into these contracts. The estimate he gave when Secretary of the Treasury of the amount that would be lost by the exceptional contract with the Cunard Company for one year was varied considerably by the non-realization of expectations as to the amount of postage from America, a large part of which the American Government preferred to send another way. Again, after the arrangements were made, they were discussed in the House, and, on the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman now the President of the Poor Law Board, a contract was made with the Hamburg Company, whose earnings were deducted from the amount which otherwise would have been earned by the Cunard Company. To that extent the estimate of what we should lose by the Cunard Company was considerably enhanced. The contract was discussed fully at the time ; and he stated that the Government did not consider the arrangement a good one, but it was made under difficult circumstances, and only for a year. It had been attempted to be shown, and had been insinuated by a question put upon the Paper, that there had been a breach of an implied promise on the part of the late Government ; but there had been no breach of a promise at all, express or implied. On that occasion he expressed the opinion that the American service should be a self-supporting one ; and he said now it was. He stated that he did not believe we could expect the service to be performed properly, except an arrangement were made for a term of years ; and, he also stated that he thought it was wrong there should be different arrangements with different companies. A question had been raised as to the inequality of terms between the Inman and Cunard Companies ; but in the present contract the terms given to both were precisely identical. In all particulars the arrangements which were made by the late Government had been fulfilled to the letter. What he laid down was the principle on which they ought to proceed. He objected to being tied down by a Resolution not to give a subsidy by a fixed payment, and he referred to the Report of the Committee on the subject which resolved that it was inexpedient to lay down precise rules. He said it would be utterly impossible for the Government to do its best for the country if it were bound hand and foot ; and the Motion asking the House to bind the Government was withdrawn. It had been said that there should not be any fixed term of years appointed, but that the service should be open to any person or any company who would undertake it for the sea postage. But the Government offered to receive tenders exactly in those terms, and what was the result ? They asked for tenders to start from Queenstown. In 1868, which they might regard as a trial year, they had had two services weekly from Queenstown and two from Southampton, and the proportion carried from Queenstown was 75 per cent and from Southampton only 25 per cent. The advantage in point of time by the adoption of Queenstown as the port of departure might be set down as forty-eight hours in the case of Ireland, thirty-six hours in the case of Scotland, and eighteen to twenty-four hours in the case of the English manufacturing districts ; while the adoption of Southampton, even in the case of London, presented no advantage. The Government therefore advertised for open service from Queenstown, on terms of sea postage, terminable at six months' notice. It was an old proverb that you might take a horse to the water but could not make him drink, and the House might be surprised to learn that their invitation for this particular form of tender did not meet with a single response. One tender was received from the National Steamship Company. They, however, require us to make a stipulation in regard to half-ounce letters which it was impossible for us to comply with in consequence of our arrangements with the United States. The North German Lloyd proposed to take letters at 1*d.* per ounce, but also proposed that Southampton should be substituted for Queenstown, thus losing all the advantages in point of time which were to be gained by the adoption of the latter port. The Hamburg Steampacket Company also tendered, but required 288 days to perform the voyage during the summer months, instead of 264, and 312 during the winter months, instead of 288, and to start from Southampton instead of Queenstown. There were also two other tenders, one from Messrs. Cunard for £100,000 a year for two services, and one from Mr. Inman for one service for £50,000. The average length of the voyages of the respective lines for the first three months of the year was as follows:—Cunard, 11 days 8 hours; Inman, 11 days 22 hours; North German Lloyd, 11 days 12 hours; Hamburg - American line, 12 days 2 hours. In the months of April, May, and June the average length of the voyage was as follows:—Cunard, 9 days 20 hours; Inman, 10 days 13 hours; North German Lloyd, 11 days 10 hours; Hamburg-American, 11 days 23 hours. Now, it had been objected against the Cunard line that the contractors got as much out of the contract as they possibly could, and in return laid themselves under no obligations, inasmuch as they did not in any way tie themselves down as to time. But the answer that the contractors made was a very reasonable one. They said they were unwilling to hold out any inducement to the captains of their vessels to risk the lives of the passengers and crew and the safety of the vessels by endeavouring at all hazards and in all weathers to avoid the infliction of penalties. They reasonably enough pointed to what they had done in the past and, taking that as their guide, he thought they might trust them in the future, especially when they remembered that without penalties their vessels had kept better time than the vessels of others who were liable to penalties in case of their being overdue. The late Government had honestly and loyally tried the experiment which the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) had said they ought to have tried. For the decisions then made he himself was chiefly responsible, and that responsibility he was perfectly willing to bear. What were the Government to do? Those two Companies offered to conduct the service from Queenstown for a subsidy of £150,000, and for a term of ten years. He was satisfied that it was but reasonable to stipulate that the contract should be continued for a term of years, because it was evident that it would be impossible for persons to build suitable ships and conduct such a service unless such a condition were agreed to. They had in contemplation the reduction of the postage as soon as they could, and they believed that it might be possible to make that reduction at an earlier period. They were, therefore, unwilling to agree to the adoption of so long a term as ten years. They, therefore, insisted upon the term being reduced to seven years. The sea postage of the outward mails of the last year carried amounted to £101,700. According to calculation and according to the increase which had been going on of late years, the Department estimated that £111,870 would be the sea postage to be earned. They decided that the principle upon which they would act should be that the service should be self-supporting. Allowing a certain margin, they fixed the amount to be earned at £105,000, and allotted the dividend to each service to be performed—that was to say, £70,000 to Messrs. Cunard for the two services, and £35,000 to Mr. Inman for one. The Post Office authorities regarded the terms as preposterous, but the Government were firm, and the result was that, though with great difficulty, those terms were obtained. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely), said that there ought to be no subsidy, but that the line should be self-supporting. But the hon. Gentleman should remember that, even if the money was given in the form of sea-postage, it was still a subsidy and nothing else. He claimed also for their proposal the merit of being self-supporting. In answer to a memorial signed by some very influential gentlemen in the City, although the Government did not concur in the views of the memorialists, who thought that a gain in time and convenience would result from the arrangement they proposed, they assented to try the other services as a temporary matter. Now, if the contract held good, what would be their position in a few years? In 1871 the excess, as estimated, would amount to over £30,000, which would allow the postage to be reduced by 1*d.* By 1873 the excess on the postage to be earned—supposing the letters to go on increasing as they hitherto had done—would amount to £58,000 and would enable them to take off a second 1*d.*, and by the year 1876 the postage would amount to £218,000, and permit of their reducing it to 3*d.* Therefore the object the hon. Gentleman so much desired would be arrived at under the very arrangement which the Government had made. He had not the smallest objection to all these matters being referred to a Select Committee. Indeed, if he were to select one act of his official conduct which he would like more than another to be thoroughly inquired into, it was this one, because he believed it had been the means of giving the public the maximum advantage at the most economical price possible. What the people would be inclined most strongly to insist upon was efficiency and regularity, and they must remember that they could not get all the advantages of cheapness without losing some of the advantages of regularity. He wanted to know, if these contracts were not to be carried out, why the Inman Company were to be asked to change their days for sailing? But since the Inman Company had been led to believe that the contracts were to be carried out, the hon. Member for Lincoln had put his Motion upon the Paper. And what was that Motion intended to effect? He had heard of the evils of a weak Government—and unfortunately for himself he had been a Member of a weak Government—[Laughter]*—*that was to say, a Government which was not supported by a Parliamentary majority, and he had experienced much humiliation in consequence. But they were told that they had now a strong Government—a Government that could command a majority of upwards of 100; and what was the conduct of that strong Government? It came down to that House and said, “We wish to abdicate our functions in this matter—here are the contracts made by our predecessors—deal with them as you will, we decline to say whether they are good or bad, or to express any opinion whatever concerning them.” Was that the part that a

Government should take? He called it a poor, mean course for them to adopt. What would have been said had the late Government adopted such a course? But he denied that the late Government would have adopted such a course—they would have, at all events, avowed their opinions upon the subject. They might not always have been sufficiently strong to carry their opinions out, but they would, at all events, have avowed them, and would not have asked for a Committee in order to shelter themselves from the responsibility which justly attached to them. The Government had declared that they were neutral in the matter, but he wished to know whether the Government really were neutral respecting it? The hon. Member for Lincoln said he wished to refer the contract to a Committee; but what did he wish the Committee to do? The noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) had stated that, although it was not the view of the contractors, it was the view of the legal authorities that if the Motion of the hon. Member was carried as it originally stood, ipso facto, the contracts would be cancelled. He was, therefore, not surprised that the Government should have thought the original Motion of the hon. Member rather awkward, because in that case the public might have complained with just cause that at a few hours' notice the whole of the Atlantic postal system was put an end to. Under these circumstances, the Government had found it convenient that the latter portion of the hon. Gentleman's original Motion should be struck out; but although the terms of the Motion were altered, the original intention of its Mover to cancel the contract remained unaltered, and yet the Government, while professing complete neutrality upon the subject, supported the Motion. If there was to be a division upon this Motion he should not divide with the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) because he did not wish it to be supposed that he shunned investigation into the matter. Had he the wish to afford a complete triumph to the late Government, he should be perfectly willing that the contracts should be rescinded, because the state of things that would result to the public from the postal arrangements being suddenly upset would be intolerable, the present Government would be turned out, and a clamour raised for the return of the late Government to Office. He should, however, be sorry to secure any advantage to himself or to his party at the expense and inconvenience of the country; but what he wished to say was Do not let it be supposed that the Government was neutral in this matter. If they were indeed neutral and there was to be a division, let the Government walk out of the House, as he intended to do himself. He was not going to oppose the appointment of the Committee, because, for his own part, he should be glad to let it be seen that the statements he had made were correct. The late Government had acted with the best of motives, and with an anxious desire for the public service; and the appointment of a Committee would make that fully apparent to the public.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not exactly understand the position taken by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hunt), who said that those who supported this Committee were in favour of abrogating the contracts altogether, while at the same time he declared that he himself was also in favour of the appointment of the Committee. [Mr. HUNT: No.] At all events the right hon. Gentleman said he wished and desired that the Committee should be appointed, while at the same time he attacked the motives of those who supported the Motion. It was very easy to explain that which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think so difficult—namely, the conduct of the present Government in this matter. Had the right hon. Gentleman thought fit he might easily have thrown the whole responsibility on the present Government by abstaining from executing the contract at the time when the late Government had made up their minds to quit Office. These contracts were not executed until after the present Government had formally accepted the Seals of Office from Her Majesty. He did not attribute blame to anyone; but the late Government chose to take upon themselves the responsibility of making the arrangement—as they were legally entitled to do—being still the Board of the Treasury till their successors received the Seals of Office. They exercised the power which was in their hands of binding the country to this most important engagement, and their successors had then to consider what they would do under the circumstances.

MR. HUNT said, he must ask leave to correct the right hon. Gentleman. It was either in September or October that the engagement was actually entered into. He could not give the date upon which the contract was finally signed, but he knew that everything had been settled by the Treasury long before there was any thought of resigning.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Treasury Minute authorizing this contract was signed on the 9th of December; the present Government accepted Office and went to Windsor on the 10th; and on the 11th the contract itself was signed. The late Government had done what they were legally entitled to do, and, having acted upon their responsibility, the present Government considered themselves bound by the acts of their predecessors in Office. They considered themselves bound by a sort of official etiquette and necessity to carry out the acts of the late Government, and they accordingly felt themselves precluded from taking any part for or against these measures, and had not made any appeal to the House. As far as any statements of their own were concerned, they had observed a strictly neutral position, for they did not think it consistent with the dignity of a Government to be at the same moment carrying out an engagement entered into by others and taking part in the overthrow of that very engagement. That, no doubt, seemed very incomprehensible to the right hon. Gentleman. But he repeated and maintained that it would present a very regrettable, and even contemptible, appearance in the eyes of foreign countries if—having adopted the measures of the previous Government in good faith and honour—the present Government were to take part in getting rid of those very measures. That was the explanation of the conduct of the Government, and he hoped it was satisfactory to the House. He was very sorry that there had been any slowness in producing the Papers; they were in the printer's hands, and he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that they were not withheld with a view to prejudice his case. And he was glad to perceive that the right hon. Gentleman had been able to provide himself with such documents as were necessary. He had adopted the policy of the right hon. Gentleman and endeavoured to carry it out. But an hon. Gentleman (Mr. Seely) having—without any prompting from him or his Department or from the Government as a whole—moved that the subject be referred to a Select Committee, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite having acquiesced in that proposal, he should not be prevented by any taunts which might be thrown out from taking the course which he considered best under the circumstances. Investigation was challenged, and he thought it ought to be made. He offered no personal opinion upon the measure itself—that they had inherited from their predecessors; he was quite ready to go into Committee upon it; he had no wish to hide anything, and he was prepared to abide by whatever the wisdom of the House might decide.

MR. HUNT said, the right hon. Gentleman opposite seemed to think that he had mentioned the dates inaccurately. He was now in a position to quote them from official documents. The offer was made by the Secretary to the Post Office to Messrs. Burns, M'Ivor & Co.—on the 1st of October; to Mr. Ingram on the 2nd of October; and accepted on the part of both those firms on the 7th of October.

MR. PIM thought the Committee should be appointed or the debate adjourned for the production of Papers.

MR. CROSS moved that the debate be adjourned.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he hoped the hon. Member would not persevere in the Motion for adjournment which would cause the evasion of the inquiry. The case for the Committee was very strong, and the House could not otherwise perform an important duty which it had reserved for itself. The Committee would be appointed with no foregone conclusion. The sense in which it would be appointed would be to afford free scope for the exercise of a jurisdiction which in this particular case it had specially reserved for itself.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he could not see how it was possible that an impartial Committee could be constituted in this case. It was quite clear the Mover could not be a Member of it, and his right hon. Friend (Mr. Hunt) had no intention of taking any part in it.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. GRAHAM said, as the representative of a great mercantile community, he would support the Motion of the hon. Member for Liverpool. The Committee was only a means in order to get rid of the contract.

MR. MACFIE declared he must do the same, unless he got a satisfactory explanation.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Cross,)—put, and negatived.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

APPOINTMENT OF A SELECT COMMITTEE.

EARL GRANVILLE moved that a Select Committee be appointed—

To consider whether any facilities can be given for the despatch of business in Parliament, especially in regard to the relations of the two Houses.

THE EARL OF DERBY thought it comparatively immaterial whether the object in view was effected by means of a Bill or by a Joint Committee of the two Houses; but, as much must depend on the view taken by the Government, he wished to know whether they agreed in the desirability of remedying the evil complained of—namely, the paucity of Business before their Lordships at the commencement of a Session, and the undue pressure of Business at the close?

EARL GRANVILLE said, he thought it best not to enter into the subject prior to its consideration by the Committee; but he could assure the noble Earl that the Government were anxious to discover, through the medium of the Committee, some mode of remedying the evils complained of.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, such Committee to consist of six Lords, three to be a quorum, "To consider whether any facilities can be given for the despatch of business in Parliament, especially in regard to the relations of the two Houses."—(The Earl Granville.)

The following Lords named members of the Committee:

M. Salisbury	V. Eversley
E. Derby	V. Halifax
E. Granville	L. Redesdale

And a message sent to the Commons to acquaint them that this House has appointed a committee of six Lords to join with a committee of the Commons "To consider whether any facilities can be given for the despatch of business in Parliament, especially in regard to the relations of the two Houses;" and to request that the Commons will be pleased to appoint an equal number of members to be joined with the members of this House.

HABITUAL CRIMINALS BILL.

(The Lord Privy Seal.)

(NO. 18.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Preliminary.

Clause 3 (Definition of "Court").

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY moved to add at end of Clause—

" 'Chief Officer of Police' shall mean within the district of the metropolitan police force the commissioner of police, or an assistant commissioner, or a district superintendent; in the city of London, the commissioner of police; and elsewhere shall include any of the following persons—chief constable, head constable, or other chief officer of police or of a division of police, by whatever name such chief officer may be called."

The intention of this, in conjunction with Clause 4, was to require the written authority of the chief officer for the arrest by any constable of a person suspected of dishonest practices. This had been done hitherto, as shown by the memorandum of the Chief Commissioner in the metropolis which had lately been presented, but the object was to convert the custom into a statutory provision.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Part I. Criminals at large on Licence.

Clause 4 (Power to apprehend holders of licence on suspicion).

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY moved to insert in line 17 after ("may") the words "if authorized so to do in writing by a chief officer of police."

Amendment agreed to.

EARL GREY moved an Amendment; for the first paragraph of the clause as it stands in the Bill substitute the following:—

"Any convict who is the holder of a licence granted under Penal Servitude Acts, 1853, 1857, and 1864, may be required by a written order, signed by a commissioner or inspector or chief constable of police, to appear before a justice of the peace or other competent magistrate, at a time and place to be named in such order, for the purpose of showing that he is not getting his livelihood by dishonest means. Such order may be served on the convict to whom it is addressed by any constable or police officer, who may without warrant take into custody and bring before a justice of the peace or other competent magistrate any convict who shall have failed to obey such order so served upon him."

He said, that under any arrangement the power of the police would be excessive; but at all events he did not think the ticket-holder should be arrested without notice. It might indeed be urged that if served with a notice he would immediately abscond; but the Bill, it was claimed, would insure an effective supervision over these men in all parts of the kingdom—and indeed the whole system of licensing was absurd, unless the arrangements for supervision were such that sooner or later a man who ran away could be traced and visited with increased punishment. It would be very hard to the licensee to arrest him without notice, perhaps in the presence of his fellow-workmen, and under particularly painful circumstances, and it would be quite sufficient in the first instance to serve an order upon him to attend before a magistrate and give an account of himself. If he did not do so he could then be arrested in default.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he hoped the Committee would not agree to the Amendment. It was obvious that if they gave any such notice to any suspected license-holder, he would take advantage of it to abscond, and thus the whole object of the measure would be defeated. It should be recollected that the men to whom this clause applied had been guilty of serious offences. He believed that the supervision of criminals by the police would be materially improved by the Bill, but it was idle to expect that it could be made so perfect that the police could at any moment lay their hands on a suspected character to whatever portion of the country he might remove. The Government were not desirous of making the law unduly severe, but he did not know why men who had been convicted of serious crimes should be dealt with with extreme tenderness. While permitting men, instead of passing the whole period of their sentence in a convict prison or at public works, to go out and earn an honest living, care must be taken that society was not injured by their release, and a vigilant watch must be kept over them. The Bill would permit the Secretary of State to dispense with the obligation of reporting themselves every month to the police, and they would not be arrested without the authority of a chief officer, who, from the responsibility of his position and his liability to public censure, if he gave such authority on insufficient grounds, would not be likely to interfere with any license-holder who was conducting himself properly.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, their object should be to avoid giving publicity to a man's antecedents if he was earning an honest livelihood. The Amendment of the noble Earl would entirely defeat that object; and he feared that even the clause as it now stood would be too apt to produce the same effect. A person served with a notice in the presence of his fellow-workmen or arrested on suspicion would infallibly be dismissed.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON objected to the Amendment as one which, by giving the opportunity of escape, would nullify the operation of the Bill. There might be a hardship, as urged by the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), in serving a notice on a man perhaps in the presence of his fellow workmen; but it should be remembered that they had a duty to perform towards the employer as well as to the man he employed. It would be very unjust to the employer to conceal from him the fact that he was trusting a man who had already been convicted on a criminal charge; and he believed that whenever that concealment had been practised it had been found to operate disadvantageously for all the parties interested. The great majority of employers were willing to give a fair consideration to the case of a criminal with whose previous history they had been made acquainted, and were disposed, on the other hand, to resent any attempt to keep them in a state of ignorance upon the subject.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY wished to know the exact position in which the police were to stand with regard to employers. If a policeman thought it his duty to inform an employer that he had a ticket-holder in his service, the usual result would be the man's dismissal; and he had known several instances of the kind. A policeman, on the other hand, knowing that a man who was one of the greatest vagabonds was employed in a confidential situation in a large workshop, might not think it his duty to tell the employer the man's character. Some line ought to be marked out for the police to act on.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, it would be seen from the memorandum to which he had already referred that it was not the custom of the police to give notice to employers of the antecedents of licensees in their employ.

LORD HYLTON said, that if it was made difficult for these men to obtain employment through the publicity given to their previous character, and through the constant supervision of the police, the entire object of tickets-of-leave—namely, their absorption into the ranks of the industrial classes—would be defeated. He thought the clause might be struck out as unnecessary, for there was power for punishing men severely if they relapsed into crime.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he had been rather alarmed at hearing from the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) that the police did not deem it their duty to inform employers of the true character of a man whom they might receive into their service. This might be merciful towards the ticket-of-leave man, but was it just towards his employer? The interests of the employer and those of the ticket-holder being in direct opposition, which of the two were the Government to consult? To allow the employer to suffer from the bad character of a licensee on the chance that the latter had reformed seemed to him a mistaken policy. The Government were every year secretly throwing on society a number of people who, from previous habits, were likely to plunder those under whom they served. The least therefore the Government could do to repair the injury to society was to insure that the police exercised that vigilant supervision which the employers, if properly warned, would exercise for themselves, and that at the first symptom of an inclination to resort to their old criminal habits, the employers should be saved from the danger to which the Government had exposed them. The tendency of the Amendment was one which had been too common of late years—namely, that when the interests of society and the interests of the criminals were in conflict it was the duty of the Government to care for the criminals more than for society. These men were making war upon society, and society ought surely to neglect no means of making war upon them.

LORD HOUGHTON said, he thought the noble Marquess entirely misapprehended the whole object of the ticket-of-leave system. The object of that system was to give a man a chance of returning to honest courses; but it was impossible that object could be obtained if publicity were given to the facts of his previous career. At Wakefield there was an organization by which every prisoner on his discharge, whether on a ticket-of-leave or otherwise, could find a home for six or twelve months until he could find employment for himself, or until an employer came to look for him. This had succeeded admirably, for 80 per cent of the persons who had been inmates of the institution had merged into the honest and industrious classes; and it would be well if such an institution were attached to every prison. To attempt to treat a man as a prisoner and yet as an honest member of society would never succeed; nor did he think we should try to introduce the status which unfortunately existed on so large a scale in some other countries, where men were walking about apparently free, and yet were really under the supervision of the law. He understood that a number of eminent Judges and magistrates were of opinion that the principle of this clause—the arrest of men on mere suspicion, without any corpus delicti—would be liable to great abuse and would never work satisfactorily. One difficulty would consist in determining what was an honest occupation. Were small retailers necessarily honest, or was the holding of shares in a limited liability company necessarily an honest occupation? The intention, of course, was that a man should have some means of living, so as not to be tempted by want to commit crime; but the inquiry and exposure now proposed would immediately deprive him of whatever honest occupation he might have.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY suggested that it would be more convenient that they should confine themselves to a consideration of the Amendment of his noble Friend, and that they should not enter into a general discussion of the clause.

LORD CAIRNS said, he preferred the proposal made by the Government to the Amendment of the noble Earl in this case. By the Government proposal the responsibility would be thrown upon the police of obtaining reasonable proof that the man was not making out a living by honest means, and so securing a reasonable certainty of the power not being improperly exercised; whereas the Amendment would enable the police to summon the man before a magistrate, and would impose upon him the task of showing that he was following some honest employment, and thus defeating the object in view—that men willing to be honest and industrious should not be disturbed without reasonable cause. If this provision were adopted, hundreds of ticket-of-leave men might be summoned before a magistrate on the mere responsibility of a constable.

EARL GREY explained that the Amendment, as well as the original clause, would require a constable to be satisfied that a man was living dishonestly before taking any action; the only difference between them being that under the former he would be served with a notice to appear, while under the latter he would be arrested at once. He did not desire, however, to press the proposal.

Amendment withdrawn.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON moved, in line 25, to leave out ("getting") and insert ("endeavouring to get").

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, while admitting the desirability of protecting licensees from unfair molestation, urged that a man, unless starving—in which case he would be sent to the workhouse—must be living either honestly or dishonestly. There was no intermediate stage, and he did not see how a magistrate could determine whether a man was "endeavouring to get" an honest livelihood.

LORD CAIRNS suggested that the object of the Amendment would be better attained by using, in the latter part of the clause, negative instead of affirmative words—namely, to alter the sentence from "If such holder of license shall fail to make it appear to the satisfaction of the justice or magistrate before whom he is brought that he is getting a livelihood by honest means," to "that he is not getting a livelihood by dishonest means."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he would accept this Amendment.

Clause amended accordingly.

On Question, "That the clause as amended stand part of the Bill,"

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY admitted that the alteration was an improvement; but he thought some notion ought to be given of what was meant by "dishonest means." They must not expect in the class with which they were dealing a very high class of morality. Many of those people might earn their livelihood by means that were not creditable, but which were not in a legal sense dishonest. Men, for instance, got a living by hawking small goods without a license, and many men, he was sorry to say, were supported entirely by women, and in these cases persons would be most unwilling to reveal how they gained a livelihood. He wished while this clause was being discussed to defend himself against the noble Marquess's charge of taking up the cause of the criminals against the interests of society.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he had made no such charge against the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he was happy to accept the noble Marquess's disclaimer, but wished nevertheless to explain the grounds on which he objected to this clause. He believed that in so objecting he was maintaining the interests of society. We were now beset by thousands and tens of thousands of a class of desperate characters who were preying upon society because at this moment they had no other means of living. Let there, then, be just so much control and supervision over them as should not shut them out altogether from any possibility of gaining an honest livelihood. He ventured to repeat what he had often stated before that, of these thousands who were annoying and injuring society in every possible way, fully two-thirds would, if they had the means, quit that career and enter on a career of honesty. That eminent officer, Colonel Henderson, and his able superintendents would confirm this assertion. The object, therefore, should be not to exonerate them from punishment or from due supervision, but to leave them just as much liberty as would enable them to return to honest courses. The ticket-of-leave men were not the most difficult class to deal with—the most difficult class consisted of those who were constantly being imprisoned on short sentences, and who were the most degraded and most wretched part of the criminal population. On leaving the prison they were turned out in the old and ragged clothes with which they entered; when they asked for work, they were told first to get themselves decently dressed; now if additional restrictions were imposed upon them how could they obtain situations? The large proportion of them would accept any system by which they might get honest employment; but they laboured under peculiar disadvantages. They were not skilled labourers — very few artizans being among them—but were mostly men who could only do inferior kinds of work. The lives they led, their alternations of revelry and starvation—sometimes when they had made a haul of £200 or £300 living in a state of magnificence, and two or three days afterwards being as wretched as ever—made their physical condition very low, and did not recommend them to the notice of those who required vigorous labour. Let there be such supervision as was absolutely necessary, but let it not go an inch beyond that, for the existing evil would thus be perpetuated; and to shut them out from the possibility of getting anything in an honest way would be to expose society to the daily and hourly ravages of men who, the more restrictions they were subjected to, would become the more desperate and the more likely to perpetrate serious crimes.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the argument the noble Earl had just addressed to the House, that the more these ruffians were restricted the more desperate they would become, was an argument against the whole system of licenses, for in that case they clearly ought not to be let loose on society under any circumstances. That system, however, had been deliberately adopted by the Legislature, and it was desirable that the House should understand how little alteration in it was proposed by this Bill. The existing conditions of licenses, as laid down by the Act of 1864, were very stringent, for they required every holder of a license to produce it when called upon to do so by a magistrate or a police officer; to abstain from any violation of the law; not to habitually associate with notoriously bad characters, such as reputed thieves and prostitutes; and not to lead an idle and dissolute life, without visible means of obtaining an honest livelihood. The number of convicts so released would now be largely augmented, owing to the entire cessation of transportation, and strict supervision was therefore all the more necessary. Parliament, in his opinion, acted wisely in adopting the present system, and he should be sorry to see it abandoned, for the consequence would be a recurrence of the panic which had been prevalent at the time the Act of 1864 was passed, and the re-action would be such that much more severe enactments than those now proposed would be adopted. The clause in its present shape would lessen in some respects the rigour of the existing law, for, taken in connection with a later clause, the obligation of licensees to report themselves monthly would be mitigated, and the written authority of the chief officer for any arrest, which was now customary, would be made statutory. A convict would be liable to be called upon to show that he was not earning a livelihood by dishonest means, and this, it had been urged, would materially interfere with his chance of obtaining honest employment. What, however, was the case? From a statement furnished him by the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society in London, the most considerable of its kind, he gathered that the total number of discharged prisoners assisted by the association since May, 1857, was 5,798, or 25 per cent of the whole number discharged, but the average number had recently decreased, because fewer prisoners had of late been released on license. The number of those who had applied to the society during the first six months of last year (1868) was 145, of whom twenty-six had emigrated, forty-four had found good and constant employment in the metropolis, and fifteen had gone to sea, twenty-five had been sent to places beyond the metropolitan police district and placed under the supervision of the local police, and thirty-five had been classed as unsatisfactory and bad; but these included some who were known to be in honest employment, but were so classed because they had failed to report themselves to the police, as required by the Act. That result was far from discouraging; it showed that licensed convicts could be disposed of in a satisfactory manner. With respect to the alleged annoyance to which these convicts were subjected, he had been assured that of the whole number of 475 convicts whose licenses had been revoked during the last three years, only five had made complaints of having been unduly interfered with by the police. Allowing for the reluctance of men in such a position stating their case fully to those in authority, the fact showed the interference of the police was not of the vexatious kind generally supposed. The clause, on the whole, would rather mitigate the condition of ticket-of-leave men than impose fresh hardships upon them. What he considered as an indispensable security was that the men should be under some control when released, with the view of obtaining honest employment.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY expressed himself satisfied with the clause as it stood amended. But he must deny the suggestion that he was opposed to the system of licensing—on the contrary, he held that the condition of ticket-of-leave men was preferable to that of those liberated at the end of a short term, as was testified by criminals often pleading for a long sentence in preference to a short one. During a long sentence they learned a trade, and when liberated they received a gratuity, which enabled them to purchase clothes or subsist until they found employment. He generally approved the effect of long sentences.

Clause 5 (Penalty for breach of conditions of license) agreed to.

Clause 6 (Register of holders of licenses).

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he had an Amendment to propose to meet the suggestion of his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon). His noble Friend had pointed out in the debate on the second reading of the Bill that it would be inconvenient if the registry of those men was kept by the Chief Commissioner of the metropolitan police. He (the Earl of Kimberley) thought it might be better if the Secretary of State had power to place the matter under the care of some other person, and he therefore proposed to insert words giving him power to do that, should he desire to do so.

Amendment moved, in line 12, after ("metropolis") to insert ("or of such other person as one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State may appoint").

THE EARL OF CARNARVON approved the Amendment, which removed his objection to the clause. He would also repeat a suggestion made on a former occasion, that the authorities at borough and county gaols should secure photographs of all persons committed to their charge, for the purpose of future identification.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he was sensible of the great use of such

photographs, although they could not be regarded as conclusive evidence. The Home Secretary would, no doubt, do all in his power to carry out the suggestion.

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD urged that it was of the utmost importance not only that they should have the registrar in a central office in London, but that the agents who were employed to keep a supervision over the ticket-of-leave men should be independent, to a certain extent, of the police force proper. He did not much care whether or not they were under the care of the Chief Commissioner of the metropolitan police, but he thought that they ought themselves to be particular officers charged with a particular duty. He was afraid that that Bill was based upon a state of things existing in London; but not to the same extent in the country; for it was evident that it was chiefly by means of Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies that these convicts would be able to obtain employment.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 7 (Returns for purposes of registrar),

Amended by inserting the words ("the gaolers of county and borough prisons") shall make returns, &c., and agreed to.

Clause 8 (Expenses of registrar) and Clause 9 (Part of Act to be construed with Penal Servitude Acts) agreed to.

Part II.—Habitual Criminals.

Clause 10 (Person twice guilty of felony, and not punished with penal servitude, to be subject to the supervision of the police).

LORD CHELMSFORD called attention to the peculiar phraseology of the clause, which provided that men twice convicted of felony, if not punished by death, should be subjected to the supervision of the police. What was the necessity for the exception "if not punished with death?"

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY thought the phrase necessary, having regard to the consequences that were to follow conviction in this and the next clause. It had been pointed out to him that there were certain misdemeanours which it would be desirable to include in the operation of this clause. He had endeavoured to meet the suggestions which had been made; but there were others which went further than he thought it prudent to extend the clause, because it was not desirable to be excessively severe. Accordingly, he had given notice of an Amendment to omit the word "felony" and insert "offence specified in the first schedule hereto," and he proposed to add to the Bill as its first schedule "any felony, or the offence of uttering false or counterfeit coin, or the offence of obtaining goods or money by false pretences." If he might anticipate the noble Earl (Earl Beauchamp) he was quite ready to add the words "or misdemeanour under the 58th section of the 24 & 25 Vict. cap. 96."—That misdemeanours related to persons found with implements of housebreaking upon them, or with their faces blackened with the intent to commit felony, who were subjected to penal servitude for five years. The offences were of such a nature that they ought to be included in the Bill; and he was obliged to the noble Earl for having pointed out the omission. He hoped the House would agree that the misdemeanour of uttering false coin ought to be included, and he thought that obtaining money by false pretences ought also to be included, because many of these criminals committed offences of this kind.

Amendment, line 36, to leave out ("felony") and insert ("offence specified in the first schedule hereto.")—(The Lord Privy Seal), agreed to.

LORD HOUGHTON moved an Amendment, in line 3, that a person should have been "twice" instead of "once" previously convicted before he was subject to supervision. It was against the spirit of our law to treat a man as an habitual offender until he had been twice previously convicted. The range of felony for which convictions might be recorded was very large, and offences varied very much in character. It behoved their Lordships to be aware how they enlarged this criminal class more than they were obliged to do, and it already included a very large body of men.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the Amendment went to the principle of the Bill. It was essential to bear in mind what the law was. It allowed an alternative sentence to be passed upon men convicted of certain crimes; they might be sentenced either to imprisonment or to penal servitude. Since the passing of the Act of 1864, which made five years the minimum of a sentence of penal servitude, the Judges had exercised their discretion in a large number of cases; the number of sentences to long terms of imprisonment had increased, and the number of sentences to penal servitude had been proportionately diminished. The object of this Act was to place to a certain extent, men who had suffered sentences of imprisonment in the same position as men who had been subjected to penal servitude. But when it was said these persons were to be subject to the supervision of the police it must not be supposed they were to be subjected to the conditions which were imposed by the Act of 1864. The only conditions to which persons who were sentenced to this supervision of the police would be subjected were the conditions named in this Bill—and that made a material difference. Many had erroneously supposed that persons who would soon number 25,000 on the average would be subjected to that supervision of the police to which men under license after penal servitude were subject. On the contrary, the men who received a sentence contemplated by the clause would be subject only to the three conditions named in the clause defining the special character of the supervision. Under these circumstances to accept this Amendment and substitute "twice" for "once" would be to strike at the very intentions of the clause, which was that persons once convicted of felony should be placed under special disability, in the same manner, though not to the same extent, as persons sentenced to penal servitude. He hoped the House would agree that it was not going too far, in the case of men guilty of such crimes, to place them under the special disabilities prescribed by the clause. Those who attended to the nature of the sentences frequently passed at Assizes and quarter sessions must know that there were convicts who had only received sentences of imprisonment who were as dangerous and who belonged as much to the class of "habitual criminals" as those who had been sentenced to penal servitude for a long term. He agreed in the opinion that in many cases it would be wiser, instead of passing a sentence of imprisonment, to award the punishment of penal servitude, because a man upon whom that punishment was inflicted was subjected to wholesome discipline, and was withdrawn for a longer time from the public eye. He trusted that their Lordships would agree to the clause as it stood, and not accept the Amendment proposed by his noble Friend.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY thought that the clause, as it stood, scarcely gave a man once convicted a fair chance of earning an honest livelihood. If a man once committed a crime, no matter how sincere might be his repentance, or how strong his desire to labour honestly for his living, he would be under this law for the period provided in the clause. He desired to know whether there was any power lodged in the Crown, supposing the man conducted himself well, to remit any of this portion of his sentence? He thought it would be very desirable to lengthen the period of the first sentence—the evil of short sentences was incalculable.

EARL GREY said, he must remind the noble Earl that the supervision was imposed, not when a man was convicted for the first time, but when it was shown that he had been once convicted before.

LORD HOUGHTON wished to draw the attention of his noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) to the fact that no discretion was vested in the Judges. He thought it most unfortunate that Bills of this character were not submitted to the ministers of justice in this country. He ventured to say that this Bill had not been advised upon by any of the Judges; indeed, he doubted whether they were aware that such a measure had been proposed. He certainly believed that this was the only country in the world where such a state of things would be tolerated.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he trusted this clause would be retained as it stood. Out of 131,000 persons convicted last year upwards of 30 per cent had been convicted before, and of the 46,000 who were re-convicted, 41,000 had been convicted only once previously. It was perfectly true that the principle they were proposing was a new one, but the condition of things was new, and when they had new conditions to meet new principles must be applied. It had been said that by this supervision for seven years the convict would be placed under a sort of ban; but that ban was sufficiently elastic, because it would not prevent him from earning an honest livelihood, while through its means the police would have the power of preventing him from recurring to his old courses.

LORD CAIRNS said, he thought that without making it incumbent on the Judge to decide whether this supervision should form a portion of the punishment some discretion might fairly be left in his hands. He therefore proposed the addition of words to the clause which would have the effect of making the supervision follow the conviction in the case provided against by the clause, “unless the Court should declare to the contrary.”

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND thought that the noble Earl should assent to the Amendment proposed by the noble and learned Lord. It very frequently happened that the second offence was of a trivial character, and he therefore thought it was advisable that some discretion should be left in the hands of the Judge.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was afraid that he could not accede on behalf of Her Majesty's Government to the suggestion of his noble and learned Friend. His noble and learned Friend proposed that it should be left to the Judge to declare on the trial whether or not the supervision proposed by this clause should take effect. He (the Lord Chancellor) held that this could not be done without injury to the scope and purport of the Bill. The Bill was divided into three Parts. The first—with which their Lordships had already dealt—applied to the ticket-of-leave men, who would be treated with but very little more severity, but over whom there would be more vigilant supervision. The second Part—that which the Committee were now on—applied to persons who, having been once convicted, were brought up again to be tried. The third Part applied to persons who had been twice convicted, and were brought up again, and who, if again convicted, were to be dealt with in a different manner. The whole scheme and purport of the Bill was to have a deterrent effect—to protect society from the depredations of the criminal, and to protect the criminal from his own evil habits and associates. Now with regard to this clause, it was only when a man, having been once convicted, fell again into evil habits, was again brought to trial and again convicted, that it would be brought into operation. A noble Lord (Lord Houghton) had spoken of the commission of an offence which involved no moral guilt. He had some difficulty in conceiving an offence without moral guilt; but they were now asked to say that if a man had once committed an offence without moral guilt and was then convicted of a second offence without moral guilt he ought not to be supervised. He would say that for such a man supervision was necessary as a protection both to society and himself from himself. If, therefore, it were agreed on the suggestion of his noble and learned Friend that the Judge should have power to declare in his sentence that a man might be exempt from supervision, the object of the Bill would be defeated altogether. Besides he would remind the House that there could be no legal doubt the Crown had power to remit this or any other part of the sentence. There were eighteen Judges who had power to pass these sentences, and if they left it to the Judges to decide in each case, the result would be a series of unequal sentences that would wholly destroy the certainty of the administration of the law. It was better that the power of exemption should be lodged in one mind—in the Secretary of State—than left to the varying tempers of the different Judges. An opinion had been expressed that the police might exercise an undue pressure on persons under supervision; but a fact had been stated to him by a young friend of his, who had taken an active part in the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, which went far to show that such an apprehension was not well founded. His friend had informed him that out of 2,500 cases of discharged prisoners which had come before that society there was not a single complaint that any one had been disturbed in his employment by the action of the police. There were one or two complaints of annoyance, but these did not appear to have rested on any very good ground. As to what was said about the injury done to a man's character by supervision, he must observe that a man's character was gone after two convictions. It was idle to say that after two convictions a man had a character. There might be one hard case in perhaps 100 under supervision; but would it be well for the sake of that one, and that of a person who, to say the least, had been twice convicted, to run the risk of having no supervision over the other ninety-nine? He repeated that he thought this question of remission was one that ought to be left to one authority—the Executive.

LORD CAIRNS said, his noble and learned Friend had to some extent misapprehended the nature of his suggestion. He did not propose to leave it to the option of the Judge in every case to say whether supervision should be a part of the sentence or not. What he proposed was, that the Legislature should lay it down as the general rule that when a prisoner had been once convicted he should, as an incident of the sentence, on the second conviction, be placed under the supervision prescribed by the Act. That was to be the rule; but if his suggestion were adopted, the Judge might, on the face of his sentence, declare that the case was an exceptional one, and that the general rule of supervision was to be departed from. His noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) thought it was better to vest the dispensing power in the Executive, in order to avoid a diversity of opinion in similar cases; but Secretaries of State changed, and there were great differences of opinion among right hon. Gentlemen who filled the office of Home Secretary. Indeed, contrary decisions were sometimes given by the same Secretary. Again, what provision was there in this Bill to enable the Secretary of State to remit the supervision?

LORD CAIRNS: He doubted the opinion of his noble and learned Friend that the Crown had power to dispense with a portion of the sentence—the Crown could only grant a pardon which extended to the whole punishment. To enable the Secretary of State to change the sentence by remitting the supervision, power for that purpose should be taken in an Act of Parliament—a power similar to that by which the Secretary of State was enabled to grant a license in a case where there has been a sentence of penal servitude.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the actual imprisonment would be over. That portion of the punishment would have been suffered, and there would remain nothing but the supervision. The Secretary of State could remit that.

EARL GREY said, he objected to any dispensing power being left either in the hands of the Judges or of the Secretary of State. His opinion was that the rule ought to be positive and imperative, and that there ought to be no exception whatever. He objected to a discretionary power being vested in the Judges, because when serving on the Penal Servitude Commission some years ago he had been much struck by the evidence that great evil arose from the way in which the Judges differed among themselves in their enforcement of the law. During the same Assizes, he remembered it was shown that in two towns at no great distance from each other, two convictions took place for offences very much of the same character and both for bad ones, that in the worst case a light sentence was passed by the Judge, while in the other, though it was certainly the least serious of the two, a very severe punishment was imposed by another Judge. One of the greatest evils that arose from this uncertainty in the administration of the law and the unwise lenity sometimes shown by the Judges was that the terror of the law among the criminal classes was thereby greatly diminished. He might remind their Lordships of what happened when the punishment of three years' penal servitude was first introduced. This sentence was intended for offences that deserved more than two years' imprisonment, but which yet did not deserve seven years' transportation which was formerly the next punishment. But what happened? Why, in a short time, offences which had always up to that time been punished with seven years' transportation, came as a matter of course to be let off with three years' penal servitude. The result of this great diminution in the severity of the law was that men were found to come back to their old haunts and show their companions what a trifling thing three years' penal servitude was. Under these circumstances, it was not surprising that the law became inefficient to repress crime. This want of uniformity in the administration of the law unfortunately had continued down to the present moment. In illustration of his statement he would refer to a discussion which was reported recently to have taken place in the House of Commons. The Secretary of State was asked why he had remitted part of the punishment of a prisoner who was sentenced to penal servitude for life for a very aggravated manslaughter, scarcely to be distinguished from murder, though the Commissioners recommended life sentences should never be shortened, except under some special circumstances. The reply of the Secretary of State was that about the same time a similar offence, but of a still worse character, had been committed, and the prisoner had been sentenced to penal servitude for ten years; so that the Secretary of State was obliged to commute the sentence in the other case to restore the balance between them. He feared it was impossible to get rid altogether of this want of uniformity, but it was a great evil, and every effort ought to be made to insure, as far as might be practicable, that in future the law would be applied uniformly. With this view he thought such discretionary power only should be given to the Judges as might be absolutely necessary to prevent hardship and injustice. He did not think that any great hardship would be inflicted upon a man who had been twice convicted in subjecting him to supervision. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government would support the clause as it stood, and that there would be no dispensing power either in the Judges or the Crown.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he did not understand his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) to move an Amendment, but merely to make a suggestion.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the noble and learned Lord opposite (the Lord Chancellor) did not appear to propose any Amendment on the part of Her Majesty's Government. He would suggest to the noble Earl opposite that it was desirable to introduce words into the clause so as to make it quite clear how far the powers of supervision by the police should be limited. He would propose to add words limiting the supervision "in accordance with the enactments hereinafter contained."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he would take into consideration the suggestion of the noble Earl on bringing up the Report.

LORD ROMILLY, while fully admitting that the unfortunate people who had been twice convicted were not entitled to any peculiar favour, thought they were about to confer on magistrates an extraordinary power in providing that they might imprison a man for one year at their mere will and pleasure, for they are obliged to state no reasons, no fact which has caused their suspicion. The unfortunate man is guilty of poverty and want and, if he has been before twice convicted, without an accusation and without being called upon for defence he may be imprisoned for one year. He would suggest that this part of the clause should be omitted altogether—which appeared to him to be the better course—or at least that the magistrate should be required to state the reasons for his belief that the criminal was gaining his livelihood by dishonest means. He was satisfied that otherwise their Lordships would find it impossible to carry this clause into effect. Suppose a man suspected of an offence against the game laws, would that be sufficient to send him to prison for one year, when the man was in all other respects earning an honest living? It was necessary, if they passed this Bill, that they should carry with them the sympathies of the people, and they would not do that if the people felt the law was unjust; that one principle of law was applied to the rich and another to the poor.

Moved, to leave out lines 11 to 15, both inclusive.—(The Lord Romilly.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY could not agree with his noble and learned Friend in regarding these as “unfortunate” people. They were guilty, not of misfortune, but of crime, and it was important that the House, in legislating with regard to them, should recognize the distinction. At the same time there was no reason why they should be treated with undue severity. There was nothing in this clause to prevent a person from returning to honest occupation, if so minded; and a similar restriction to that applied in a former clause—namely, that the police were not to interfere with the particular individual without the written authority of the chief officer of police—would be adopted. The chief officer of police—having before him the certainty that if he made a mistake the whole matter would become public, and that he would incur severe censure at the hands of the magistrate—was not likely, he thought, to abuse the discretionary power which it was proposed to vest in him. Their Lordships would observe that the clause did not give the police the power of punishing offenders, but only of bringing them before a magistrate for investigation. There was a very considerable class of persons known to live by crime, but impossible to reach, because crime could not be brought home to them. The object of the clause was to place persons who had been convicted of two serious offences under police supervision. This would enable the police to reach the nest of old offenders and break up those gangs of thieves who infested our large towns, and who, though they were known to be living by crime, could not be arrested for any specific offences.

LORD ROMILLY said, the noble Earl had mistaken the object of his Amendment, which was not to leave out the whole of the clause, but only five lines of the clause. As matters stood, without a word being said to the prisoner, without being called upon to defend himself in any way, the magistrate would have power to send him to prison for a year.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, his noble and learned Friend was quite right, and he had not limited his argument as he ought to have done. He could only repeat that the first condition was, in his opinion, a valuable part of the clause. As to the other question about the magistrate giving his reasons, it would be more convenient to discuss that when the proper time came.

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD agreed with all that had fallen from his noble and learned Friend (Lord Romilly), and asked the noble Earl who had charge of the Bill whether, when one of these persons was brought before a magistrate, the mere statement of the constable was to be accepted as sufficient, or whether there was to be proof of the previous convictions?

LORD COLCHESTER hoped their Lordships would agree in some way to soften the language of this clause, inasmuch as the Bill they were now passing was of a very severe character, and introduced several entirely new principles. They must remember that the more penal the consequences which were made to follow from a second conviction, the greater the difficulty which would probably be experienced in obtaining a second conviction. There was also an ambiguity, he considered, in the clause itself, which might be productive of considerable difficulty where a man gained his living partly by honest and partly by dishonest means. Even with the restrictions which had been introduced, an arbitrary power was about to be given to justices which, he thought, would render the Act highly unpopular.

LORD CAIRNS pointed out a difficulty arising out of the language of the earlier portion of the clause. Upon the second conviction of a prisoner it was to be "deemed to be part of the sentence passed on him, whether so declared by the court or not, that he was to be subject to the supervision of the police." But how was the magistrate to ascertain when a man was brought before him that the prisoner had been twice previously convicted? The record of the second conviction showed nothing; and even an entry of a former conviction against a prisoner of the same name showed nothing, because their Lordships knew how freely names were assumed and abandoned by persons in the criminal class. Were they, therefore, to impose upon a single magistrate the duty of trying a question of identity, with very insufficient means of doing so, and with no appeal from his decision? If this clause were to work well, as he was very anxious that it should do, it must be declared on the face of the second conviction itself that the prisoner had been previously convicted of an offence specified, and that on the expiration of the sentence awarded for the second offence he was to be subject to the supervision of the police.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, their Lordships had now gone back a little upon the clause; but he would take care that on the Report the requisite Amendments were introduced.

LORD DENMAN trusted that the noble and learned Lord (Lord Romilly) would press his Amendment, as this was the first instance he had met with of punishment being awarded merely on account of suspicion, and possibly on evidence adduced by the party himself.

LORD CHELMSFORD approved the principle of the clause, but suggested that a difficulty would arise in its practical working. Unless it was expressed on the face of the second conviction that the prisoner was to be placed under police supervision, the magistrates must have it proved before them that he had been twice previously convicted, and this it might be very difficult to do. Suppose a person twice previously convicted were arrested by a constable and brought before a magistrate. Neither of them knew anything of the antecedents of the prisoner—at least, in such a definite mode as would enable them to deal with him under the provisions of the 10th clause. It was exceedingly improbable that two constables, or even one, able to prove previous convictions, would be forthcoming when a man was brought with little or no notice before a magistrate; and in that case it would be the magistrate's duty to discharge the prisoner. He would suggest the addition at the end of the clause of some such words as these—"And such justices, if they deem that there is reasonable ground for suspicion, may remand him from time to time until full inquiries have been made with respect to him."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY believed the magistrates would have this power under the existing laws.

LORD CHELMSFORD thought it would remove any cause for doubt if the power were given in the Act itself.

EARL GRANVILLE suggested that the more regular course would be to dispose of the Amendment, which was formally before the House, before they proceeded to discuss other Amendments.

LORD ROMILLY suggested that some record should be made of the reasons for committals by magistrates under the Act, but said he did not intend to trouble the Committee by moving the Amendment of which he had given notice, requiring those reasons to be endorsed on the warrant.

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD suggested that convictions of persons under sixteen years of age should not be convictions within the meaning of the Act.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY remarked that those who had committed offences in early life were just the persons whom it was most desirable to bring under the operation of the statute. The Act would in all probability be most beneficial in its operation on young criminals; they would be placed under such conditions that they could not keep up old associations and continue their bad habits. He could not see that there would be any hardship in what was proposed, or that it would be any serious addition to the sentence.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY would suggest that a conviction of a boy under the age of sixteen should not be allowed to operate; otherwise two convictions for stealing apples from orchards might render a youth liable to penal servitude.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: That question arises in the 11th clause.

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD said, he had given notice of an Amendment to omit Clause 10, and insert another in its place, but it was quite clear it was useless to move the omission of the clause; and, although he abstained from proceeding to a division, he must protest against the course their Lordships were about to adopt; and he must also move the remainder of his Amendment, which would therefore be that the following provision should be inserted in the Bill:—

“Where any person is convicted of a felony or indictable misdemeanour for the first time the punishment which shall be awarded to such person if it exceeds imprisonment with hard labour for one calendar month shall in no case be less than imprisonment with hard labour for six calendar months; and where a person who is proved to have been previously convicted is convicted for a second time of a felony or an indictable misdemeanour, the punishment to which such person shall be sentenced shall in no case be less than imprisonment with hard labour for six calendar months.”

He wished to see greater certainty of increased punishment upon a second conviction, and further to see all imprisonments between one month and six months abolished. The noble Earl in charge of the Bill had clearly pointed out the necessity for certainty of punishment, which, however, was not secured by the Bill. According to the Bill, a person convicted for a second time might be punished with one month's imprisonment, when his previous sentence might have been the same. Then it was proposed that on a third conviction a prisoner should be subject to a sentence of seven years' penal servitude. It appeared to him it was necessary, if the discretion of Judges were limited in passing sentence upon a third conviction, it should also be limited to a certain extent in passing sentence upon a second conviction.

His reason for wishing to abolish sentences of between one and six months was this—if they were desirous of seeing any real efforts made in the way of the prevention of crime, they must look to the mode of the treatment of prisoners in gaol. By abolishing short sentences of between one and six months they would enable a much better system of classification and treatment to be carried out in prisons. Whether that system was to be one of productive or of unproductive labour would soon have to be discussed. A large number of sentences of six months would enable them to carry out a much better system of classification and treatment than was now possible. The effect would be that the sentences would be pretty evenly divided between one month and six months, and therefore there would be no great increase of expense involved in the course which he proposed. The Bill was called the Habitual Criminals Bill, but there was no proof that the man who committed a second crime was an “habitual criminal.” The contrary was more near the truth, for he believed that considerably more than half of those who were convicted a second time never returned to their evil courses; but undoubtedly the proportion of those who returned after a third or fourth conviction was very much larger. He denied altogether that on a second conviction a man was to be regarded as an “habitual criminal.” If this clause of the Bill were to stand he should be disposed, on the Report, to move an Amendment to the effect that the question whether a man was or was not an “habitual criminal” should not be left either to the Judge or to the Secretary of State, but that it should be put to the jury. The police supervision provided for was commended to them on what he must consider unsatisfactory grounds. It was commended in consequence of the working of the system in London, where, however, it had not been really tested, because nearly all discharged prisoners were placed in the care of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society. They were told that the system had worked well in Ireland; but the statistics adduced took no account of the vast number of persons who had emigrated to America, or who had come to England. There was really no satisfactory evidence that the system of police supervision was a good one. The statistics cited by the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) who had charge of the Bill were quite worthless for the purpose for which they were quoted. The noble Earl said there had been a large decrease in the number of penal servitude sentences between 1857 and 1867; but the reason was that we had increased penal servitude sentences from three to five years in ordinary cases, and from five to seven years on second conviction, and in too many cases the Judges had passed sentences of imprisonment only when otherwise they would have passed sentences of penal servitude. Other figures than those quoted must be taken into consideration if we wished to form a judgment of the effect of our police supervision and prison discipline. The figures of the noble Earl, going back as far as 1856, could not be depended upon. There had not been so large a decrease in indictable offences as might have been expected. The decrease shown by the figures was the less reliable because cases dealt with summarily since 1856 were altogether excluded; and therefore it was impossible to form an opinion as to the number of offences committed. Both our prison discipline, introduced by the Act of 1865, and our police supervision, introduced by the Act of 1864, had been total failures, and had not been followed by the results which it was rather implied by the noble Earl they had. The noble Earl concluded by moving his Amendment.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY ventured to think, in spite of the opinion expressed by his noble Friend, that the statistics to which he had referred the other evening were not entirely worthless. When quoting the statistics on the introduction of the Bill he had cautioned their Lordships not to jump too rapidly to conclusions; but this was the very thing his noble Friend had done. Instead of taking the figures as a whole he had merely taken a part, and had thus fallen into a mistake. He still contended that a candid examination would show that on the whole there had been a decrease of crime.

EARL GREY remarked that the Bill would raise this difficulty. A twice-convicted criminal was to be placed under the supervision of the police, and when so placed was liable to be brought up before a magistrate, and, under certain circumstances, to be sentenced to a year's imprisonment. If a man incurred that punishment in consequence of his inability to obtain the means of earning an honest livelihood, when the period of his discharge arrived the man would not be a bit more able to maintain himself by honest industry than he was before. It was true that society would have been protected from his depredations during the year of his imprisonment, but beyond that fact they obtained no advantage. This was a difficulty that future legislators would have to face—they must devise some means of helping men who had been criminals and were desirous of reforming their lives, to obtain an honest livelihood. At present such men had the greatest difficulty in finding honest employment. With the stringency which such a Bill would impose, he felt sure that the evils arising from the discontinuance of transportation would be felt more and more. While transportation existed this difficulty did not arise, because in Australia, from the high value of labour a discharged convict had great facilities for earning his livelihood. He believed that the great majority of these people desired to abandon their criminal courses if they could obtain an opportunity of doing so. If they made a man liable to punishment for not maintaining himself honestly they must take care that the means of doing so were placed within his reach. He did not pretend to say how this could be accomplished, but their Lordships might depend upon it that it was a point that was not settled by the Bill. He certainly agreed in the opinion that the Judges and chairmen of quarter sessions should, in the exercise of their discretion, when they had to pass sentence on a man who had been convicted before, sentence him to penal servitude instead of imprisonment. Before the expiration of a term of penal servitude they had an opportunity of learning some trade, while, as a rule, they came out in better health and more capable of enduring severe labour than when they went in. He was not, however, prepared to go the length of rejecting the clause.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY reminded their Lordships that the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, which had been the means of doing much good, confined its operations to convicts released from sentences of penal servitude, and did not extend its assistance to those who were only released from imprisonment. They were, therefore, bound to see that a man who would be liable to the severe punishment contemplated by this measure had had a fair opportunity of earning an honest livelihood.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 11 (Persons thrice convicted of felony to be liable to be taken up if found under suspicious circumstances) amended, and agreed to.

Clause 12 (Amendment of sec. 4 of the Vagrant Act).

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD moved an Amendment, at end of Clause insert—

“And the justices or magistrate before whom such suspected person is brought may, if they or he think fit, in addition to or in lieu of any imprisonment to which he may be sentenced as a rogue and vagabond, require him to enter into his own recognizances and find a surety in a sum not exceeding twenty pounds for securing his good behaviour during a period of twelve calendar months, and in the event of such security not being found to order such suspected person to be imprisoned for a period not exceeding in the whole twelve calendar months.”

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY thought it would be hard to adopt such an Amendment. It was unreasonable to expect that a man who had recently come out of prison would be able to get a surety in a sum of £20.

LORD DENMAN said, it would be a great addition to the painful duty of a magistrate to be obliged to imprison instead of accepting two good sureties, if willing to come forward, and if he were satisfied with them, for the good behaviour of the man twice convicted before.

Amendment negatived.

EARL BEAUCHAMP moved after Clause 12 insert the following clause:—

“Every person who shall be brought before two justices or a stipendiary magistrate charged with having in his possession anything which may reasonably be suspected of being stolen or unlawfully obtained, and who shall not give an account to the satisfaction of the justice or magistrate how he came by the same, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds, and in default of payment may be imprisoned with or without hard labour, or in the discretion of the justice or magistrate to be imprisoned with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding two months.”

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY objected to the clause as too stringent, and as opposed to the whole spirit of our legislation. It would apply to persons who had never been convicted of crime. By accident or negligence a person might become possessed of a thing for the possession of which he might fail to give what the justice would regard as a satisfactory account.

Clause 13 (Penalty for harbouring thieves, &c.).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he wished to know whether the words “suspected persons” in the clause were capable of any legal definition, or whether they were to be understood in the ordinary sense of persons whom any other people might happen to suspect? If the words were to be taken in the latter sense, it appeared to him that their application would be too wide, and would, in fact, form a loi des suspects, and nothing else.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the word was used in the sense generally understood under the Act of 1864 and this Act. He would, however, before bringing up the Report, see whether the definition intended could not be made more precise in words.

LORD CAIRNS asked the noble Earl whether the phrase “reputed thieves” was not too wide a one in a clause under which persons were to be punished who kept houses frequented by “thieves, reputed thieves, or suspected persons?”

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that the words “every suspected person or reputed thief” occurred in the Vagrant Act, and were, therefore, not now used for the first time. Hitherto these words had been found satisfactory, and he would be loth to part with them.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY reminded the noble Earl that the proprietors of low beer-houses were in the habit of receiving goods upon deposit, and thereby presented a more ready means for the disposal of stolen property than even the receiving-house. He proposed to insert in line 10 in the clause, the words “or who allows the deposit of goods knowing them to be stolen.” Such an enactment would meet the case of these deposit houses, or leaving-shops, which form such fruitful sources of crime.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the suggestion of the noble Earl was well worthy of consideration. It would, however, be as well if he were to give notice of his intention to move the Amendment on bringing up the Report.

EARL GREY thought the Amendment of the noble Earl would effect a great improvement in the clause. It was also most desirable that they should not only punish the occupiers who were guilty of these offences, but that they should also be able to strike at the owners of these low beer-shops. At present, when a man carried on one of these places in an improper manner and forfeited his licence, the landlord turned him out and put another equal rogue into his place to carry on the same trade. He proposed that words should be inserted to provide that when an occupier of one of these places forfeited his licence no other occupier should be allowed to be licensed in that house, at all events for the next twelve months.

Amendment moved, after line 21 insert—

“And if any such house, shop, room, place, or other premises be licensed under statute regulating the sale of exciseable liquors or foreign wine, an offence under this section shall be an offence against the tenor of the license of the occupier of the house, shop, room, place, or other premises as aforesaid.”—(The Earl Beauchamp.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that offences under this Act would be offences against the license regulations. He approved the suggestion of the noble Earl, but would take time to consider the words necessary to carry out his intention.

Part III.—Receivers of Stolen Goods.

Clause 14 (Burden of proof in cases of receiving stolen goods).

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he would make a suggestion which he thought would meet an objection which a noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) was about to make. He was not one of those who thought that this clause was too stringent; on the contrary, he was afraid as it stood at present it would utterly fail to attain the object with which it had been introduced. It was a most important clause, because if there were no receivers there would clearly be no

thieves. The clause only applied to receivers of stolen goods who had been previously convicted of any offence punishable by imprisonment. Now, if this clause were passed as it stood, persons who had been previously convicted would transfer their business nominally to one of their relations, and thus the object of the clause would be defeated. In order to render the clause effective, he would move to insert the following words:—

“Where any person is found in the possession of goods recently stolen, and cannot prove that he has taken them under circumstances which would excite no reasonable suspicion in the mind of a careful and prudent man that they were dishonestly obtained, he shall be deemed and taken to have known them to have been stolen, and the burden of proof to the contrary shall be thrown upon him.”

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY hoped some stop would be put to the sanguinary disposition that appeared to have obtained dominion over some of their Lordships, and which he could only attribute to hunger. The Amendment proposed by the noble and learned Lord showed what ferocity might be developed in the most gentle natures under the influence of an excessive zeal for the maintenance of law and the protection of property. The Amendment he had to propose was of an opposite character. The clause was manifestly one of a very unusual and stringent character, and he felt that when introducing a provision into the Bill which was contrary to the whole spirit of English law they should be careful to keep within the strictest bounds of moderation. He proposed that the clause should not apply to persons whose previous convictions had occurred before they were sixteen years of age.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY agreed with the noble Marquess that this was a most stringent clause, and that care should be taken that it did not work injustice, and he was very much disposed to accept his noble Friend's proposal. He would engage to take the matter into his consideration, but he could not then give any positive pledge with respect to it. The words “all persons previously convicted of any offence punishable by imprisonment” would doubtless bring persons within the scope of the clause other than those whom it was wished to reach. These were chiefly the receivers of stolen goods who were direct encouragers of crime, but it was not at all certain that a man belonged to that class because he had previously been convicted of some offence punishable by imprisonment. The clause, he thought, would better accomplish the end in view if it were made to read, "convicted of the offence of larceny or other offence against property." These words, of course, would very much limit the operation of the law.

EARL BEAUCHAMP considered that the words just suggested might be found too restricted in their application. Serious offences against the person were surely of as grave a character as offences against property, and ought to be placed in the same category.

LORD COLONSAY said, the object of the clause, as he read it, was to overcome the difficulty now experienced of proving that the persons who received goods knew them to be stolen rather than received them suspecting them to be stolen. But the operation of the clause ought to be restricted to cases ejusdem generis.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that he would first pass in review the wording of the various Amendments which had been suggested. "Felony" he regarded as too narrow a definition, because it would exclude such offences as cheating and uttering base coin. "Felony and misdemeanour," on the other hand, was too wide a term, because it included not only aggravated attacks upon the person, but likewise common assaults; and no one, he thought, should be exposed to Draconic penalties such as these merely because he had committed a common assault. The Amendment of which he himself had given notice though perhaps not expressed in very technical language, seemed to cover the ground more completely than any of the others, and he therefore offered it for the consideration of the noble Earl having charge of the Bill. It ran thus—

"Any person who had been previously convicted of any offence, involving fraud or dishonesty and punishable by penal servitude or imprisonment."

LORD ROMILLY thought the words recommended by the noble Earl opposite not inadequate for the purpose, but suggested that it might be better to say simply "offences mentioned in the schedule," and then define these carefully hereafter.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that of the different proposals which had been made that of the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) seemed the most inviting. He admitted that the words he had himself proposed, "any offence against property" were too wide. It would be somewhat difficult to frame a schedule covering all the cases to which the Bill might be applicable.

Amendment (The Earl of Carnarvon) agreed to.

LORD ROMILLY said, the clause as it stood was very stringent; and it was necessary, he thought, that persons who were to be put to the disproof of having received stolen goods with a guilty knowledge should have fair notice of what was required of them. He would therefore move an Amendment to mitigate the severity of the clause as it now stood.

Clause 14, page 5, line 30, leave out "offence" and insert "felony," and at end of clause, after "goods" insert—

"Provided that not less than fourteen days' notice shall be given to such person that proof is intended to be given of his previous conviction, and that he will be deemed to have known such goods to have been stolen until he has proved the contrary: Provided also, that for the purpose of proving the contrary such person shall be at liberty, if he think fit, to offer himself as a witness on his own behalf."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he was willing to agree to the Amendment of his noble and learned Friend, provided he substituted one week for a fortnight.

LORD ROMILLY said, he would not press that point, but he certainly thought that a clause of this stringency ought to be carried out in such a manner as to prevent the sympathy of the public being excited on behalf of a man who was charged under it, on the ground that he was being too severely dealt with.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY thought it too harsh to assume the receiver knew the goods in his possession to have been stolen, unless he proved to the contrary. He would ask the noble Lord Privy Seal to put himself in the position of a man accused under that clause, and consider in what manner he would prove his innocence. It was an impossible process for any man to prove he did not know a thing.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR pointed out that for a man to come under the operation of that clause he must have been previously convicted, and therefore the illustration of the noble Marquess would not apply to his noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal. He strongly disapproved the proposal to allow a receiver to give evidence on oath in his own behalf. Following the ordinary course, the prisoner would make his defence, and the magistrate would give that defence due weight; if it squared with the facts in evidence, the defence would be held good, whether given on oath or not. Besides this, a man who offered himself as a witness would be subjected to cross-examination, and this would not be preferable to simply offering a defence.

LORD CAIRNS also objected to the proposal to allow a man charged with a criminal offence to offer himself as a witness, because it was inexpedient to make so novel an exception to our criminal law in a particular instance. If the change were to be proposed at all, he would prefer that it should come before them as a separate measure.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON suggested that receivers should be dealt with after the manner of utterers of base coin. The rule that the evidence should be confined to the question at issue was set aside in the case of utterers of base coin to the extent of allowing evidence to be given to prove that other offences of a similar character had been committed about the same time. The object of the clause under discussion being to deal with habitual receivers of stolen property, he thought it would be prudent to allow evidence to be given as to whether the person charged had not been guilty of receiving on two or three previous occasions. This would establish the character of an habitual receiver more certainly than any other means.

The first paragraph of Lord Romilly's Amendment agreed to; second paragraph negatived.

EARL GREY proposed an Amendment which would meet the views of the noble Earl. When the police visited a receiver's house they often found the proceeds of various robberies concealed there, and this was proof of guilty knowledge. He therefore moved that—

The Marquess of Salisbury

“If any person not previously convicted shall be found in possession of goods which are proved to have been stolen in three or more different robberies, he shall be deemed to have known the same to have been stolen until he has proved the contrary, and if he should fail to prove the contrary, he shall be deemed to have committed as many distinct offences, for each of which he shall be liable to be separately punished, as there have been different robberies committed, the produce of which shall be found in his possession.”

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the Amendment proposed by the noble Earl would make the clause too severe. The term “any person” would include a pawnbroker who might be in possession of articles the produce of three or more different robberies, and yet not have a guilty knowledge in any case. To add this provision would greatly endanger the passing of the clause.

EARL GREY said, if a pawnbroker was in possession of goods the produce of so many robberies, it would show that very little care was exercised in the taking of pledges; and unless some such provision as he suggested were adopted, the receiving of stolen goods would never be put a stop to.

Amendment (Earl Grey) negatived.

Part IV.—Pawnbrokers.

Clause 15 (Penalties, &c.).

Clause 16 (Report by Pawnbrokers of stolen goods)

Clause 17 (If stolen articles be altered or defaced by pawnbroker he shall be held to be receiver of stolen goods).

LORD LYVEDEN moved to leave out these clauses. He had been requested to do so by a numerous, influential, and respectable body of tradesmen, who complained that they had been put into a Bill relating to “habitual criminals,” in company with the receivers of stolen goods, and others concerned in crime. The objectors did not see why they should be put into the Bill at all; and the noble Earl did not give any reason for putting them in when he introduced the Bill. All he was reported to have said was that there were other provisions in the Bill of minor importance, some of which related to pawnbrokers, who frequently gave facilities for the disposal of stolen goods. The pawnbrokers said that their trade was endangered by the Bill, and they had presented a petition which set forth these facts—

"The number of licensed pawnbrokers in England and Wales exceeds 3,000; the capital embarked in their business cannot be less than £7,000,000; and the sum contributed by them directly to the revenue for their licenses amounts annually to more than £35,000. The number of pawns effected in the metropolis alone in the year 1866 was calculated with sufficient accuracy to exceed 28,000,000."

It was supposed by some that pawnbrokers were in the habit of concealing crime, whereas they contended that they were remarkably instrumental and useful in detecting it, and that their duplicates facilitated its detection. Our Judges gave them credit for furthering the ends of justice; and in a case just tried at the Northampton Assizes, in which he was the committing magistrate, Mr. Justice Bovill complimented a pawnbroker as having been the only person through whom a criminal had been detected. The cases of pawnbrokers lending money on stolen goods were so few in proportion to the enormous number of their transactions that they did not deserve or require such stringent regulations. In the report of Major Greg, head constable of Liverpool, it was shown that out of 26,702 cases brought before the magistrates during 1868, only 140 related to unlawfully pledged goods. It was not generally known how large a proportion of pledges were redeemed. 28,000,000 of pledges were taken in in the metropolis alone in 1866. Of these all but 5 per cent were redeemed. The remainder that were pledges on which more than 10s. had been lent were publicly sold, and only 1 per cent of the 28,000,000 were pledges as to the rightful ownership of which by the pawners the pawnbrokers could not positively speak. It was perfectly clear that these were not persons to be dealt with wholesale as the receivers of stolen goods. He believed the majority of those in the trade were entirely honest; and if that were not believed, the pawnbrokers asked for a Select Committee, the striking out of these clauses, and the bringing in of a Bill to regulate their trade. They totally denied that they had anything to do with "habitual criminals," because they said they were just the persons to whom "habitual criminals" would never come. Yet it was proposed to injure their trade by rendering them and their books subject to the inspection of the police—not only of the chiefs, but possibly of a man at 23s. a week. And what was the trade that was to be exposed to this inspection? It was the business of making temporary loans on security; and was there any class of society members of which had not been benefited and perhaps rescued from ruin by such temporary loans? They were obtained by both poor and rich. Not one of their Lordships would like to have a policeman enter his house, demand to see accounts, and ask where money, plate, or diamonds came from. The consequence of this provision would be that a policeman would have the power to extort money by threatening to use his power. One clause provided that information was to be given to pawnbrokers of goods that had been stolen. The notices of things lost or stolen were so numerous that it could not be matter of wonder or blame if the pawnbroker or his shopman was unable to remember every one of them. They averaged from 35,000 to 40,000 annually; and it was very rare that the stolen goods pledged with a pawnbroker had been notified to him as having been stolen. But for the lateness of the hour he would have gone into the matter at much greater length, to show the injustice and the inutility of the proposed clauses, and the necessity, on the ground of absolute justice, of dealing with pawnbrokers by a separate Bill, and not classing them with "habitual criminals." He hoped his noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) would consent to strike out these clauses from this Bill, even if he brought them forward in another and separate one.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, he did not object to legislation to regulate the trade of pawnbrokers; but whatever was done affecting them ought to be done by a separate Bill. He thought that the pawnbrokers had very great reason to complain that they should have been placed in a Bill that dealt with "habitual criminals," thereby stamping them as such. He did not say that certain regulations should not be adopted, and the pawnbrokers themselves did not object to legislation, but they courted inquiry. It was of the greatest importance on public grounds that the trade of pawnbroking should be conducted with a certain amount of secrecy, for it would be very injurious that the circumstances under which a loan had been obtained should be made known. It might be true, and it must be true, that a certain number of stolen goods find their way into the shops of respectable pawnbrokers, and it was utterly impossible to prevent that by the strictest legislation. Persons engaged in this trade must also, as a matter of course, trust to those whom they employed. It might be well to place the trade under stricter supervision, but if that were done it should be done by means of a separate Bill, and provisions relating to men, who for the most part were respectable, should not be placed side by side with those which dealt with "habitual criminals."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that the pawnbrokers had shown themselves perfectly capable of defending themselves. He had had some communication with them, and he thought they had in some respects made out a case for themselves—especially on the point to which the noble Duke had referred—they had some reason, perhaps, to complain that their trade—in which there were many respectable men—should be dealt with in the provisions of a Bill which eo nomine related to "habitual criminals." He could, he believed, point out many reasons why some such provisions as these were advisable; but his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department had come to the opinion that it would be better to deal with them in a separate measure. He should not therefore oppose the Motion of his noble Friend to strike out the clauses which dealt with this branch of the question. His noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Shaftesbury) had asked him how the Government intended to deal with the melters, refiners, and marine store dealers. There was precisely the same objection to placing them under the Bill that existed in the case of the pawnbrokers. The marine store dealers were at present placed under a very stringent Act of Parliament, while the melters and refiners—among whom there was a very large number of respectable men—might fairly complain if a clause affecting their trade were inserted in this Bill. His right hon. Friend the Home Secretary proposed to examine the Acts of Parliament relating to pawnbrokers and marine store dealers, and also the case of the melters and refiners, with a view to bring in a Bill on the subject. Under the circumstances, therefore, he should offer no opposition to the proposal for the omission of these clauses.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY was understood to say that he did not object to the withdrawal of the clauses from this measure; but unless provisions of a similar character became law he did not believe that the present Bill would be attended with the results which they all desired, for the strongest temptation to young thieves arose from the facility with which their plunder could be disposed of.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Thursday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 32.)

ORDER OF ST. MICHAEL AND ST. GEORGE.—QUESTION.

MR. RAIKES said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether by a recent Patent the Order of St. Michael and St. George has been extended to all Her Majesty's Colonies; and, if so, when the new Statutes and appointments to the Order will appear in the Gazette, conformably with the precedent set by the promulgation of the Statutes and the publication of appointments of members of the Order of the Star of India?

MR. MONSELL said, in reply, that the Order of St. Michael and St. George had been extended to all the colonies, not, however, by fresh Letters Patent, but by fresh statutes, the Sovereign being empowered, under the existing Letters Patent, so to extend it. When the Order of the Star of India was created in 1861, and extended in 1866, notices announcing the circumstance and giving the leading provisions of the statutes were inserted in the Gazette, but the statutes were not gazetted. However, it was intended, with regard to the Order of St. Michael and St. George, to depart from the usual practice, and gazette both the statutes and the new appointments.

IRELAND—INFLAMMATORY SPEECHES. QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY: I wish, Sir, to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a report which has appeared in the newspapers of the 9th instant, as follows:—

“A meeting was held at Limerick on Sunday evening last, under the presidency of the Mayor, to make arrangements for a general collection at all the Roman Catholic Chapels, and at each of the masses, on St. Patrick's Day, in aid of the Fenian Prisoners, by permission of the Roman Catholic Bishop, ‘who had expressed his sympathy for the sufferers;’ upon which occasion the Rev. Mr. Shanahan, a Roman Catholic Priest, openly avowed himself a sympathizer with the Fenian prisoners, and concluded his speech with the following words:—‘I do not exactly know what a Fenian is; but if it means love for Ireland, Ireland for the Irish, and that Irishmen ought to be able to govern themselves, I am a Fenian in my heart; and so is every Priest in Ireland;’ after which the meeting broke up with cheers for a Republic, President Grant, Stephens, and Pigott;”

and, whether Her Majesty's Government propose to take any notice of these proceedings?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: Sir, no one can regret more deeply than I do that language such as is referred to in this Question has been used at a public meeting in Ireland, and for no other reason more do I regret it than this—that such language, coming from several of the persons concerned at a meeting held for an ostensibly charitable purpose,—namely, for the relief of the families of political prisoners, has, undoubtedly, had the effect, not unnaturally, of producing on the public mind an impression that many parties are favourable to the cause of Fenianism who, I know, are and always have been opposed to it. But with respect to the rev. gentleman, part of whose speech has been quoted in the Question put to me, I must say, on referring to a report which I hold in my hand—that however much to be regretted those words are—there yet are other words in the same speech which very considerably modify their meaning. I take it that the only way to ascertain the meaning of speakers under these circumstances is to compare the few words which have been quoted with the context. The beginning of the sentence that has been quoted is this—“I do not by any means profess myself to be a Fenian;” “but if Fenianism means”—love for Ireland, attachment to my native land, and so on, “then I am a Fenian.” And farther on in the same speech the rev. gentleman said—“I hope the day is coming when we may expect just and wise legislation under a British Government.” “Rome was not built in a day; and neither can we get all we want at once.” “We must wait.” “We must wait, and wait patiently. If justice be done to our country, we are satisfied. That is all that we want.” While regretting that intemperate language was used, so evidently open, not only to misconstruction, but to produce mischief, I yet must be permitted to say—on reading the whole of this speech—that it comes rather under the class of what has been called “heedless rhetoric,” used on an occasion of excitement, than under the class of language of an intentionally treasonable character. With respect to the Bishop of Limerick, Dr. Butler—who has always been a strong opponent of Fenianism, and who has always used his influence against it—whether he has thought it right to give his permission and sanction to this collection I do not know; but I am glad to see from the newspapers, in respect to Dublin, that a letter has been addressed by his Eminence Cardinal Cullen to his clergy in which he refuses to have anything to do with these so-called charitable collections for the families of these prisoners, and in which he warns his clergy that they are a “stratagem” for the purpose of obtaining from the country marks of approbation of the conduct of these persons and of adhesion to the cause in which they have suffered, and he advises the clergy to have nothing to do with it. That seems to me to be advice of very great weight and usefulness.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that the right hon. Gentleman had not stated what course Her Majesty's Government intend to take with regard to the Mayor of Limerick.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: The Government are making inquiries of their own authorities into the whole of the circumstances, including the conduct of the Mayor of Limerick.

METROPOLIS—BURLINGTON HOUSE. QUESTION.

LORD RONALD GOWER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the structure connecting Burlington House with Piccadilly is a temporary erection; also what is the proposed destination of the colonnade recently removed from the front of Burlington House?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, in the absence of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, he had to state that the structure referred to in the first part of the Question of the noble Lord was purely temporary; and with regard to the colonnade, its final destination, he believed, had not yet been determined on, but the matter was receiving the careful attention of the Department concerned.

IRELAND—CHURCH PROPERTY. QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK: Sir, I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will lay upon the Table an Estimate of the sum of money which will be required to purchase the sites of the ecclesiastical residences under the provisions of the 27th clause of the Irish Church Bill; and whether he will also lay upon the Table a Return of the number of ecclesiastical residences referred to in the said 27th clause, specifying the building charges affecting such residences respectively? I wish, also, to ask the right hon. Gentleman another Question on this subject, of which I have not given him notice; but I shall be glad to defer it till another day if he requests me to do so. My further Question is this—Whether he will lay on the Table an account showing the particulars of the private endowments proposed to be vested in the representative body of the Church under Clause 29; and, how he makes out the amount of such endowments to be the sum of £500,000, or thereabouts?

MR. GLADSTONE: With respect, Sir, to the first branch of the hon. Member's Question, I have no means whatever of estimating the sum of money that would be required for the purchase of the sites of these ecclesiastical residences. I am not aware that the sites are valued apart from the buildings, nor of what amount of land, together with the actual sites of the fabrics, it may be desirable for parties to purchase. Therefore I am wholly without the means of estimating the quantity of the land or its price. All this is matter for negotiation, and all I can do is to point out the facilities for obtaining it. As to the second part of the Question—whether I will lay on the table "a Return of the number of ecclesiastical residences referred to in the said 27th clause, specifying the building charges affecting such residences respectively," all these ecclesiastical residences are already set out in the Report of the Church Commissioners of Ireland, and the building charge attaching to each residence is likewise there set out and printed for the use of Parliament and the public. For the purpose therefore of reference in every particular case the information given embraces all the particulars that the Question would require; and I do not think, therefore, it would be desirable to print it afresh, nor probably would it be asked by my hon. Friend that we should pick out and print afresh all those minute particulars which have been given already, and, I believe, with perfect accuracy. We have no means of improving the statement; but should it be the wish of my hon. Friend to have this information classified or printed in a summary form in order to deduce results—if he will be kind enough to state what is the precise object he has in view, and will communicate with my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland or myself as to the way in which it may be carried out—we shall be happy to give his suggestion our best attention. With regard to the third Question, as to the probable value of the private endowments since the year 1666, that is not capable of being made the subject of a Return. I stated, indeed, in my opening speech, that with respect to that particular item of Church property, the estimate partook so much of the nature of conjecture that it was necessary to allow a wide margin. Any inquiry as to a particular point I would readily answer were it in my power to do so; but with regard to the amount of glebe lands or any other description of property referred to in the Question, it is of so vague a character that it could not be made the subject of a Return to this House.

NAVY—INSTRUCTIONS TO NAVAL OFFICERS ON FOREIGN STATIONS. QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, in the recent Instructions transmitted to Naval Officers on Foreign Stations, a discretionary power is given to such Officers to obey or not the requisitions of British Diplomatic and Consular Agents for Military aid in cases of emergency, or in any other case?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, there is nothing in the recent Instructions issued to Naval Officers for their guidance upon the occurrence of any matter of difficulty in a foreign port at variance with Article 44 of the Admiralty printed instructions. That Article is in the following words:—

"The officers in command of Her Majesty's ships are to pay due regard to any requisition which may be made to them, in the absence of the Commander-in-Chief, from the Governors, and other British authorities within the limits of the station on which they are employed, for their co-operation and assistance on any necessary service, whether it be for the protection of Her Majesty's Possessions or for the benefit of the trade of Her Majesty's subjects, or otherwise, so long as the same does not interfere with or infringe any instructions they may previously have received from a superior naval authority; it being of course a general obligation on all Her Majesty's Civil and Military Officers to afford mutual aid and assistance to each other in all cases affecting the welfare of the Queen's Service. In any very urgent case, where requisitions made by Governors or other authorized persons may interfere with the Instructions under which the Officers in command of Her Majesty's Ships are acting, the Commanding Naval Officer on the spot must, in the absence of the Commander-in-Chief on a part of his station too distant to admit of reference being made to him in the first instance, very maturely weigh and consider the relative importance and urgency of any such required service, as compared with that directed by his Instructions; and he must then act with regard to complying with, or refusing to comply with, such requisition as his judgment shall point out to be right; always recollecting the very heavy responsibility he will incur by an infringement of the orders of the superior naval authorities, unless the urgency of the case shall most fully warrant it."

This Instruction was issued thirty or forty years ago, and it has never been revoked.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman will have any objection to lay a Return on the Table respecting the recent Instructions that had been issued?

MR. CHILDERS: The recent Instructions do not in any way bear on the point which my hon. and gallant Friend has raised. I will, however, lay on the table the Instruction which does touch that point.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether any additional appointments have been made to the Staff of the Metropolitan Police; and, whether such appointments have involved any re-organization in the districts visited by and the duties performed by the Police?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, in reply, that the inquiry which had been instituted into the condition of the metropolitan police had established beyond doubt the fact that the duties required of the two assistant commissioners in the central office were of such an onerous nature as to interfere materially with that general and personal supervision of the police which was absolutely essential. A change had been long contemplated, and his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, in pursuance of the powers vested in him, had recently made several additional appointments. The metropolis had been divided into four districts, each of which had been placed under the charge of an officer called a district superintendent. These Officers were charged with superintending the general disciplinary duties of the police, and were generally responsible for the maintenance of order and the repression of crime in their several districts, being immediately answerable to the Chief Commissioner. One advantage resulting from this arrangement was that whereas formerly the police had constantly to go to the central office to answer complaints and transact other business, all such business would henceforth be transacted in the district offices. He was convinced that when the arrangement was fully carried out it would be found highly convenient.

SCOTLAND—EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN AND CHILDREN IN AGRICULTURE.

QUESTION.

MR. W. CARTWRIGHT said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has arrived at a decision as to the propriety of extending over Scotch Counties, the area of the inquiry at this time being prosecuted in English Counties, into the expediency of applying the principles of the Factory Act to the regulation of the employment of children, young persons, and women in agriculture, especially with a view to the better education of such children?

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, in reply, that when the Commission was appointed power was given to the Secretary of State for the Home Department to extend the inquiry to Scotland. At first it was confined to England, but as the inquiry advanced it was found that the circumstances under which women and children were employed in agriculture in Scotland differed greatly from the circumstances under which they were so employed in this country. It had consequently been determined to extend the inquiry to Scotland.

IRELAND—BANKRUPTCY LAW.

QUESTION.

MR. FITZWILLIAM DICK said, he rose to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether Government have it in contemplation to introduce a Bill this Session to amend the Bankruptcy Law of Ireland, with the view of assimilating the Law in that Country with the changes which are about to be introduced into the Bankruptcy Law of England?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. SULLIVAN) replied, that it was not the intention of the Government immediately to bring in a Bill on this subject. Her Majesty's Government were, however, deeply impressed with the importance of amending the

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

Law of Bankruptcy in Ireland, and if the measure which his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for England had introduced should pass into law he (Mr. Sullivan) would bring forward a Bill to extend its provisions to Ireland. If a measure relating to both countries had been brought forward great inconvenience might have been the result.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS BILL—[Bill 2.]

(Mr. William Edward Forster, Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I believe, Sir, I must make an apology to the House, which is not very frequently made, for not having entered at sufficient length into an explanation of this Bill when I brought it in. The fact was I knew I should have to make a full explanation on moving the second reading, and not wishing to inflict two speeches on the House, and believing that the Bill might be much more easily explained when hon. Members had it in their hands, my explanation on introducing the measure was as brief as I could possibly make it. Hon. Members need not, however, be apprehensive that my explanation on the present occasion will be as long as I can possibly make it. I propose to be as brief as I can, considering the importance of the subject, which has excited a great deal of interest in the country; but, as there are many details in the Bill, I must beg the attention of the House for some little time. I have this advantage in now entering into a full explanation—that during the three or four weeks that the measure has been before the country it has excited much interest, and some objections have been stated which I hope to be able to answer in the course of my remarks. The first question which hon. Members will no doubt put to me is this—"On what grounds do you ask the House to give to the Government such large powers for the reform and re-organization of Endowed Schools and educational endowments?" Therefore I must briefly state to the House the facts which have induced the Government to come forward and ask for these powers. I happened to be on the Commission which was appointed to inquire into the condition of secondary education throughout the country, and I will, as briefly as I can, give the final upshot and result of that inquiry, which was conducted by many men much more worthy of regard than myself—men of different political and religious views, and I think most of them men whose opinions on educational questions would have great weight on account of their antecedents. We were ordered to examine into the condition of all schools which had not been examined into by two previous Commissions—the one being that presided over by the Duke of Newcastle, which dealt with elementary education, and the other the Special Commission which was appointed to inquire into certain Public Schools. The first difficulty which we had to contend with was that, being supposed to be a Commission whose duty it was to examine into middle-class education, we found it almost impossible to define the meaning of the term “middle class.” We found that it included an enormous portion of the community; but for our purposes we quickly discovered that this great section of the British population might be divided into three parts—that for school purposes they were very conveniently divided by the ages at which the boys in general left school, and that by those ages we might in broad terms define very well the class and condition of the parents. We found that one class was composed of men in much the same position as those who usually send their sons to those Public Schools for which we legislated last year, such as Eton, Harrow, and Winchester—men, in short, of independent income, and for the most part men who look forward to sending their boys to the Universities or to giving them the same school education as those receive who go to the Universities. The age we found at which the boys educated at those schools—the tone of which was very much the same as that of our great public schools—left them was generally between eighteen and nineteen. We also found that there was a second grade larger in point of numbers which left school generally between sixteen and seventeen, which comprised those who were being educated for special professions—such as the army or engineers, the medical or legal professions—and those who were being educated, and they constituted a considerable number—for trade. We found also that there was a third grade very much larger than the other two—indeed, as great, if not greater, than both together, and, in my mind, the most important grade, as far as the question of legislation is concerned—in which the boys left school about fourteen, and were the sons of small farmers, small tradesmen and shopkeepers, or of superior artisans. I shall not trouble the House with any detailed account of the condition of these three grades, but, on the whole, the result as we ascertained it was certainly not satisfactory. In the first grade we found that the education attempted was a high classical education, given in many cases successfully; but we found generally that there was great difficulty in obtaining a good scientific education, such as might be obtained in Germany or France, and that there were not many schools in the kingdom in which such an education could be procured. We found, in short, that parents who were in a position to spend any amount they might please on the education of their boys experienced great difficulty in getting them taught well anything but Latin and Greek. The same remarks apply to the second grade, at which the boys did not remain long enough at school to obtain anything like a complete knowledge of Latin, their acquaintance with Greek being little more than a mere profession, while the sciences and modern languages were neglected. Petitions have been presented this evening on this subject, and in one of them—that from the Council of Medical Education, which is signed by Dr. Hawkins, and into which I have had an opportunity of looking—the petitioners say that—

“The maintenance of a sufficient standard of examination is rendered exceedingly difficult owing to the defective and limited education generally given in secondary schools.”

Again, in the Petition signed by Dr. Acland on behalf of the British Medical Association, composed of about 4,000 members, there is a statement to the same effect. I will now trouble the House with one or two answers which were given in the course of the long inquiry of the Commission. We examined, among others, Dr. Gull, who was asked—

“What, in your opinion, is the state of previous education which at present, generally speaking, the candidates for the medical profession obtain?"

The answer was—

"I should say still a very defective condition. There is no thoroughness in the teaching. I should say that men are defective in common writing and spelling. . . . Of course there are numerous exceptions, but it is still a common thing. There seems to be no training of the faculties of men for acquiring knowledge at all."

Dr. Gull describes the age of those of whom he is speaking as about sixteen, and Mr. Paget, in answer to a question which was put, said—

"I should say that the condition of knowledge of young men coming up for examination in regard to scientific subjects is highly unsatisfactory."

I had an opportunity of seeing the Petition, presented from the London University, in which it is pointed out that their matriculation examination is not of a very high standard. "Nevertheless," they say—

"The average proportion of candidates who have been unable to pass the matriculation examination during the last ten years has been nearly 40 per cent, a fact which, considering the object and nature of the examination, proves the existence of grave deficiencies in the secondary school education now provided in this country."

That applies to the first and second grades, and in the case of the third grade—which occupied our attention more than any other—we found the state of things to be even more unsatisfactory. Parents in the first grade, being generally persons in affluent circumstances, are able to take care of themselves, and I think it is hardly necessary to legislate for them, though we spent a considerable portion of last Session in discussing a measure relating to our great Public Schools. The same remark applies to the second grade, but if we are to look after education at all in the country we must direct our attention to the third grade which I have mentioned. With respect to that section of the community we did not find either that the aim was high or that the education given was as good as it might be. As Canon Moseley says, what is wanted by parents in this grade is very good reading, very good writing, and very good arithmetic, though I should be sorry if the portion of our population of which I am speaking should be content with the elements alone. The final conclusion at which we arrived was this—After saying that—

"Whether schools shall be public or private, for boarders or day scholars, large or small, nay even what shall be the particular curriculum, is a secondary consideration, and saying that the first consideration is that the teaching shall be sound and stimulative, the discipline manly and firm,"

the Commissioners add—

"It is plain from the evidence of our witnesses, and the still more important evidence of our Assistant Commissioners, that the schools, whether public or private, which are thoroughly satisfactory, are few in proportion to the need. Of these few there are some public and some private, but the private schools are those intended for the upper class and the upper half of the middle class. Below that line there is little good education till we come to the elementary schools under Government inspection. That little, however, is in public schools."

No part of the Report is, in my opinion, more completely borne out by examination than that general summary of the state of education. But, passing from that part of the subject, I come now to another portion of it into which we were ordered to inquire—I mean the resources of Endowed Schools which were provided by our ancestors chiefly for the purpose of giving secondary education. It was our business to examine into the number and income of those schools, and the following are the statistics on the subject, which I am enabled to furnish as the result of our inquiries:—Of Grammar Schools, into which it was more particularly our province to inquire, there are, independently of the seven Public Schools for which Parliament legislated last year, and including St. Paul's School, but not including Merchant Taylors', 782, whose gross income is £345,757, of which there is a net income for the purposes of education of £202,684. Those schools have also control over exhibitions amounting to £14,265. There are 2,175 schools whose total endowments amount to £247,480, of which I believe about half is applied to education. We have consequently 2,957 Endowed Schools whose gross income is £593,281, out of which, at least, £340,000, is at present appropriated to education. Now, that is an income which ought to do a great deal. I have had one or two maps made with the Endowed Schools marked on them, and it may be seen that they are scattered all over the country, so that one would expect that if this large income were well bestowed, it must have a great effect on education. I will now briefly describe the result of our inquiry into the condition of these schools; and, in doing so, I will refer to some of the cases which came under our notice, not mentioning the names of the schools, which, however, can be furnished to any hon. Member who may desire it. The head master of one of the schools told an Assistant Commissioner that—

“It was not worth his while to push the school, as with the endowment (about £200 a year) and some other small source of income he had enough to live on comfortably without troubling to do so.”

Another master of a large Endowed School, having an endowment of £651, put his nephew and son into the respective positions of second and third masters. The Assistant Commissioner—

“Found the discipline most inefficient, and the instruction slovenly, immethodical, and unintelligent; there was no one subject in which the boys seemed to take an interest, or which had been taught with average care or success.”

At another school—at a short distance from the one just mentioned—with an income of £610 a year—

“There were thirteen pupils, and it appeared as if even this number would be reduced; the school rooms were in a shameful state, and the scholars, though showing signs of having had teaching, were in a thoroughly bad state of discipline, and apparently only staying on to qualify for the school exhibitions.”

There was another school reported on in the same district, with an income of £204, so that if all these schools had been well and carefully administered, the education of the whole district might almost have been provided for. At this school—

“The sons of the master and of the incumbent of the parish appeared to absorb an inordinate share of the teaching; none of the town boys had made even respectable progress in the ordinary rudiments of education.”

Then, again, there was a school with a

“net income of £792 a year, where the head master taught three boarders, and no others; the under master only attended when he chose; the usher taught an inferior village school.”

In another school, where two masters received £300 between them, and one had a good house also, one boy was receiving instruction, while a private school close by had eighty boarders and forty day scholars, paying higher than the grammar school fees. At another school, with an income of £266, there were only eleven pupils, and “the whole place wore an aspect of decay and desolation,” but the master objected to a new scheme being procured. In another instance the master had other business, and at one time carried on continuously with the school the business of a flour and spinning mill. The upper half of this school “were profoundly ignorant on all subjects.” In another, where the master—since dead—received over £200 a year, the Assistant Commissioners found him occupied in preparing a system of “teaching prime numbers,” the system being contained in two perfectly unintelligible cards, which were shortly to be brought into use in the school. There is another case in the south of England in which the trustees made it a condition with the master on his election that he should take boarders, but he fixed the terms so high (£120 a year) that they were practically prohibitory—

“Six day boys, all very young, and paying fees composed the school. The boarders’ dining room was occupied as a coach-house by two of the master’s carriages, the night study was a laundry, and the large dormitory a billiard room.”

Our Assistant Commissioner in Suffolk found that at one school the master—

“Did no work whatever, but supports an old age in the comfortable schoolhouse; at another he was almost helpless from age and paralysis; at a third he was honest enough to declare that he was no longer fit for work; at a fourth he was deaf; while at three others he was no longer in the prime of life, and was languishing under his work. That is to say, more than a fourth of the grammar schools in one county were suffering from the bodily infirmities of the master.”

Now, I do not say that those instances give an average impression of these schools. There are many good schools among them, and many more aiming to be good. There are many which give a substantial education, and with regard to those which do not succeed in giving it, it often arises as much from the system not meeting the necessities of the time, which require something more than a mere classical education, as from any want of zeal and earnestness on the part of the master. I could point to several most excellent schools which we discovered in the course of our inquiry, and since I introduced this Bill I have found objections made to it, not by the bad schools—they never come near me—but by some of these good schools. They are afraid of the Bill. Now, I wish to assure them and the House that it is not for the good schools that the Bill is framed. We cannot, of course, exempt such schools by name, for in that case there would be no end to endeavours to obtain it, but schools which are well managed need fear nothing from the operation of a Bill which is to introduce good management. Looking over the state of our Endowed Schools generally, I find, independently of the glaring errors I have mentioned, two or three deficiencies in the system. Even the good schools aim too exclusively at a classical education, and have an almost irresistible tendency to become monopolized by the children of the rich. As they become good classical schools they raise their terms. The schools next in rank, where the pupils leave about the age of sixteen, take their type and example from the superior schools. They attempt to give an education from which the children can derive little benefit, because it is of no use to confine education almost exclusively to Latin and Greek in dealing with boys who leave school at sixteen. Many of these schools, therefore, with excellent intentions, are yet practically giving scarcely any education at all. Below these, again, there is a large class of elementary schools which, when good, merely save the neighbours from doing their duty in providing elementary instruction, and when bad, prevent the establishment of good elementary schools. In fact, speaking generally, where Endowed Schools do not do good, they do harm, because they prevent the competition of other schools. A bad classical or quasi classical school keeps out of existence a good commercial school. A bad elementary Endowed School prevents the establishment of a good inspected school. Indeed, I must say that if we cannot reform the whole system, I should be inclined to agree with some persons of great weight and authority, that with the view of promoting education throughout the country, we had better ignore the Endowed Schools; that if we cannot reform them we had better lose sight of them and go on as if they did not exist. But I will not abandon the hope that it is possible to reform them and that, when freed from the abuses which have arisen in their administration, they will be productive of great good in the future. It is only because beneficent men now living see the misapplication and the uselessness of educational endowments in the past, that we have not at this day as large endowments as were given in former ages; and I believe that if the Legislature now determines that the real intentions of the founders shall be carried out, and that the spirit shall not be sacrificed to the letter of these trusts, these old endowments will be succeeded by still larger ones in the future. We have an instance of this in the case of Mr. Whitworth, who, for the spread of education, has made an endowment quite equal to any made in the time of Edward VI. Well, now we come to the question what we may hope to do in re-organizing these schools. I have endeavoured to show what is the state of secondary education, and next, what are the resources of the Endowed Schools, what they are doing, or rather, what they are not doing; and now, one word as to what they might do if they were rightly re-distributed and reformed. I believe that they might then give the education which is needed to vast numbers of the middle classes—to many more than the 37,000 children who are already in these schools—and that they might do this so as to stimulate the private and proprietary schools, instead of preventing their existence. They should be administered, I think, not upon the principle of bestowing education as an alms and a dole upon classes who can afford and who wish to pay for it, but rather upon the principle that what an endowment can rightly do is to provide good and sufficient buildings, and put the master in such a position that while he has a small and certain income at starting, the increase of that income shall depend on the way he does his work. We had to consider carefully this question—whether it is desirable that masters should have any payment out of the endowment, or should entirely depend upon the school fees. I confess that I formed my opinion on this point in a great measure from my trade experience. I looked upon masters as persons employed by the trustees to do certain work, and—I hope they will not feel the comparison a disparaging one—I thought it would be right to treat them as I should treat persons whom I employed to do any commercial work. Now, I have found that the way to get the best service in such cases is to give a small fixed income, which makes a man independent of great want or calamity, and then make the remainder of his income depend, fairly and generously, upon the success of the undertaking in which he is engaged. I believe that will be the system by which we can best regulate the payments to the masters of these schools, whereas now very frequently their income is entirely independent of the success of the school, and in those cases the school does not succeed. Hitherto I have talked only of the middle classes, and have said nothing about the working men and the poor. It may be said that many of these schools were founded especially for the poor. No doubt in many cases they were; but in many cases, on the other hand, it seemed that the object of the founder was simply the promotion of education. But I shall be asked—"How do you propose to administer schools especially founded for the benefit of the poor? Will you hand these over to the middle classes?" Now, I must remark here, that the poor are not confined to one class. There are many needy men—needy, too, from no fault of their own—to whom it would be the bitterest trial and humiliation if they could not give their children a high education. There is many a struggling clergyman, many a professional man, who has worked hard as a physician or as a lawyer, who finds it hard work to give his children the education without which he feels that they will lose their place in society. It is not our business specially to legislate for parents in this class, but we should not lose sight of them; and it is not to the credit of this country that if a man in this class wishes to give his son the same education as a boy in the same class would get in France and Germany—if he sends his son to a good boarding school, and thence to the University—he would have to spend very nearly £2,000 to do so. Then there is a class of parents below that I have mentioned, comprising also many professional men, many tradesmen, and members of the Civil Service, to whose sons something more than a mere elementary education is a necessary of life. These men find a great difficulty in providing the necessary education for their children, and they must not be forgotten, for they pay a large portion of the taxes of the country—I doubt, indeed, whether there is any class which pays a larger proportion of taxes in proportion to their means than persons with incomes of from £150 to £500 a year. They are hit by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in indirect taxation, and in direct taxation through the income tax, and they have a right to be considered. But when I said that this was to be a poor man's question, I meant that it should also be a working man's question; or, if not, I should hardly be inclined to take the matter up. How, then, can we make this Bill a working man's Bill? It may be replied by seizing the endowments and applying them to the promotion of elementary education. I hope and trust that will not be done. Such a measure would be, indeed, a deviation both from the intentions of the founders, and from the use of the foundation, and as to the promotion of elementary education, that is a duty which falls on the nation, and the nation must perform it. I hope, therefore that neither the Chancellor of the Exchequer nor the President of the Poor Law Board will attempt to seize hold of this fund either to relieve general taxation or the poor rates. You cannot, I believe, though it may seem a paradox, satisfy what is due to the working man—and due to him according to the intentions of the founders—without in some way departing from the letter of their intentions. Their intentions were, in very many cases, that all classes should be admitted to the schools, and that those pupils who evinced a special faculty for learning should continue to receive education quite independent of their condition in life or the position of their parents; and that arrangement was easily carried out in those days, when there was not so great a demand for learning as now, and when only those boys who were capable of learning remained for a long period at school. Now the case is altered; education being a necessity to the middle classes, the Endowed Schools are crowded by their children. Gratuitous admission to them is by favour, and it rarely happens that the working man's child comes in; and when he does, he comes in with an invidious distinction. He is often regarded with scorn, and kept out of the playground. The way to really get him in is to substitute for admission by favour, admission by merit, and let the free boys come in by open competition. These schools, therefore, might be made to provide good masters and good education for the middle classes, and also to meet those comparatively exceptional cases, in which children of working men are both specially fitted for high education and can be allowed by their parents to remain at school. Both these ends might be met, but they are not met now. The middle classes do not receive the good education which they want, and it is most difficult for a clever boy in one of the elementary schools to find any means of getting a better education after his first course of instruction is finished. In order to provide means to secure these ends, we need powers to form, if necessary, fresh trusts, and to reform the management of these endowments. We must be provided with power to give the schools, in many cases, fresh governing bodies, to enable the governors to see that the masters teach the subjects which the parents want the children to learn—to give the head master authority over his assistant masters—to give girls, whose education is now the worst cared for, that share in the advantages of these schools, which I am sure was the intention of many of the founders that they should have, and to encourage day schools, for we must remember that without day schools it is impossible to supply good secondary education in towns, though we must also not forget that no sufficient education for the sons of small farmers can be obtained without cheap boarding schools. Above all, we must have power to prevent the rich seizing hold of the results of the reforms now proposed. If this be not done, just in proportion as you make a school good the richer parents will be anxious to send their children to it, fees will rise, and the poor boys will be elbowed out by those above them. There are two ways to prevent this—one, by taking power to fix an average of time at which boys should leave, and thereby to determine the relation of schools one to another; and the other is by making a fresh system of exhibitions, to substitute admission by merit for admission by favour. I hope the House will bear with me while I explain how this free admission by merit will provide for the clever children of the working classes. It will be said that this is a boon in name and not in reality; because if admission is made to depend on examination upon entrance into school the richer parent will have an advantage, in consequence of being better able to prepare

his child for examination. I would meet that objection by affixing this exhibition, not to examinations upon admission into the schools into which the boys come, but to examinations at the schools from which they come. You have elementary and national schools in the country, and if you attach to those schools exhibitions to a school above them, every boy who proves his pre-eminence by getting one of the exhibitions is thereby promoted to the school above, and by that means you make a ladder by which the clever boy may mount to the highest education, and you stimulate the tone of all the schools below and around. I will give one instance of the way in which this will work. I will take the case of Edward the VI.'s Grammar School at Birmingham, of which the gross income at present is £12,000, and in a few years will be, it is believed, £20,000, and at the end of the century may be £40,000 or £50,000. When we examined into the school we found free nomination the rule, making this large and good school do as much harm as good. This free admission by favour was described by the head master and our Assistant Commissioners as a—

Nor did the harm stop there. There were thousands of children who did not gain admission, but whose parents neglected their education, hoping to get nominations. The system has now been reformed, and the following is a statement of the result, received from the Rev. Charles Evans, the head master, in the course of the present month:—

“The governors have entirely abandoned the system of nomination. Admission to the Grammar School is obtained solely by a competitive examination, in which the candidates are grouped according to age, a certain number of vacancies being assigned to each group. Applicants for admission to the elementary schools register their names at the secretary's office, and are examined and admitted in their turn as vacancies occur. It would, I think be impossible to devise a fairer mode of admission than we have at present, and I feel convinced that if we could only obtain power to impose fees on all pupils in excess of those whom the charity can afford to educate gratuitously—that is, 500 in the grammar and 1,000 in the elementary schools, I should be able to make this institution in a few years educate three-fourths of the children of Birmingham. I regard the free admissions as a most powerful engine for this purpose. In a few years they would act like so many scholarships, stimulating and rewarding industry and merit throughout half-a-million of people. The surrender of the nomination system is more than equal in its beneficial effects to the re-foundation of the school. The experiment is doubtless being tried under favourable circumstances—a large town to operate on, a school with a high local reputation, and 600 free admissions—that is, about 160 prizes a year to stimulate industry and reward success. These free admissions will soon grow into honourable distinctions, each one of them indirectly educating, by the hopes of success which it will excite, fifteen or twenty boys. The competition is carefully graduated, the candidates being grouped according to age, and a certain number of vacancies being allotted to each group."

In the same manner, I believe, if you properly regulate the system of exhibitions you will produce the same effect on education throughout the country as, in all probability, will be made in the town of Birmingham. It is for powers to obtain these results that we now ask this House. But hon. Members who have paid attention to this subject may ask, are there not already constituted bodies that possess these powers? There is the Court of Chancery, and there is the Charity Commission. But to put a school into Chancery would be very much like what would be thought of putting oneself in Chancery. It is a process slow, cumbrous, and costly; besides the Court of Chancery is not adapted to such educational work. It is the business of that Court to interpret—to form a new scheme by the interpretation of the will of the founder; and when they interpret it, it is often not according to the wants of this age, but according to the letter in which these wants were defined at the time of the foundation. We need not be surprised if this interpretation often varies. Then, there is the Charity Commission, whose services as a body have been but little acknowledged by the country. It has been acting persistently, most laboriously, doing a great work, but it is in fact overworked, and its powers are insufficient. It is only in smaller charities that the Commissioners have the initiative. Besides neither they nor the Court of Chancery have power to consider one school in relation to another, or to attempt any system of re-distribution. True, the Commissioners have the power of submitting to this House special Bills, but this requires so much preparation, and even when the Bills have been prepared, so much watching that it is difficult to carry them through.

In fact, since the Commission was instituted, fifteen years since, they have only carried eighteen Bills, and only nine of those related to schools. I trust I have stated to the House some grounds why we ask these additional powers. But I do not for a moment deny that there are difficulties in the way. We thought it useless to attempt to meddle with the matter at all unless we took strong powers; and we might as well not trouble the House with any consideration of the subject as not to ask them to give the means by which we might really effect this work of reform. At the same time we felt we ought to fence these powers with every limitation that could, without interfering with their efficiency, be placed around them. We have endeavoured to do that, and I must leave it to the House to say whether we have or not succeeded. First of all, there are several limitations directly by the Act itself. Clause 11 provides that due regard must be paid to the educational interests of the locality in which the schools are situated, and as regards the locality, I believe that no educational endowment need be carried beyond the county in which it exists. Clause 12 meets existing interests of individuals—trustees, masters and boys. Clause 13 exempts several schools from this part of the Act. These are the direct exemptions by the Act, but they are not the limitations and checks on which I mostly rely. The real check upon the extensive powers we take and give is the method by which we intend to use them and the body to which we give them. We have fixed on that body which we think most likely to be under the greatest sense of responsibility to local and public interests. Public opinion is, after all, the best check in this country. The Government carefully considered the question as to the body to which it would be best to give the power we ask for in this Bill, and, after the closest consideration, it seemed wisest and safest that we should not shirk responsibility in this matter; but if the Government of the day undertook it, it is impossible for them to do it without special assistance. The whole means of procedure, then, are these—It is the Government of the day working by special help. The Commissioners, as described in the Bill, who are to propose the reforms, are merely officers assisting the Government, and the mode in which they are to work I will briefly describe. I believe some persons have thought that the Commissioners have in themselves the power to alter trusts and settle schemes; but the Commissioners alone have no power whatever. What the Commissioners are able to do is this, as provided in Clauses 26 to 45—They are instructed first to prepare schemes; next, having prepared and published these schemes, they are to send them down to the governing body of the school—the trustees and head master—care being taken also to publish them in the locality, so that parents and all interested may be informed of them. Then, two months are to be allowed, during which the Commissioners are ordered to receive suggestions and objections. They are then, if necessary, to go down to the locality, or send down an Assistant Commissioner to make local inquiry, and after the local inquiry is completed they are to make up their own minds as to what scheme is to be proposed, and the scheme thus finally proposed by them is to be submitted to the Educational Department of the Government—the Committee of Council, in which I have a subordinate place at present. The responsibility will rest on the Government whether they approve the scheme. If they do approve it they will lay it before Parliament, and it will become law, if not objected to, within forty days by either House. Everything the Commissioners do will be mere waste paper till it has passed the ordeal of Parliamentary assent. There will, therefore, be in every case ample opportunity to object to a scheme locally and in writing, to bring local influence to bear on the Government, and also on both Houses of Parliament, for the purpose, if necessary, of disallowing it. Hon. Members may feel some surprise that the machinery proposed by the Government deviates so widely from the recommendations of the Schools Inquiry Commission. No doubt, the Schools Inquiry Commission recommended a system of Provincial Boards. I was a member of that Commission, and we spent some time in considering that question; and I am still inclined to think the conclusion we came to was correct, if we could find such a constituency as we require; but the difficulty was to find such a constituency ready to our hands; and, indeed, the difficulty of finding a perfect local constituency was almost an insuperable one. There was the other suggestion of the School Inquiry Commission, that, failing such a constituency, Government must make their own choice of local nominees. But how could the Government be sure that any local constituency would really have the confidence of the locality? We have endeavoured to secure by the means we propose both local inquiry and the hearing of local objections to every scheme. There is another difference between our Bill and the recommendations of our Commissioners. They recommended not merely an immediate reform and re-organization of the schools, but that there should be a machinery at once constructed that should secure the future inspection of the schools. It is objected to this Bill that we ask for great powers to re-organize, without taking any security that the schools do not go back in a short time to their old level. I must acknowledge that if hereafter matters were left alone this would probably be the case; but we thought it was better to leave this question to solve for the future, and for this reason—not that there should be no power to see that the trustees do their duty, after new trustees are appointed, but because we shall be in a better position, after these reforms and re-organization are completed, to decide to whom these powers had better be given, and what powers are necessary. I propose, therefore, to leave this matter for the present to the Charity Commission, which has exercised its powers with great conscientiousness and care. But this is a temporary Bill for the reform and re-organization of Endowed Schools, and when it has been completed—in, perhaps, about four or five years—we shall be in a different position from what we are now, and we shall know what powers are necessary. Besides, we may hope that in that time a general system of education may arrive at something like a permanent position. We may expect that a change will be made in elementary education in two or three years, and when that is settled we may more completely define what the powers of the central government ought to be in regard to education, and how they ought to be exercised, and we may hope to find some means of creating local representation and a local constituency in educational matters. We have not followed another recommendation of the Commissioners. They recommended that in many towns, where the Endowed Schools do not meet the wants of the population, power should be given to make a rate for building municipal secondary schools, and for improving the existing buildings. We think we had better leave this also to the future. There is at present much difference of opinion with regard to the incidence of rates, but that also is a question which cannot long remain without some settlement.

The first part of the Bill — and, possibly, the most important part — is that for the reform and re-organization of the Endowed Schools. In schemes for this reform, it has been thought necessary to make one or two directions, especially concerning what is called the religious difficulty, but which I must say is far less of a difficulty than it is generally supposed to be. This question increases in difficulty in proportion as it applies to schools not frequented by our sons, and it is less in these Endowed Schools than in elementary schools, but still the difficulty exists. The hon. Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay) has put upon the Paper one or two Amendments to the clauses affecting the religious question. I do not doubt that he has looked at that portion of the Report of the Schools Inquiry Commission which shows how the recommendations were arrived at on which these clauses were founded. These recommendations were framed and signed by gentlemen having as strong a view on that question as it was possible to find. We had long debates upon it, and at last the Report was signed by the Dean of Chichester, Mr. Thorold, and Lord Lyttelton, and I would suggest to the hon. Baronet opposite that he should read the long memorandum by Lord Lyttelton giving a history of the process by which he was convinced that the Conscience Clause was a fair and just one. [Sir JOHN HAY: I have read the whole of it.] The principle of that clause is that all public schools must be open to the public. It is the pride and glory of these Endowed Schools that they are public; that means that they are open to the public; and it is our duty to see that that large portion of the public who are not members of the Church of England are not excluded from them. But while we give the greatest possible power and latitude to the parents to insure that they may share the advantage of these public schools without having their religious views interfered with, we have also borne this in mind, that the position of day and boarding schools is very different. The master of a day school has the care and superintendence of the boys while they are in the school, but the parent has the real charge of their moral and spiritual welfare. But when you send a boy to a boarding school you give the master the trust and responsibility of superintending the moral and religious instruction of the boy in your place, and you sympathize with the master when he says that he can only teach his boys the religious views that he himself holds. In the case of such boarding schools we propose that, at the wish of the parent who objects to the religious education in such school, day school education may be provided. I do not, however, wish hon. Members to suppose that this question of the Conscience Clause will ever get practically out of the walls of this House. All these Conscience Clause questions are matters of theory more than of practice. If the matter had been left to schoolmasters and parents to decide for themselves, without any attempt by others to interfere or tyrannize over their religious feelings, we should have found no difficulty in the matter. I have been called a supporter of the secular system of instruction, but there will be no more secular instruction in the operation of these Conscience Clauses as applied to Endowed Schools than there is at this moment. The principle of the Conscience Clause has, in fact, been adopted for years. It is included in every school scheme sanctioned by the Court of Chancery. In the other House of Parliament Lord Cranworth, in 1860, introduced a Bill which became law and which provided for the protection in Endowed Schools of the conscientious feelings of parents not in communion with the Church. Let me read the evidence of the present Lord Chancellor (then Sir William Page Wood) and Sir Roundell Palmer on this clause. The Lord Chancellor gave it as his opinion that the Conscience Clause would be introduced into Edward the VI.'s Schools.

"The Conscience Clause," he added, "is now inserted in every scheme without exception, unless there is a positive exclusion of any but Church teaching. It must not be merely a Church school; it must not be merely that the founder says 'I intend this as a Church school;' but he must say 'this is exclusively a Church school,' and if he does not say so the Conscience Clause is introduced."

The cases of exclusion the Lord Chancellor said were, he thought, not many. Sir Roundell Palmer used similar language. The hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Hay) is really fighting after the battle has been decided, because the thing has been done. Sir Roundell Palmer said—

"I think it is now well settled that in all cases where the Court settles a scheme—it being a Church school—it says religion should be taught according to the principles of the Established Church, but that no children whose parents, or persons standing in the place of parents, object, should be compelled to learn any formularies or to attend the public worship of the Church of England."

Again—

"The only case which would preclude the Conscience Clause would be if there was an express and positive direction that every child should be taught so and so; but the cases are so rare that one almost suspects where they do exist they are overlooked in practice."

We have thought it right to except from the operation of the Conscience Clause all purely denominational schools, whether Church of England or otherwise. It was supposed by some that, by using the word "denominational," I did not intend to include the Church of England schools, and by others that I did intend to include the Church schools, and to cast thereby some slur on the Church of England. I hope I shall be acquitted of any such designs. I have so often heard hon. Gentlemen opposite speak of denominational schools, and express their preference for a denominational system of instruction, that I thought it a natural word to designate schools whether connected with the Church or not. By the 25th clause we take a modified power to deal with certain charities that have not hitherto been regarded as educational. There was nothing that appeared to us more clear than that a vast number of these charities, instead of doing good, were doing harm. I cannot help thinking, therefore, that it would be an immense advantage that, while re-organizing our educational endowments by this Bill, we should not lose sight of those charities, especially in the neighbourhood of the schools, but that we should see whether they might not be made use of for purposes as good as those for which they were originally established. No doubt, any power of this kind ought to be used with great care. My hon. Friends the Members for the City of London (Mr. Crawford and Mr. Alderman Lawrence) have presented Petitions on this subject from City companies, whose lasting success has no doubt been very much owing to the way in which they have looked after their own interests, and the interests of those who have been committed to their charge. I trust, however, that they will find in the course we propose to take that the fear they entertain is groundless. But I should be sorry if this clause were not, in principle at least, accepted. What we propose is this. We thought that the Commissioners would have already so much to do that we ought not to put upon them the task of inquiry, and therefore we have, as it were, made use of the Charity Commissioners, and decided that no charities which are not educational are to be used for educational purposes unless recommended by the Charity Commissioners. If hon. Members will read the Report of the Charity Commissioners, issued only a day or two ago, I have no doubt they will admit with respect to many of those charities, that, if doing some good, at least a large amount of mischief is mixed with it. There is, for instance, Smith's charity, of £16,000 a year, a part of which is given to poor relations of Smith, who appear to be discovered year after year, though Smith died more than 200 years ago. Certainly, as far as I can discover, those who partake of this charity cannot be happier, but are a great deal poorer from their chance of receiving a portion of this bequest. But that is but a small part of the harm done. The Commissioners do not speak of it in terms of very strong condemnation, but the evidence they produce shows that more than half the income is given in doles in 209 different villages and towns, and it is impossible to read that evidence without feeling that in far the larger majority of cases those doles are pauperizing the places in which they are distributed. In fact, the statement of an incumbent of one of those places is, "I consider that a charity was never worse applied. I think its effects are demoralizing."

poned, we have not thought that the examination of the schools could be put off. I wish here briefly to explain why we do not feel that we could postpone the examination of the schools. Why is examination needed? Because it is the only way by which we can carry out the principle which, generally speaking, has been acknowledged by both sides of the House in education, as well as in other matters—namely, that we should pay by results if we possibly can. If results are rightly defined and the payments fitly arranged, so that in trying to obtain one result we do not sacrifice another, nothing is so good as such a system. But it is impossible for the State to adopt this system directly in dealing with Endowed Schools, because we are not the paymasters, for after all it is the parents who are the paymasters. The way we can get the masters paid by results is to guide the parents. Now what is the use of having culture in the country, and of the State being able to bring it to its aid, if we cannot help the poor farmer and tradesman by some such examination as would give them that guidance in the choice of schools which almost all acknowledge that they greatly want? Well, if we are to do that, we simply require that there should be a power possessed by some body or Board of examining all the scholars in all the Endowed Schools once a year. We say that we think that ought to be compulsory upon all whom we touch by the Bill, that is, upon all Endowed Schools except those which we already examine—that is to say, those in receipt of a public grant from the Privy Council—and the seven Public Schools for which we legislated last year. I am sorry that such a provision was not put into the Act relating to those Public Schools, because I believe it would have done them much good, and in that way an example would be set to other schools which show some reluctance to be classed side by side with schools that are their equals. But we found from every kind of inquiry there was another want, a want arising from this—that many masters are incompetent. To remedy this defect training schools for secondary education were suggested. We find that training schools in France have done great good, but upon the whole the Schools Inquiry Commission came to the conclusion that they would not recommend them, because their establishment would give too much power to the Government and too little scope for diversity of thought and the free action of opinion. But the Schools Inquiry Commission did come to the conclusion that the request which private masters made—that certificates of competence should be given by some competent body—was by no means unreasonable. We, therefore, take power to intrust the granting of these certificates to what we regard as a competent body. What shall this body be? You must remember that it is a Board or a Council that is to be formed, not for the purposes of inspection or seeing that the law is carried out and that the trustees fulfil their duty, but simply for the purpose of examining and informing parents of these two things—what masters have to teach and how these masters do teach. The body to whom we have thought it right to intrust this power is the body that was recommended by the Schools Inquiry Commission—an Educational Council of twelve members, six to be chosen by the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and London, and six by the Government. It was thought that the older Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, from their distinguished history and from the position which they had held and still hold in public estimation, and the younger University of London, from what it had been able to do in so short a time, would win the confidence of the country; and I must say this, I am sure from inquiries I have made that the two older Universities are day by day more and more looked up to from all parts of the country as great national seats of learning from which we might hope for assistance in a reform such as this. But we thought there ought to be other men of learning and experience in teaching on the Board, and therefore power is given to the Government to name as many as are to be named by the Universities. I must say that some such Educational Council would be useful, not only for thus examining scholars and giving certificates, but, in all probability, for counselling the Government and the country upon educational matters. It is by means of this Council that we hope to make this Bill have its effect upon private and proprietary, as well as Endowed Schools. After all that may be done for the improvement of Endowed Schools, we cannot rely on them alone for the education we desire to give; we must look to private schools also. We have seen several of the best private schoolmasters, and we find a general desire among them to obtain acknowledgment as a profession. While therefore we have thought it right to compel Endowed Schools to submit to examination, we have also felt that it would be desirable to offer the same examination and certificate to private schoolmasters, believing that the best will try to obtain certificates and will court examination, and that those who shun examination and certificates will themselves be shunned by the public. But we are obliged, in fairness, to make the conditions in the case of private schools the same as with regard to Endowed Schools. I have said, in the beginning of my remarks, that I have had an opportunity of hearing various objections made to several clauses of this Bill. I have had conferences with several of the best masters of Endowed Schools and others, but I am glad to be able to state that I have heard no objection to the principle of the Bill. I have heard no objection to the object at which we are trying to arrive, although I have heard doubts expressed with respect to some of the provisions, and especially as to the Council of Examination. But so far as I can make out these doubts have arisen from misapprehension of our intentions, and I cannot help thinking that if these objections turn out well founded it will be very easy to introduce amendments to remove them. A doubt has been expressed whether in establishing an examining body we did not intend to dictate to the schools the subjects of instruction. We have no such intention. Some have supposed we intended to prevent the Council from acknowledging University examinations, but we have no such intention. Then, again, objection has been taken to the mode in which we make the examination self-supporting. I must say one word on the question of expense. The expense of reforming and re-organizing the schools is to be paid for out of the Consolidated Fund; but the expense of examination will not be paid for in that way, on the ground that, though the country may undertake the expense of the task of reform, it cannot undertake that of conducting the examinations. Another objection that has been made is that it is unfair to exclude the Cathedral Schools from the operation of this Bill. That is a matter which, no doubt, may fairly be discussed. The clause in which we arrange for the dismissal of masters is supposed by some to have an effect and an intention which was never contemplated. Again, I have heard complaints of our definition of educational endowments; and I may at once frankly state what, in my opinion, that definition ought to include, and what, I believe, it does include. It includes all schools for boys and girls for general education, and all exhibitions into and out of those schools. But if it be supposed to include Colleges, I can only say that it is not intended to do so. This, and similar points are, after all, not questions affecting the second reading, and I think they are matters in which the Government may fairly hope to have the assistance of the House generally, and that of Members on both sides, in amending the Bill if it may be necessary. It has been so often said that Bills of this nature are not party Bills that I hardly like to repeat so trite a truism; but I may say, that although this may have been called a strong Government, with a great majority at its back, I believe there would be no chance of our carrying a measure of this kind, affecting so many different interests, if it were a party measure. We put it therefore before both sides of the House in the full expectation that from both sides we shall receive help in perfecting and amending it; and if it should be thought that that help could best be given by a Select Committee like that to which the Public Schools Bill of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Walpole) was referred—not, of course, for the purpose of hearing evidence, which would entirely put an end to the Bill—the Government will be quite willing to assent to that course. I will only, Sir, make one or two very brief remarks before I sit down. I feel that this is a difficult question, and one with which I am by no means competent to deal. I could wish that it had fallen into the hands of one who possessed that culture which it has not been my good fortune to receive. But I trust that this measure will not suffer on account of any deficiencies on my part. The work before us is a great one, and having begun that work, I hope the House will do its best to bring it to completion this Session. Depend upon it, this matter of secondary education is one which we cannot afford to leave in its present state. To take only the lowest ground, the competition, commercially, which we have to encounter with other countries, should make us lose no time in legislating upon it. I will take the case of my own borough. I do not know that it is worse—I believe it to be better—than many other places in this respect; but it offers us a very practical illustration. Bradford is a large manufacturing town—the centre of a great manufacturing district; it exports goods to other countries, at least quite as much as the neighbouring towns, and there is no reason why the middleman, the merchant, the person who arranges the process of exchange from the manufacturer, should not be an Englishman. He never, or scarcely ever, is. He is almost always a German in the case of the German or even of the French trade. It is the same at Manchester and, I believe, at many other places. Why is this? Because the education given to the boy who leaves school at sixteen or seventeen on the Continent at once fits him for these pursuits, while our own education for this purpose is deficient. There is a great cry just now for technical education; but it is necessary, in speaking of technical education, to avoid the error of putting the cart before the horse. We must give in our schools—what is given on the Continent—the groundwork and elements of science, before technical education can be of much use. Again, there is one fact bearing on the events of the last year or two which I think ought to make one of the objects contemplated in this Bill seem very important. We have brought new social forces into play that must affect the interests of the country. We have conferred more power upon the labouring class. Who are likely to lead that class? Those belonging to it who have most talent. Therefore, it is surely most important that we should provide the means by which boys of talent among the working class should grow up fitted by culture to use their talents aright. One word more as to the founders. We are told that by reforms we desecrate their memory; but were they here—I almost wish they were—they would help us. They were the reformers of their day. They would be the reformers of this. They would call it a cruel mockery of their benevolent intentions to sacrifice the spirit of their gifts to the letter in which they are worded. And looking at the time when many of these foundations were endowed, there is a special fitness in our now setting to work to give them new life and strength by adapting them to present wants. Many of the richest and most important of these schools date back to the glorious Tudor times, when England was waking up to take the foremost part in the march of Christian civilization. Who were these founders? And why did they endow these foundations? They were men who were possessed by the new ideas of the age; they were fighting for industry against feudalism and for equal laws against class privileges; for free thought against bigotry; and knowing that knowledge and education and culture were on their side, they wished, by providing for future education, to procure champions for their cause in the future. And now, again, new ideas have power—this new central idea, bringing with it many others, that no special class is to guide the destinies of England—that not the aristocracy, nor the bourgeoisie, no, nor yet the working class, is to govern England—but that England for the future is in truth to be self-governed; all her citizens taking their share, not by class distinction, but by individual worth. And what is this but England carrying out in her far better way that idea which the great Napoleon strove by force to realize; that one principle which supported him spite of all his errors and crimes, La carrière ouverte aux talens, or, as Carlyle translates it, “the tools to him who can use them.” Thanks to these founders, we have, at this moment, a great opportunity of helping to the realization of this idea—of yet again making our past minister to our future; and in the confidence that the House will not let slip this opportunity, I submit to them this Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

which had characterized all his long and very interesting speech. At the same time, he did not think he should have even his right hon. Friend's dissent when he said that the very fact of his speech having been so long and so full in its explanations was the best justification of the considerable alarm which the Bill had occasioned, and he accordingly welcomed and claimed the promise of referring it to a Select Committee. The fact was, that the Bill was not self-explanatory. The scheme drawn out by his right hon. Friend in his speech was the scheme recommended in the blue book, he might say the multitudinous blue books of the Royal Commissioners. But on the face of the Bill there was no antecedent necessity that the recommendations of that Royal Commission should be given effect to in one single particular. What was the Bill, taken briefly? Why, that three anonymous gentlemen, forming an all-powerful triumvirate, should be appointed by the direct exercise of the Prerogative, and that that triumvirate, in an absurdly short space of time, should have power to initiate, to reform, to alter schemes, subvert constitutions, and re-cast the whole arrangements of the numerous Endowed Schools of England. He did not for a moment say that was his right hon. Friend's intention, for he had disclaimed it in emphatic terms; but it must be remembered that the animus imponentis was not necessarily what governed any law, and that there was enough in the Bill to excite the apprehension which it had raised, that such might be its practical working. His right hon. Friend said to the good schools—"Don't be afraid, our Bill does not touch you; it is merely for the bad schools." But, in fact, it did touch the good schools, as well as the bad. It swept in—with some named exceptions—every Endowed School, great or small, more than thirty years old. It gave power to the triumvirate—whose names did not appear in the Bill—to frame schemes, to send inquiries up and down throughout the country, and to arraign and depose the trustees of the most flourishing, just as much as of the deadest and most paralyzed school. It was true that that power was fenced with sundry provisions, and sundry appeals were proposed in behalf of the existing governing bodies; but they all knew how difficult it was for any body of men, however intelligent, who had only a parochial or even a county knowledge of business, to grapple with that higher, finer, and more dexterous experience of administration which the official mind and official habits give to men. And, certainly, to borrow a familiar phrase, on the face of it the power of the Government in that Bill seemed over-weighted. It was over-weighted because it gave to that Commission so sudden and abrupt a power of initiation, without a preliminary day of grace during which the schools themselves might be invited to tender their own scheme. And in the Select Committee, which he gladly welcomed, when they took to re-casting the Bill, he took it for granted that the absurdly narrow space of time appended for that purpose would be altered. In his opinion a requisition ought to be sent to all the Endowed Schools within a certain period, inviting them to send in their own schemes of reform, which might be proposed either by the governing body, or by the masters, or by the community, for whose benefit the school professes to exist. If this were done the Commissioners would be made acquainted with the present mind of the schools and of the locality, and a great deal of the alarm which at present existed would be dissipated. He also thought that the names of the Commissioners ought to be inserted in the Bill. When the Public Schools Bill was under consideration there were discussions both in that House and in another place as to the names of the Commissioners, not from any personal motives, but because a reasonable conviction was entertained that on the personnel of the Commissioners must depend much of the tone and character of the reforms they proposed. In the nomination of the Commissioners there would be something like a guarantee, which did not now exist, as to the moderation or the radicalism—he did not use the word in an offensive sense—of the reforms proposed to be carried out. Then, it might be fairly claimed that the number of the Commissioners should not be so small as three. No doubt, fiscal reasons were to be considered in regard to this matter, but it should never be forgotten that efficiency ought to be preferred to economy. The present Government had introduced the precedent of unpaid high officials in the Treasury and elsewhere, and why, then, should they not include in this Commission the names of some eminent educationists who had the means and the desire to give their services to the country gratuitously? If the Commissioners few in numbers, and not impossibly men of one idea, acting from theory rather than experience, should grade schools according to their mere geographical position, a great grievance would often be occasioned. As an instance, he would mention the Free Grammar School at Cranbrook, with which he was well acquainted. At the date of the election of the late master only five or six town boys attended it, and for all reasonable purposes it was absolutely defunct; but a fortunate choice of a new master having been made in him, that gentleman, who died about three years ago, raised the institution to the position of a small public school, which it maintains under his successor, elected out of a numerous list of candidates. There were about eighty boys there at the present time, mostly boarders, sons of gentlemen of high position, partly town boys, sons several of them of small tradesmen, and they were taught high classical subjects, with the good-will of both classes of parents, while at the same time a good modern department co-existed. But under the geographical arrangements of the present Bill this school would, in all probability, be graded as a second-class school, in consequence of the proximity to Tunbridge. Such a proceeding would, however, be unfair to the people of Cranbrook, who liked to have an opportunity of giving their children a classical education. This case offered an apt illustration of the evils which might result from schemes being sent down cut-and-dried from an office in London. In the adjacent parish with which he was acquainted there was a school with a pretentious constitution, but without either master or scholars, the endowment being only £35 a year. This, of course, ought to be swept off the face of the earth as a separate school. His right hon. Friend had strongly insisted on the necessity of the clauses relating to what was termed the "Conscience Clause," and urged that the battle on that point had been already either won or lost, according to the views which people held in reference to that subject, as the Court of Chancery had for some time imposed a Conscience

Clause on all Endowed Schools which came within its scope. But it was not the bare question of the Conscience Clause that created so much alarm in the minds of many excellent persons in the country when they read that portion of the Bill. It was not a question as to the admission of Dissenting boys to the benefits of education, without calling upon them to take part in the dogmatic teaching, which they objected to; that which led many persons to be alarmed was the loose way in which certain clauses of the Bill were drawn. They feared that if those clauses passed into law many schools which had been hitherto Church schools for all practical purposes would be gradually metamorphosed into Dissenting schools, and that, on the other hand (for he desired fair play) Dissenting schools might be changed into Church schools by a dexterous manipulation in the choice of the governing bodies. There was no objection to opening the doors of Church schools to scholars of all denominations; but, at the same time, if a school had had a dominant denominational character, either from its commencement, or for a long time past, that character ought to be sufficiently preserved. On this point the master of an old grammar school, characterized as "very satisfactory" in the blue book, had written to him in the following terms:—

"I have no remark to make on the clauses which relate to religious instruction, for this reason—under the new scheme given by the Master of the Rolls in 1855 for the regulation of this school it is ordered that religious teaching be on the principles of the Church of England, to which all the scholars are entitled unless a parent gives in writing an objection to the same. I have been head master of this school nearly fifteen years, and have never received a single notice of objection to the course of religious instruction all that time until last week—that is, since the introduction of this Bill into the House of Commons, and I believe that emanated from the bidding of a body in London which concerns itself in this matter. Since I have been master I have had upwards of 350 boys in the school of various religious opinions, and among the present scholars are a son of a Baptist minister and a son of a Wesleyan minister whom I am preparing for Cambridge University."

He contended that this school ought to be allowed to go on in the same manner as hitherto, and no risk ought to be run of impressing any "body in London" or elsewhere with the idea that they might, by means of a little successful agitation, substitute for the Conscience

Clause the substitution of all distinctive religious teaching in any school. He held in his hand another communication from the head master of a large school. It was a distinctive Church of England denominational school, and as such these clauses did not weigh upon it; and as also it was founded within the last thirty years it did not come under the provisions of the measure. His correspondent, therefore, was not actuated by any personal feeling in the matter, and, moreover, he was a strong Liberal in politics. Nevertheless, this gentleman expressed the greatest alarm at these clauses, for fear they should ultimately lead to the obliteration of all religious teaching in nearly all the schools in the country. He had, he thought, given sufficient reason to show that the Select Committee must re-consider this portion of the Bill, in order sufficiently to protect in a liberal and comprehensive spirit the religious colour of each school wherever any had been impressed upon it by long traditional usage. He wished, moreover, to point out that the Bill was not merely formally, but really, divided into two parts, and it might be a question whether the latter or permanent portion, might not be advantageously postponed till next year. He ought to mention that another very distinguished head master, presiding over one of the most successful of modern schools, Wellington College, who had written to him, objected to the clause which required a certificate of fitness to be obtained from all persons being desirous of being appointed masters at schools other than the exceptional seven Public Schools. He was himself from personal association anxious to sustain the credit of those old foundations. But he was still more anxious for fair play, and he desired to give an equal start to the new Public Schools which had challenged them to an honourable rivalry, and to those distinguished ancient Grammar Schools, which were actively bidding for places in the front rank. Now, if Harrow, Eton, and Winchester might select their masters from the tripos list at Cambridge or the class list at Oxford, it was unfair to require University men, if chosen masters of Wellington or Bradfield College, or Tunbridge, Ipswich, or Uppingham School, to go down provided with papers signed by the Educational Board in London. However, he contended, ought in every case to be a certificate. He was not prepared to condemn the examination as proposed by the Bill, but he must at the same time point out that they would involve a risk of cramming, not indeed in the great, but in the smaller and private schools, which would be tempted to regard the good report of the examiners from the profit side; and as to the mode of conducting the examinations, he thought it would be much more effectual if an Assistant Commissioner were sent, from time to time, to present himself at a school when he was least expected and see how things were actually going on. Such unpremeditated examinations would test the working capacity of the master, as no cut-and-dried questions from London could do. If, then, the second part of the Bill were to be passed in the present Session—for which he saw no reason—the whole question relating to the examinations would require to undergo careful revision. There were other points in the Bill on which he should like to comment, but he would abstain from saying more with respect to it on that occasion. He had said enough to show that, urgent as the need of reform in the Endowed Schools was, and able and straightforward as was the statement of his right hon. Friend, yet there were deficiencies in the measure which fully justified those who were most anxious for a thorough reformation in not accepting it precisely as it stood on the ipse dixit of the Executive. With a view to their amendment, he would readily accept the Select Committee which the right hon. Gentleman had offered.

MR. JAMES HOWARD said, the right hon. Member who introduced the Bill before the House had stated that during the inquiry made by the Commissioners a great number of ill conducted schools and badly managed endowments had been brought to light, but that some really well managed and good schools had been met with. The right hon. Gentleman further stated that whilst the trustees of the bad schools had not been near him, the governing bodies of the good schools had sent up deputations which had waited upon him; that whilst the badly managed schools would be reformed and dealt with, the good schools had nothing whatever to fear from the operation of this Endowed

Schools Bill. He (Mr. Howard) was glad to hear these remarks fall from the right hon. Member, for in the borough he had the honour to represent in that House one of these good schools did exist, and some 1,600 children were receiving therein an excellent education. The introduction of the Bill before the House had filled the minds of the trustees with anxiety if not with alarm, and he was therefore glad to hear that such a school had nothing to fear from the operation of the Bill. Nevertheless, he (Mr. Howard) was anxious on one point. Under the provision of the Bill three Commissioners are to be appointed to frame measures for the future disposal and management of the vast number of charitable endowments in the kingdom. The duties of these Commissioners will be of the most grave and responsible character. What he therefore desired to know was who was to nominate them? and he would also ask whether this House is to have any voice in the election or rejection of these important officers? He believed that it would be a great national disaster should gentlemen be appointed to this office who had imbibed educational hobbies or crotchets, or who are under the influence of narrow or stereotyped views for dealing with so great and comprehensive a subject as the future education of the great middle class of the country. He gathered from a perusal of the Schools Inquiry Commission, that some members of that Commission inclined to a considerable extension of boarding schools—indeed desired a complete net-work of boarding schools similar to our great leading Public Schools. As this Bill is founded upon the Report of this Commission perhaps he should not be considered out of order if he made just one or two remarks, and only one or two, upon the subject. It did not appear to his mind that a large extension of boarding schools is what the country most requires. Those who can afford to avail themselves of boarding schools are quite capable of taking care of themselves. He would rather devote a large portion of the funds which will accrue, should this Bill become law, to the establishment of superior day schools, and thus bring home to the very doors of the middle classes and place within their reach a cheap yet superior education. There are vast numbers of parents of the upper and middle class who had a liberal education themselves, and who naturally desire similar advantages for their children—but from their straitened circumstances they are altogether unable to afford the expense of sending their sons to a boarding school. Hence the necessity of bringing as it were home to them superior day schools in which a liberal education would be imparted at a small cost. This view of the subject had been forced upon him from the fact of his having been for twenty years past a trustee of one of the largest of our Endowed Schools, and of the advantages of which thousands of families of the class he and the right hon. Gentleman had alluded to had availed themselves. He (Mr. Howard) considered the Bill open to objections in many of its details and trusted that the Government would consent to the course recommended and refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: It was, Sir, with great pleasure and satisfaction I listened to the statement of my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Committee of Council (Mr. W. E. Forster). He has placed it, I think, beyond dispute that the condition of Endowed Schools in this country is such as to call for some strong remedy; and although I am not prepared to say that I assent to every point in his Bill, yet there is, I am sure, every disposition on both sides of the House to turn to the best advantage those endowments which have been left by our forefathers. My right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) presented a Petition from his constituents to-night in favour of the Bill, but he did not, I observed, express his concurrence in its prayer; nor am I surprised that such was the case, for the right hon. Gentleman has written a pamphlet on the subject, which shows that it is one upon which there must be some slight difference of opinion among the Members of the Government. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman is, as far as I understand, of opinion that with all the buttresses which we may build up to strengthen our endowments we are simply endeavouring to prop that which in itself is pernicious. That, however, is a matter which I shall leave my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Committee of Council to settle with his right hon. Colleague, who, although he presented a Petition in support of the Bill, absented himself during the delivery of a speech from the Treasury Bench which would no doubt have given him very great pain. I wish now to say a word with respect to the Endowed School charities, where, for instance, there may be an endowment under £100 a year. In those cases the Commissioners are to have much greater power than in others; but there are many instances in which such schools are admirable, and in which the endowment of £100 a year constitutes the least part of the advantage derived from them by either the masters or the scholars, for although the endowment might have brought the school into existence, it, in the main, contributes little or nothing towards its support. The most irresponsible power will be vested in the Commissioners in regard to such schools, for they will have a less power of appeal than that which will be possessed by schools with large endowments which might not have attained to the same degree of practical efficiency. Now, in my opinion, the schools with endowments under £100 a year ought to have some protection in this respect. There is also another point which requires, I think, to be discussed at some length. I allude to the question how for the purposes of the Bill those small charities are to be dealt with which are mentioned in the 25th clause. Anyone who has seen the working of those charities must come to the same conclusion as my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) stated in his speech to-night—that they are not only in many instances useless, but often pernicious. But, at the same time, they were in the main intended for particular classes. I have read an account of the use made of Mr. Henry Smith's bequests. A gentleman with £400 a year has, I think, got part of them, and it is quite clear that that is not the sort of poor relation who was contemplated by the donor. He meant his bequest for the benefit of the poor, but this measure, it appears to me, takes some of those funds from the destitute poor, and applies them practically to the purposes of middle-class education. There are plenty of uses to which they may be applied with the view of benefiting those for whose advantage they were originally intended; and I am sure the middle classes do not themselves desire, if they are only so applied, to appropriate them in any sense to their own use. In the main, it is no doubt desirable that parents, where they have the means, should see after the education of their own children; but after all the State has a duty thrown upon it by the trusteeship of these endowments—a state of things which is recognized in the powers intrusted to the Charity Commissioners. They would not be able to undertake the great work proposed by this Bill, and I agree with the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) that it would be most desirable, as well in the interest of the public as of those who are to be dealt with by the Bill—especially the head masters of these schools, many of whom are of the very highest character and possess a reputation not inferior to that of the head masters of the great Public Schools—that the names of the Commissioners should be inserted in the Bill. It would be very hard for the masters to be subjected to the control of Commissioners whom they could not look up to and respect, and as the names of the Commissioners appeared in the Bill of last year, I do not see any distinction between the two cases, or any reason why these names should not appear in this Bill also. When the Bill has received the sanction of the Legislature, the masters will thereby receive a guarantee that their interests will be properly looked after by men who have passed the ordeal of a scrutiny by both Houses of Parliament. Many points of detail have been submitted to me, but I do not think it desirable to discuss them at this stage of the Bill. They will be considered by the Select Committee, and I should not be justified in trespassing upon the House by adverting to them now. I will only say in conclusion that I shall be happy to give all the assistance in my power to the Bill in its future stages, so as to make it a measure which will be in accordance, not only with the feelings of the founders, but also with the best interests of the country.

Mr. CRAWFORD said, that probably no Member had received more communications from his constituents respecting this Bill than he had, and he entered the House this evening feeling a good deal of alarm on the subject, but that alarm had been considerably relieved by the speech of his right hon.

Friend the Vice President of the Council. The City Companies had, perhaps, a greater interest than any other in this measure, for large funds and estates had been placed in the hands of nearly all of them for educational purposes; and he might add that no body of men had of late years been more ready to accommodate themselves to the advanced ideas of the age, and to place these institutions on a sound and useful footing. The Skinners' Company administered one of the largest and most successful grammar schools in the country: the Haberdashers' Company had five of those schools, and the City of London School, established under the authority of an Act of Parliament, passed rather more than thirty years ago, would become subject to the provisions of this Bill. Now there was no single institution of the country which had had such an effect on the education of its neighbourhood as this school; and since 1847 or 1848 no fewer than seventy-four young men brought up there had taken high honours at the Universities, especially at Cambridge, some of them having been Senior Wranglers. The authorities of this and other City schools had been considerably alarmed by this Bill, but he accepted the statement of his right hon. Friend that such schools were rather intended to be held up as models than to be altered and re-administered by the Commissioners. With regard to Clause 25, which proposed to deal with such loans as some of the City Companies were in the habit of advancing to young and deserving men, he was told that these loans had been of inestimable advantage in many cases, and that there were persons in the City who owed their prosperity to the help they had received in this way from their own Companies. He should be sorry, therefore, if this power of lending money were withdrawn, for the Companies were the best judges of the claims of those to whom their bounty could be most beneficial.

MR. GOLDNEY congratulated the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council on his clear and able statement, but could not help pointing out that, while the speech was in accordance with the recommendations of the Commissioners the Bill was not. The Commissioners said that Parliament should lay down the general principles to be adopted in dealing with these endowments, and that the aid of local authority and local knowledge should be sought. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman adopted that view, and he (Mr. Goldney) contended that the Bill should lay down certain principles upon which the endowments should be dealt with. As the measure was framed the Commissioners, without hearing any one, would exercise absolute power over seven-eighths of the 3,000 Endowed Schools that existed in this country. Where the school income was more than £100 a year the course was plain, but in cases where that income was £100 a year or under, the 37th clause shut out any appeal from the persons affected or any control by Parliament. If the principles laid down by the right hon. Gentleman were good, they should be stated in the Bill itself. The statement of the right hon. Gentleman, with regard to the admission to the Endowed Schools by a species of competitive examination was, in his opinion, very unsatisfactory. Competitive examinations might be all very well for boys of thirteen, fourteen, or fifteen years of age; but he feared that if younger children were tested by it all the stupid ones would be excluded from free admission to the Endowed Schools. The stupid children ought to be educated as well as the clever ones, and some provision ought to be made to secure the benefit to all. This was one of the subjects well worthy the consideration of a Select Committee.

MR. WINGFIELD BAKER said, he was desirous to see an additional principle introduced into the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council had observed that good schools had nothing to fear from the provisions of the Bill; but if that were so it would be desirable to have the matter expressly stated in some provision of the Bill. It had been sought by legislation, especially by that of last year, to establish a particular standard of education, to which it was sought to elevate those schools which had not yet attained to it. There were many schools which were now gradually rising—schools that were almost equal to the excepted schools, both in the character of the education they imparted and the number of scholars they educated; and considering the admirable management under which those schools were placed; he could not see why the Legislature should violently interpose its interference. He would first refer to one of those schools of which he had particular knowledge, as he was one of its governing body—he meant the King's School at Sherborne. That school had attracted the attention of the Commissioners, who stated that the character of the education there was as good as that at any Public School, and they also spoke highly of the school discipline, arrangements, and nature of the building. The school promised to become one of the great Public Schools of the country. There were many other schools which he might include in the same category, including Uppingham, Bromsgrove, Highgate, Tunbridge, Ipswich, Leeds, and Manchester. The number of boys at Sherborne was 257, whereas the number at Westminster was 148; at the Charterhouse, 138; and at Shrewsbury, 185. It was said that some of these schools were excepted because they were connected with cathedral towns; but was that the case with Eton, with Rugby, or with the Charterhouse? This test therefore was not to be relied upon. Why should schools thus favourably reported on, although of ancient foundation, not be allowed to go on under existing authority? And why should a percentage be exacted on their profits for advice they did not want? While he admitted that in several respects the Bill was an admirable one, he thought that this was a subject which should insure the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, and he (Mr. Wingfield Baker) would ask him to re-consider the subject with a view of placing the class of schools he had mentioned on a footing with those which had been singled out for special favour.

MR. CHARLEY said, he would be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would explain why it was that, under the 18th clause, it was proposed to abolish in all cases the jurisdiction of the ordinary over schools. There were gentlemen—and he said so without meaning offence—on whom the very name of a Bishop acted as a scarlet rag on a bull, but why should the connection between the ordinary and a Church of England school be severed? Such a provision might be satisfactory to the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield), who thought that Bishops were only old tutors and schoolmasters, but he (Mr.

Mr. Wingfield Baker

Charley) held them in sufficient regard to induce him to wish to see the old association maintained. The hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr Beresford Hope) had described this as part of a gigantic scheme for secularizing educational endowments, and other persons entertained the same fear. The 16th clause gave power to appoint persons to introduce schemes, and men of any or no religion might be of the governing body. The Commissioners were to be the nominees of the Liberal Government, and were to constitute a tribunal which was to be a substitute for the Court of Chancery, because it would act more in accordance with the spirit of the age; and might not that require that these schools should not be Church of England schools? Power was given to any governing body to apply the 16th clause to Church of England schools, and a governing body meant a majority of the governing body; which would be entirely under the control of the Commissioners, whom he could only describe as a triumvirate armed with despotic powers to do away with any existing corporation.

MR. LOCKE said, he was connected with the governing body of Tonbridge School, which had been referred to, and he quite agreed with his hon. Friend (Mr. Wingfield Baker) that where it could be shown that the governing bodies had discharged their duties efficiently they should not be interfered with. Tonbridge School was founded in the reign of Edward VI., and was placed under the Skinners' Company by Sir Andrew Judd, its founder. From that time to this the company had conducted the school to the satisfaction of all those interested in it. The inhabitants of Tonbridge were perfectly satisfied, so was the head master, and both were extremely anxious that the governing body should not be interfered with. The Commissioners, under Clause 10, were empowered to introduce into the governing body of any school a certain number of governors hitherto altogether unconnected with the school, and who could have no personal knowledge of its wants. The governors of this school were extremely jealous as to the exercise of this power; and it would be well to ascertain, in the first instance, whether any charge had been made against the school, before such a power were given to the Commissioners to do away with the present government without any sufficient reason being assigned for such procedure. He thought his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council had made a mistake in this instance. He was sure that many other schools were entitled to make the same objection. The right hon. Gentlemen might say that if he made exception in the case of these schools, others would demand to be excepted, but the Commissioners themselves had pointed out that there were nine or ten schools of such a kind that they ought not to be made subject to the provisions of this Bill. With regard to the seven schools introduced into the Act of last Session, the governors were in the first instance to make a scheme for themselves; and the same power, he thought, should be given to Tonbridge and other schools in that category. He believed the governors of all those schools would be most anxious to extend their utility, and were quite prepared to do so. He therefore hoped his right hon. Friend would not be afraid of introducing into the Bill, as exceptions, the ten schools the masters of which had demanded an exemption from its operation. Tonbridge School had nearly 200 boys in attendance; the school, the chapel, and other buildings, were all that could be desired; and very much had been done by the governors within the last four or five years. It was only forty or fifty years since the funds of the school had very much increased; and previous to that time the expenses of the school had been borne by the Company itself. He admitted that there were many cases in which this Bill would be found most useful in its operation; there were no doubt a certain number of monstrosities, as described by his right hon. Friend, extremely startling, and he thanked him for introducing the Bill on that account. It was necessary for the purpose of removing such evils, but it should be confined to those schools which absolutely required amendment, and he thought it would cause misunderstanding and heartburning if the trustees of those schools which had been well managed were dealt with so summarily. Nine schools selected by the Commissioners as schools of a special character should be excepted from the Bill, and he asked that if the Tonbridge School could not be excepted, the governors should at least be allowed to make out their own scheme in the first instance, and to submit it, if necessary, to the Commissioners. He agreed with the opinion that the names of the Commissioners should be inserted in the Bill, because these three men would be able to re-model and deal with all the Endowed Schools just as they chose. That might be all very good, but it might also be very bad, and very great evils might arise from their proceedings. He looked with some dismay upon the enormous expense to which the Public Schools might be put in appealing, first to the Privy Council and then to the House. If the House agreed to give them a scheme, it must be embodied in a Bill which must be referred to a Select Committee, and then counsel must be engaged at an enormous expense to conduct it through the Committee.

MR. WHITBREAD said, that the case as it affected the Grammar School of Bedford was that all the world wanted to put its hands into the pocket of the school, and that when it was prevented it said the governors were bad men and wanted to obstruct education. The Members representing towns containing Endowed Schools did not think it right to stop the progress of the Bill, although it was clear that if they had banded themselves together they would have been able to offer very considerable obstruction to its passing. He would, for his own part, admit that there was a great deal in the measure that would be very beneficial, and that there was much that really needed reform in some of these grammar schools. What the governors of the Bedford School desired was to deal directly with the Vice President of the Council and the Government. His right hon. Friend's views on these topics he knew, but he did not know the views of the Special Commissioners. It was shown clearly that the great want was of schools for persons of small fixed incomes, and especially of cheap boarding-schools for the smaller farmers, and no county had met this want in a more magnificent manner than Bedfordshire. What his constituents objected to was the fear of what a Special Commission might propose. There should be an opportunity to schools that were doing their duty well to prepare a scheme and prove their case, before anything was forced upon them by the Commissioners.

The Bedford Grammar School was free to all the world, and the only limit to the education given was the limit of accommodation in the shape of houses for families in the town. There could, however, be no extension of this accommodation while the present uncertainty prevailed. He hoped his right hon. Friend would assure the House that schools that were doing a great work should, in the first instance, propose their own plan.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, the remarks of the last two speakers indicated the quarter from which the storm was likely to blow. The problem of combining central superintendence with local activity was one of the most difficult to realize, and it would be well not to be too confident that if these large powers were given to the Commissioners, they would be exercised to the satisfaction of those who would be subjected to the inspection. What he objected to was, that there was no discrimination with regard to these schools. Good and bad were alike to be inspected, and what was more, they would have to pay for it. He trusted that the scheme of central supervision would be carefully investigated. He concurred in what had been said by the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney), as to a strictly competitive examination. Although he approved of the system of competitive examination, he thought it was highly necessary that the attention of the schoolmaster should be given to those boys who, wanting the abilities of others, evinced a praiseworthy desire to advance in their studies.

MR. LEA said, as a new Member, he could not help expressing his feeling of anxiety that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. He had always had an idea that referring a Bill to one of those Committees was very apt to shelve it altogether, or to postpone it to another Session. He should be very sorry to see such a course pursued in this case. When, the other night, he heard the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) express his general approval of the measure, he (Mr. Lea) was very glad to hear that there would be no organized party opposition. One or two hon. Members to-night had called the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the manner in which the Bill affected schools of a higher class. He should like to do so to schools of a lower grade. Those schools mostly belonged to Nonconformist bodies, and were supported chiefly by voluntary contributions and subscriptions, by the small fees—say, 2*d.* or 3*d.* a week—of the children, and also by small endowments, which brought them within the scope of the Bill.—[“No!”]—He believed he was right in the statement he made. He had carefully studied the Bill, and he found no clause exempting those schools when they were in receipt of no Government grant. Of their number he knew nothing; but he did know that such schools did exist, and the clause whereby a fine of 5 per cent was laid on the fees of the children would be felt a very heavy burden, and would have either to be deducted from the income of the schoolmaster or schoolmistress, or to come from the small funds of the school. Those who had had the management of such schools knew well the difficulty that existed in keeping a school in a proper state of efficiency. If enough money could not be raised under the 25th section, he thought the expenses of the Educational Council should come out of the Consolidated Fund. Another point that he wished to allude to was the fact that the Educational Council would have the power of fixing its own fees. Without fearing that they would do so in an improper way, he thought it would be better if that were left to some other body—say, if they liked, the Committee of Council on Education. Then, to-night, he had heard several hon. Members refer with some alarm to the powers which would be given by the Bill. He was aware that the temporary Commissioners would be possessed with it; but he thought the powers of the Educational Council were rather too restricted. It seemed to him that the Government would constantly have to appoint temporary Commissioners, or that schemes for the altering and amendment of those schools would sometimes have to wait a considerable time; and he was rather in favour of giving that power to the Educational Council. He trusted he might be excused referring to those few points; but he was very anxious the Bill should pass into law this Session, with its main provisions untouched; and it would, he felt confident, meet with public approval. The great capability which the right hon. Gentleman had exhibited in bringing in the Bill proved that he was perfectly able to deal with the great question of a national measure, of which he (Mr. Lea) considered that a first instalment; and the country would not excuse any omission on the right hon. Gentleman's part, if he failed in doing so.

MR. SAMUELSON referred in terms of commendation to the extraordinary labour and care which, during a period of four years, had been bestowed upon the subject of Endowed Schools by a Commission of unpaid gentlemen. It must be a great gratification to them now to find that their efforts had not been without result. He was of opinion that his right hon. Friend had done right in inserting in the Bill the Conscience Clause. He rejoiced at the removal of the monopoly with regard to the head mastership of Endowed Schools, all who heard or read that description, and he felt convinced that the Universities and other public institutions would furnish an ample supply of able masters as soon as it was known that it made no difference whether they were clergymen or laymen. He should have been pleased if a hope had been held out in the Bill that ultimately local Boards would have been established, not because he feared the bugbear of centralization, but because no better influence could be exerted on the minds of parents than by giving them a share in the responsibilities of managing such schools. It would be necessary to have some authority possessed of a wider range than the mere locality in which the school was situated, and therefore he should be glad if, during the passing of the Bill through the Select Committee, some clauses should be added enabling the Government or the Educational Council, either at once or at a fitting time, to establish provincial Boards such as were suggested by the Commission. Several hon. Members had protested against their schools being brought under this Bill, but he saw nothing in the measure to prevent these schools from framing schemes for the sanction of the Commissioners. It was an absurdly limited time which his right hon. Friend proposed to give to the Commission which he was about to appoint under the Bill. The examination into the state of these schools had been a labour of four years to most able men, and now it was proposed that, at the most in four years, schemes should be drawn up for some 3,000 schools, that they should be revised by that House, and undergo various operations, and then the Commission was to cease. It was impossible, no matter what the capacity of the gentlemen employed in the task might be, to get through such a vast amount of work well in so short a time. He highly approved of the introduction of examination, but he should greatly regret to see the establishment, in any great numbers, of special scientific schools. They had not answered in France, Germany, or Switzerland, or anywhere they had been tried. Wherever literary had been separated from scientific instruction the scientific instruction as well as the literary had been a failure. He, therefore, entered his protest against training any young man simply in science without a literary foundation for his education. There was one thing which he regretted, and that was that this measure should have preceded instead of succeeding a measure for national education, because the difficulty of grading the schools was thereby increased. They would neglect their duty if they were to allow elementary education to remain where it was; but as they had not as yet framed a scheme of elementary education, the only thing that could now be done would be to reserve such powers in this Bill as would bring these schools into harmony with a more extensive and well-defined system of national education.

MR. WALTER said, he believed that his hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Samuelson) need not be much alarmed at the prospect of the limited duration which he thought the Bill prescribed for the action of the Commissioners under it, because not only was there provision in one clause for the continuance of their powers in case Parliament should so think fit, but he might remind the House that Commissioners had as many lives as cats, and there was very little fear, in his opinion, that that term of three years assigned in the Act would be anything but the first of the nine lives which that Commission was probably destined to enjoy. If he were disposed to criticize any limit assigned in the Bill to the period which must elapse between any of the steps in the progress of that scheme, it was the limit of forty days between the presentation of any scheme to that House and the period in which an address condemning it must be presented to Her Majesty. He did not know what particular reason could be assigned for restricting that interval to forty days, unless it were that that was the period of repentance given to Nineveh when its downfall was threatened. But while he concurred most sincerely in all that had been said in commendation both of the excellent speech of his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, and also in the urgent necessity of a stringent measure for reforming abuses in these schools, he could not help regretting that fair consideration had not been shown to those schools which had been referred to by his hon. Friend the Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) and other Gentlemen who had preceded him—namely, Tonbridge, Repton, Uppingham, Sherborne, and others, which, to say the least, were on a par with some of our best Public Schools which were included in the Act of last year. And although it might be very difficult to draw an exact line between those schools and others which stood in a somewhat similar category, yet it would be a proper subject for the Select Committee to consider whether some ten or more of those schools might not be comprised within the scope of the excepted schools, and, so far, might save the Commissioners the trouble of inquiring into them. Because, although it might be said that if they drew a line between those schools and others which came under the operation of the Bill, inasmuch as the tendency and object of that measure was to raise up the other schools to their level, that line would cease to exist, yet they must recollect that there was a class of schools excepted from the Bill of a similar character—namely, those established within the last thirty years. Wellington College, with which he happened to be connected, would be in a singular position. It was neither included in the Act of last year relating to the seven great Public Schools, nor placed under the operation of the present Bill. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: It comes under the second part of the Bill.] Well, he did not know whether the authorities of that school would be particularly pleased at that. He thought they might just as well be excepted from the operation of the Bill under any circumstances. As his right hon. Friend had corrected him on that point, he would ask his attention, for one moment, while he quoted a passage showing what were the views of the head master of that school with regard to the operation of the second part of that Bill. He had been in communication with the head master of Wellington College, as well as with the heads of several other great Public Schools, in reference to the second part of that measure; and he could tell his right hon. Friend that a very strong objection was entertained by some of the head masters of the most distinguished schools against the plan for limiting their choice of assistants to certificated masters. It struck him on reading the Report that the minds of the Commissioners had been rather influenced by the opinions which they had gathered from an examination of the Prussian system. The idea had got abroad that in Prussia, in consequence of the law which prevented any but certificated teachers from teaching either in public or in private schools, they obtained the most perfect machinery for teaching which the world had ever seen; and he had no doubt that that impression existed in the minds of the gentlemen who drew up that Report, and that they would, if they could, enforce in this country a system very similar to that of Prussia. Now, it was worth while for the House to hear what the head master of Wellington College had written to him the other day as to what he had himself witnessed in Prussia under the operation of that system. It was a very short passage, and well deserved the attention of hon. Members. Dr. Benson said—

“I once saw a master pass his examination for a teaching certificate at Berlin. He had to attend at the principal and most advanced modern gymnasium and take a turn with the first class. The hour and the boys were sacrificed to him. He did it very badly indeed; and I said that I thought so to the professor who presided. He said, ‘Oh, yes, of course he did it badly; but we must give him a first-class certificate. He is a very distinguished man, and he will make a good teacher in time, no doubt.’ He said it would be absurd to refuse him admittance to his vocation; that the system was necessarily formal, and would be better dispensed with.”

That was the evidence furnished to him by the head master of Wellington College—which, he ventured to say was at this moment second to none in this country—as to the absolutely unsatisfactory test which that system of examination for teachers gave. Dr. Benson's own account of how to choose a good head master was as follows. He said—

“The best description of how a master should handle his form, and deal with little difficulties, which I ever heard, used to be given to me by one of the weakest masters I ever knew. He would have been perfect on paper, or in ticketing a form, with examiners standing by, in whose presence the boys would be perfect in behaviour; but leave him alone, and there would be a riot. On the other hand, one of the best, clearest, most definite, most popular masters I knew was one of whom, even at the end of two terms, I was in despair.”

Well, with evidence of that kind, which he had no doubt could be multiplied indefinitely, he thought it was unreasonable to attempt to force upon the great public schools a class of masters the only test of whose fitness was an examination which they were to undergo at the hands of that Educational Council which could examine them only as to their knowledge, and could not possibly have any means of testing their ability for teaching. That, as everybody knew, could be ascertained only by experience. Dr. Benson said that any good tutor of a College would give a pretty correct idea of the fitness or unfitness of a teacher, that there was no other sufficient test than experience, and that, probably, a period of not less than two years would afford a satisfactory proof of whether a master was fit for his work or not. It was, therefore, to be hoped that this subject would be gone fully into in the Select Committee, and he ventured to think that this part of the measure would probably undergo revision.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, he had no doubt that when the Bill went before the Select Committee it would receive, as it required, very careful consideration. The 61st clause provided that the examination of the different schools should be paid for in proportion to the fees paid by the scholars. Under that provision they would have the school of Birmingham, for example, paying nearly £500 per annum towards the expenses of the examination—a sum which would pay for the education of between fifty and fifty-five children under the endowment at Birmingham. Why that amount should go for the examination of a school which was confessedly at the head almost of all the Endowed Schools in England he failed to see. He took the Birmingham school as a fair specimen of one class of schools with which the Bill proposed to deal. It was not many years since that school was in a very decayed state. In 1828 it had only 115 scholars, and the building was in a ruinous condition. Now, however, there were 1,767 children educated on that foundation, and the present building was well known as one of the most magnificent character, and which gained for its architect the opportunity of erecting the building in which they now sat. Having himself been educated in that school he took a particular interest in it. Its endowments were now large, owing to the increased value of the property. They were £10,000 a year, and if the views of the present head master were realized they might soon be augmented to £20,000. And yet that institution had grown in usefulness without special legislation. He was a scholar in it a quarter of a century ago under the present Bishop of Manchester, then its head master; there were brought up there boys of every religious denomination, Christian or Jew, all being educated together, and without the slightest feeling of distinction between boys of different positions in life. Some of the Birmingham boys of that period went to Cambridge and took the highest degrees there, some of those who did so being the sons of small shopkeepers or of men scarcely above the artisan class. The boys were educated without any regard to their different religions, and he never heard any objection on that ground, although he had been since informed that one or two Roman Catholics had objected to certain points of the religious teaching. Such, then, was the condition to which the school had been brought without special legislation of any kind. Now, what was the present state of the law with regard to charitable trusts? The right hon. Gentleman had, in his opinion, somewhat underrated the powers conferred by the Charitable Trusts Act with respect to schemes for schools. The Charitable Trusts Act of 1853, as amended by that of 1855, gave full powers for altering the governing bodies and amending the schemes, with the proviso that the new schemes should be laid upon the Table of the House, and be afterwards incorporated in a short Act of Parliament. Under the provisions of the Statutes he had just referred to, a special Commissioner, called an Inspector, might be sent down to report into the state of a school and its governing body, and then to arrange an amended scheme for its management. That scheme, having been laid on the table of the House, was, if no objection were brought forward, to be referred at once to a Select Committee—a body quite as able to deal with a matter of this sort as any three Commissioners, however eminent, who might be selected by the right hon. Gentleman. Well, if a scheme could be passed in this manner, and if a fresh governing body could be thus called into existence, where was the necessity of putting the schools to the expense which they would have to incur if the present measure became law? Reverting to the high position of the school at Birmingham, he said that as the right hon. Gentleman had read a letter from the Rev. Charles Evans, the head master, he might, perhaps, ask permission to read one addressed by the same reverend gentleman to himself, and dated the 22nd of February, after the present measure had been brought forward. It was in the following terms:—

“I do not at present see many objections to Mr. Forster's Endowed Schools Bill; if carried, everything will, of course, depend on the character of the Commissioners whom they may appoint. They ought to be men, at any rate, who will take an unprejudiced view of the recommendations of the late Schools Inquiry Commission, the adoption of whose recommendations as regards this school in particular would, I believe, be disastrous to the cause of education in Birmingham. The main features of the scheme recommended by that Commission for the whole country have long been anticipated here. We have, as you know, schools of three grades—1. Elementary, 2. English, 3. Classical—a perfect system of affiliation, with unrestricted means of transfer from one school to the other, so that a ready opening is offered to merit wheresoever found. The elementary schools are open to the first applicant, who is invariably admitted in his turn as vacancies occur, while admission to the New-street school is entirely competitive, the governors having been induced by me to abandon entirely the nomination system; and now I am quite sure that if let alone, and with power to impose a fee on all beyond a certain number, say 500 here and 1,000 in the elementary schools, I could make this institution in a few years educate three-fourths of the children of Birmingham. The free admissions would soon grow into distinctions and school scholarships, stimulating and rewarding merit and industry throughout 500,000 people.”

three Commissioners. The right hon. Gentleman had urged, indeed, that appeals would be allowed, but what was the nature of those appeals? In the first place, an appeal lay from the decision of the Commissioners to the Committee of Council on Education. But surely schools would never take the trouble of appealing to them from the judgment of their own Commissioners? It had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman that there was an appeal to the Privy Council. Passing by, however, as hardly worthy of consideration two cases in which appeals would lie—namely, when vested interests were interfered with, and when the scheme was not made in conformity with the Act—passing by those cases, he was unable to find that any power was given of appealing to Her Majesty in Council. It was only given in cases specified by the Act, but no cases were specified. They might be well alarmed, therefore, when they saw that all the power was to be vested in three Commissioners, from whose decision there was practically no appeal. Those Commissioners might destroy the governing body of a school, overrule every statute under which the governing body acted, while the scheme put forward by the Commissioners would become the sole law for the management of the school. Yet, all the instructions given by the Bill to the Commissioners were contained between Clauses 20 and 24, one of which, as might be expected, abolished the Bishop. The only other point to which he would draw the attention of the House was the way in which charities other than Endowed Schools were dealt with under Clause 25. That clause empowered the Commissioners to deal with those institutions which were classed as “educational endowments.” Now, although many persons thought charities of this kind tended to encourage pauperism, yet he must instance, with regard to the city of Coventry, many in that now suffering community would have been long ago in a state of starvation but for the old seniority funds which were doled out carefully to the deserving freemen. He alluded to this circumstance because there was no appeal in cases of charities under £100 a year, and the Commissioners having their eyes mainly directed to education would have every desire to get hold of all the money they could, and would consequently feel inclined to say that these were the very funds they wanted to carry out the objects they had in view.

MR. BRUCE said, that his right hon. Friend and Colleague the Vice President of the Council had in his able speech replied to many of the objections which had been raised in the country since the introduction of the Bill, and if his right hon. Friend had heard the objections raised since he moved the second reading he would no doubt have been able to reply satisfactorily to them also. The strongest point which had been urged against the Bill up to the present time was that respecting the desirability of excluding from its operation certain schools of undoubted character and excellence, such as Sherborne, Repton, Bedford, and Tonbridge. But if these exceptions were admitted, no doubt in a short time a large batch of other excellent schools would be recommended for similar treatment. He sincerely hoped the Select Committee would not agree to proposals of that kind, and, indeed, he thought it would be even better to include in the Bill the seven Public Schools which were now exempted from its operation. It would be impossible to provide for the proper gradation of schools unless all were at once under the view of the Commissioners, and the exclusion of any schools besides those included in the Act passed last year would fatally infringe the principle of the Bill. An objection had been raised with respect to the certificates of the masters, and it had been assumed that every master who presented himself must be examined by the examiners appointed by the Educational Council; but the hon. Gentleman who had raised that objection could hardly have read the Bill, for it was provided by the 2nd section of the 58th clause that not only were certificates of fitness to be granted for examination by those examiners, but in respect of any examination which the Council might deem sufficient for the purpose. If necessary, provision might be made in the Bill itself to meet the objection which had been made with respect to those who had passed the University with honours, especially if they happened to have taken the higher honours. As to the Commissioners they were appointed for a limited time, the object of the Bill being that there should be a body who could at once apply themselves to the task of giving effect to the recommendations of the Commission, and having done that it would be for Parliament to consider what would be the future steps to be taken with the view of dealing with the supervision over the schools. The present measure was not recommended to Parliament as a final Act. The work was only initiatory, and how it was to be continued hereafter it would be for the wisdom of the Legislature to determine. His right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) had found fault with part of the application of the funds. The Bill, he said, took away those doles which were frequently applied to the benefit of the poor in order to give them to the middle classes. Such, however was not the object of the measure. One of its immediate objects was that the poor should gain advantages from those doles, though not precisely, perhaps, the advantages for which his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) contended, and one of its great recommendations, in his opinion, would be found in the fact that, in the words of the Manchester school deed, it would afford the benefit of education to boys of the poorest and humblest class, who, notwithstanding their poverty, were "of pregnant wit." Again, it was urged that the Commissioners were not directly responsible to Parliament; but it should be borne in mind that those Commissioners themselves were but the creatures of the Privy Council, and that the Privy Council was responsible to Parliament. Indeed, that was one of the reasons why the Commissioners were not named in the Bill, as had been done on a previous occasion when unpaid Commissioners had been appointed. As matters stood in the present case, the whole responsibility of the conduct of the measure rested with the Government, and with them rested also the responsibility of naming the Commissioners. As to the operation of those Commissioners on endowments under £100 a year, that was a matter of detail. The Charity Commissioners now had the power of absolutely framing schemes wherever the amount of the endowment with which they had to deal did not exceed £50 a year, and it remained to be seen whether that principle might not very well be extended to endowments of £100 a year. His hon. Friend the Member for Pembrokeshire (Mr. Scourfield) was opposed to having the cost of inspection cast upon the schools themselves, and if his hon. Friend meant by inspection examination, no doubt he was right in saying that they would have to bear the cost. He should, however, remark that they would not have to pay the cost of the original inspection, and it was only fair they should defray the charge of an examination which was for their benefit. The hon. Gentleman who had spoken last (Mr. Staveley Hill) seemed to think there would be no great advantage in appointing Commissioners under the Bill, and that the Charity Commissioners might carry out its provisions. The fact, however, was that the power of the Charity Commissioners to deal with endowments was very limited, while, in the next place, they would only be enabled to deal with the schools in reference to the schools themselves, and not with the question whether a school good in itself might be exactly the sort of school adapted to the wants of a district. There was no doubt that the powers proposed to be given to the Commissioners were arbitrary, and it was necessary that it should be so. But these Commissioners were, as he had said, but the creatures of the Government of the day, who would be responsible to Parliament for their proceedings, and that, he thought, would be sufficient to prevent any abuse of their powers. He did not rise to discuss the principle of the Bill, which had been admitted to be sound on all sides, and he would only add that he could state, on the authority of his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Committee of Council, that the deputation of leading schoolmasters of the country, who would actually have to conduct the schools in question, had urged no objection against the principle of the measure. He should have been content to say nothing on this occasion, but he had wished to remove some of the misapprehensions which were current both in and out of the House.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE thanked the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council for the very lucid statement he had made, and for his ample admission that the Livery Companies of the City of London had no grounds for fearing that their large educational establishments, which they had conducted so successfully for centuries, were likely by this measure to be taken out of their control. As the right hon. Gentleman had decided to send the measure to a Select Committee, in accordance with the prayer of the Petitions that were presented that evening, he begged to thank the Government for agreeing to this. It was not his intention now to discuss the details of the Bill, which would be more properly considered by the Committee. He would merely say that he hoped the clause which swept into its net the various small and even large charities, of which time might have altered the use, would be carefully examined. The lending powers, for example, of the City Companies, by which they might advance sums varying from £100 to £500 for seven years without interest to young men who could give good security, ought to be respected, for there were many persons now of high standing in the City who owed their present position to the benefit of those trusts.

MR. M'LAREN said, he wished to suggest a slight alteration of the Bill. It was complained that certain schools had not been excluded from the provisions of the measure, but his complaint was that all the schools of Scotland had been so excluded. An hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had referred to the Endowed School of Birmingham as a magnificent foundation, because it had an income of £12,000 a year, with 1,000 scholars. Now, one of the Endowed Schools in the City of Edinburgh had an income of £16,000 a year, and educated 3,300 out-pupils, besides those taught within its walls. There were other two Edinburgh foundations which had from £8,000 to £10,000 a year, and several others which had £2,000, £3,000, and £4,000 a year. On what principle these had been excluded from the Bill he could not understand. The fact was that these Scotch endowments required more to be looked after than those of England. The Charitable Trusts Act which had been referred to by the hon. Gentleman opposite did not apply to Scotland; the Court of Chancery had not the power to alter any endowment in Scotland, and there was no court in Scotland which had that power. When Scotland contributed £9,000,000 out of the £72,000,000 of Imperial revenue, it was only just that its interests should not be overlooked. He was aware that a Scotch Bill was talked of, but a great many Bills were talked of for Scotland which never passed. He wanted to see the clause struck out which said that this Bill should not apply to Scotland, and he expected that the greatest good would result from the change. Some hon. Gentlemen seemed well satisfied with what to others appeared a very low scale of educational results. The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) had referred to that town and county as if it were a perfect paradise educationally, but he (Mr. M'Laren) happened to have in his hand a Return presented to Parliament for another purpose, which showed that Bedfordshire was amongst the worst educated districts in England. Even if the people of Bedfordshire were well contented with their present state, that was no reason why the inhabitants of other districts should not desire to raise them up to their own level. He found that out of every 100 women married in Bedfordshire forty-four could not sign their names, and out of every 100 men thirty-four could not do so, whilst in Northumberland, Cumberland, and the northern and eastern parts of Yorkshire persons signing with marks were not one-half or one-third so numerous. He trusted, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Committee of Council would not be misled by statements made about the flourishing condition of this or that school, although much lauded by persons, who really knew little about their results. He appealed to the educational statistics of the country, and thought it would be difficult to find schools in Bedfordshire, or anywhere else, which would not be greatly benefited by being subjected to the operation of this Bill.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he heartily concurred with his right hon. Friend in hoping that this very important measure would be treated upon its own merits, and would not be made a party measure. But, this being so, he hoped the Government would carefully consider that feature in the Bill which provided that the Commission should be identified with the Government of the day. Now, he could not help feeling that this was a mistake. Without pledging himself to the course he should take after hearing the matter thoroughly argued out, he believed that the hands of the Commission would be strengthened by naming the members of it in the Act, and by giving them something of a more permanent position than they would otherwise enjoy. These gentlemen would have no easy task before them. It was all very well to talk of the principles upon which endowments should be dealt with, but when you come face to face with local interests and had to grapple with bodies of trustees and others, it would be found that the persons who had to deal with these interests had a difficult task before them, and should, therefore, be a really strong body. He did not object to their being strong; in his opinion they would not be strong enough owing to their connection with the Government of the day. This connection would be a weakness to the Commission and possibly also to the Government. He regretted that it had not been found possible to give effect to the idea that local bodies should be intrusted with some of the delicate functions which would have to be discharged in re-organizing these endowments. Local bodies, having local knowledge, would be enabled to deal better with many of these questions than a central body; but if it was thought that a central and not a local authority should act, it ought to be appointed by Parliament, and would be all the stronger if it were independent of the Government of the day. He hoped that this subject would be fairly discussed in the Select Committee and that many of the objections to the details of the Bill would there be obviated, so as to accomplish what he believed to be a most essential reform.

MR. ACLAND said, that, as a Member of the Schools Inquiry Commission, he felt grateful to the Government for embodying in a form so suitable for legislation the general scope of the proposals of that Commission. He was still of opinion that ultimately some local and provincial machinery would be desirable for the permanent working out of our secondary education, and that conclusion was supported by the example of some of the most cultivated countries on the Continent. It was gratifying to him to find that the religious objections which had been advanced by one hon. Gentleman had not been followed up by any other hon. Member, and he thought that the House might congratulate itself also that the Bill was not likely to be stopped by a combination of local influence. With regard to one point which had been mentioned during the debate, he thought it might be shown in nearly every case that masters were considerably embarrassed by self-elected bodies of trustees, and that administration by irresponsible trustees was not the best arrangement which could be made for the government of a school.

MR. RAIKES said, he had been really unable to discover anything that could be called a principle in this measure. Both sides of the House might claim a wish to pass some measure upon the subject, and the Bill merely embodied the feeling that there should be a reform and re-organization of Endowed Schools. The whole of the working of the Bill was to be left to a Commission, consisting of three persons not named, who were to exercise greater functions than Parliament itself ever exercised in former times; who were responsible, it was true, to the Government of the day, but who were not to be directly responsible to Parliament. He could not see how the system of the Educational Council and of the examiners could be carried out without superseding in a great degree the existing system of middle-class examinations established by Oxford and Cambridge Universities.

Motion agreed to.

And, on April 1, Committee nominated as follows:—MR. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER, SIR JOHN COLERIDGE, MR. WALPOLE, MR. ACLAND, MR. MOWBRAY, MR. JAMES HOWARD, MR. ADDERLEY, MR. BUXTON, SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, MR. MELLY, SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, MR. WALTER, SIR JOHN HAY, MR. PARKER, MR. GEORGE GREGORY, MR. WINTERBOTHAM, MR. JOHN TALBOT, MR. JACOB BRIGHT, MR. BERESFORD HOPE, MR. DILLWYN, and MR. GOLDNEY:—Five to be the quorum.

UNIVERSITY TESTS BILL.—[BILL 15.]

(Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Bouverie, Mr. Grant Duff.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [10th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Mowbray.)

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER: I wish, Sir, to state to the House the reasons why, in former years, I have not thought it any part of my duty to vote against the second reading of Bills of the same character with that now before the House, and why on this occasion it is not in my power to support the Amendment of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Mowbray). I confess that, looking back to the year 1854, I was one of those who at that time strenuously resisted the first proposal made to remove the obstacles which then existed to the admission of Dissenters to education in the University of Oxford. I did that, not by any means from a feeling of hostility to Dissenters—far from it, or from any want of good-will to mix with them in education; and perhaps I may be excused for repeating the words I then used on that subject. I said that I should regard it in the light of a positive advantage to have intercourse with the Dissenters facilitated in every way which did not interfere injuriously with the functions of the Church; and I opposed that measure because I foresaw that so great a change in the system of the University would necessarily lead to a very great disturbance of those relations between the University and the Church which I felt to be useful to the Church and to the country. And I foresaw also—what experience has verified—that the movement then made would not and could not be final; that you could not possibly stop at the point then indicated, but that if you admitted Dissenters to education on a footing with other young men in the Universities, in the course of time it would be utterly impossible not to extend to those so educated equal advantages with others. I own I did participate in the fears then entertained, and which are still entertained by hon. Friends of mine opposite—that the effect of that change and its consequences possibly, even probably, might be the subversion of the influence and authority of religion in the University—and feeling then, as I feel now, that the subversion of the influence and authority of religion in the University would be a calamity too great to be described, that it would destroy the most essential part of the value of University education, I was unwilling to be a party to what I thought the first step which might possibly lead to such a result. Sir, if I was too much an alarmist at that time I hope I may be excused in the judgment of the House on account of the magnitude and immense importance of the interests which seemed to be involved. I do not retract or in the slightest degree recede from the principle on which I then stood—that, above all things, the influence and authority of religion in the education given at the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge ought to be retained; and if I were in my mind persuaded that it could not be maintained without rejecting this or any similar measure, unwillingly as I should oppose myself to that which, besides being apparently the desire of the House and the country, my own understanding compels me to regard as the inevitable corollary and sequel of what has been done, yet I would oppose it if I continued to think it was impossible that the influence and authority of religion in the Universities could be maintained without resisting such measures. But I confess I am no longer of that opinion. Now, let me ask the House to recollect the course which this question has taken since that time. Even at that time, in 1854, who was it that was mainly instrumental in carrying that first step which most of us then perceived to involve the consequences now resulting from it? It was the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley). The Government of that day were not willingly led to introduce that subject among the other reforms they were then engaged in promoting. They desired to leave it to the spontaneous action and judgment, if possible, of the University. The Motion for the introduction of Mr. Heywood's clause into the Bill was opposed by the Government; but the noble Lord came forward and said—"Don't let the House be alarmed; don't let the House trust to future proceedings by the University in a matter in which it sees its own way clearly." The noble Lord saw his way clearly; he had no hesitation or doubt in the matter; he had no fear of the consequences; and I well remember he added—"Don't be alarmed about the House of Lords; don't be too ready to assume that you will meet with any difficulty in the House of Lords if the clause passes this House." And he had extremely good reasons for saying so, for the Chancellor of the University of Oxford sat in that House, and had a leading influence in it. No one could better know the mind of the Chancellor of the University of Oxford than the noble Lord; and he had, as far back as 1832, been among the most eager, at that time, to contend for the admission of Dissenters to the Universities. That credit belonged to the noble Lord; it was owing as much to him as to any man that the first step was taken at that time, and in that particular manner. What followed? The Oxford Act of 1854 limited the abolition of tests to those previously exacted from undergraduates on their matriculation, and from Bachelors of Arts upon their admission to that degree. Two years afterwards an Act was passed for Cambridge; and then, as Cambridge had always been in advance of Oxford with regard to the admission of Dissenters as undergraduates, so now, in the new legislation, it was in advance again; the Oxford legislation had limited the privilege conceded to the B.A. degree, but the Cambridge carried it forward to the M.A. degree. What has followed since? How have those Acts worked? There has been, if report speaks true, a considerable unsettlement and disturbance of opinion in both Universities; but I will not undertake to say whether this has been in any degree due to the operation of these measures. For my own part, I think it is due to other causes—causes which have operated throughout the Church and throughout the country. I think those who took an interest in the measure may, perhaps, rather see reason to regret that so few of our Nonconformist brethren have taken advantage of it, and I have not heard from any good authority that where they have done so any evil has resulted. But this has, at all events, followed as the consequence of what has been done, that both from within and without the Universities a powerful, constant, and increasing demand has arisen, for the further prosecution of those ulterior changes which were the logical sequence of the change then made; and from both Universities opinions have been expressed by a large number of men of position, character, and attainments, Heads of Houses, tutors of Colleges, and others, in such a manner as to make it manifestly impossible, in the judgment of any man taking a practical view of the subject, that this question can remain in the position in which it now stands. And that opinion, coming from both Universities with a very great degree of force and power, has been re-echoed from without with a greater degree of force and power; the Nonconformist body, having already got an established footing within them, is determined that that footing shall be extended, as far as the logical principle involved in what has already been done may require. Now, that is the state of things with which we have to deal; and we must consider, not whether we can altogether resist this demand, but in what manner we ought to deal with it—whether we can deal with it for the common advantage of the Universities and the country; and whether, in fact, the principle of that demand does require, that there should be a surrender of the influence and authority of religious teaching within the University. No doubt, a great deal of alarm has been expressed with regard to the Bill of my hon. and learned Friend (Sir John Coleridge). Last year, we know, from both Universities, addresses, numerous signed by persons of high character and in every way entitled to the greatest respect, were presented to the late Archbishop of Canterbury—himself a man of whom no one can speak without the desire to give expression to the feelings, universally entertained, of deep respect for his character, and sincere regret for the loss the nation has sustained by his decease. These addresses represented, in effect, that the Bill of the Solicitor General really aimed at the total destruction of the principle of religious education in the University—or that, at all events, that was its necessary, and not remote, tendency; and the late Archbishop of Canterbury did appear, in some degree, by his answers to these addresses, to have participated in that alarm. Now, the first question is, whether there is reason to believe that those who bring forward a measure which creates alarm do intend those effects and consequences, which it is apprehended may possibly follow from it. If they do not intend them, then, at all events, it may be expected, that if it can be pointed out to them that the measure as it stands may give some reasonable ground for alarm,

they will be found willing to do all that is possible to alleviate those apprehensions, and give proof of their sincerity by agreeing to such modifications, not affecting the substance of the measure, as may tend to show that its principle is not inconsistent with that which they declare their intention to maintain. Accordingly, there came forward some of the most distinguished of those who, out of this House, have advocated this measure, and they disavowed, with undoubted sincerity, the purpose and intention which, if not imputed to them, were supposed to be involved in the measure itself. I will mention two names, one that of a gentleman, whom I am proud to call my relative, and whom I regret not to see now a Member of this House—Mr. Charles Roundell. He addressed a letter to the newspapers, in which he referred to the fact that the late Archbishop of Canterbury had thought it right to express his belief that to entrust University education to men who had no religious creed would inevitably tend to sap the foundations of Christianity; thereby seeming to imply that this would be one of the results of passing the Tests Bill. At this construction of the Bill he (Mr. Roundell) professed his astonishment; and he met it by saying that in every part of the Bill he found the most careful reservation and protection, in the most explicit language, of the religious teaching of the University? ["Oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen may think that the provisions of the Bill are inadequate for that purpose. For my own part, I should like to see that purpose stamped upon the Bill in a much more unequivocal manner; and for that purpose I shall propose certain Amendments, which, without altering the practical part of the Bill, will show that the sense of the Legislature is consistent with the declaration so made, that the purpose and intention with which it is brought forward is not to interfere with the principle of religious education in the University. Another name I will mention, that of a gentleman whose acquaintance I do not possess, but whom I have heard spoken of in the highest terms—Sir George Young. He also addressed to the newspapers certain letters, which he has since published in a pamphlet, and he also disclaimed any idea or intention of interfering with the principle of religious education and instruction in the University. I feel bound to give credit to such men for sincerity; and from those who agree with them I feel I am entitled to expect concurrence in any reasonable proposition to stamp the evidence of their purpose and intention upon the face of this Bill. If I could, for a moment, be persuaded that it was the purpose and intention of a majority of this House to subvert the authority and influence of religion in the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge; or if I thought the tendency of this Bill must necessarily be to impair its efficiency, I would not only not vote for the Amendment, but no majority whatever would persuade me to yield assent to such principles. I look upon it as a matter of the utmost importance that education should, as far as possible, be everywhere associated with religion, and above all, in those ancient places of learning in which education has always been associated with religion—where education has been stamped with a religious character from the earliest infancy of these institutions—which have always been the nurseries and seminaries of the clergy of our Church; and I think it would be an act of infatuation if this Legislature should ever desire to secularize those institutions and to deprive them of that which, in the eyes of all who place religion above all other kinds of knowledge, must be their greatest excellence. I believe that in saying this I do not express only the sentiments of the Church of England. Notwithstanding the unhappy differences which prevail on matters of doctrine, I believe that these sentiments are not peculiar to the Church of England, but are shared in common with them by the members of the Roman Catholic Church, and by the members of all Nonconformist bodies; all of which, differing as they do as to particular tenets, are as sincere and earnest in their religious belief as we are, and who, as little as ourselves, desire that their children should be sent for their education to any place, the moral atmosphere of which might be hostile to religious belief. As long as we have an Established Church—which I hope may be for ever—and even if, contrary to our hope and expectation, we should ever cease to have one, it will still be of the very highest value and importance that the clergy of the Church, which is now the Established Church—and which will at all times be the Church of a very great proportion of the people of this country—should find in the University such a system of education as may fit them for the discharge of their spiritual duties. What greater calamity could happen than that where you have an Established Church your clergy should not have a liberal education, and should not mix with the laity; but if you secularize the education of the Universities, and allow Christian influences no longer to speak with authority from places so long devoted to such instruction, how long would it be possible to keep the Universities as places for the education of the clergy? But this is taking too narrow a view of the question. This is a matter not affecting the clergy alone, but the laity. It affects all the people; for ninety-nine out of every hundred it may be taken are religious people, and desire that their children should receive a religious education; and anything that would un-Christianize any of our great seats of learning would be a deplorable national calamity, and not more opposed to the general feeling of Churchmen than to the sense of the Nonconformist portion of the public. How did the Legislature describe the University of Oxford in 1854? As “a place of religion and learning.” So also in the case of the University of Cambridge. So also with respect to the Scottish Universities. Uniformly the Legislature has stamped upon its Acts a recognition of that character—that the Universities are places of religion as well as learning. I do not cease to remember the prayer which is offered up in the University of Oxford—

“That in this and in all other places more immediately dedicated to God’s honour and service, true religion and useful learning may for ever flourish and abound.”

If I thought that this or any other measure would subvert that purpose, I could not support it; but when I look to the Bill I do not think it is at all a necessary consequence that it should do so. The right hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Mowbray), on Wednesday quoted a portion of the speech of the present First Minister of the Crown which he uttered in 1854, as if he (Mr. Mowbray), had some reason to suppose that he would not now adhere to the sentiments to which he then gave utterance. I have no doubt he does adhere to them, and so far as I have had communication with him I should believe he adhered to every word. I will read the passage, but I will read the whole of it, which the right hon. Gentleman did not do. This is what my right hon. Friend said—

“I hold the relative position of the Church and of the University of Oxford to be this—that while the Church is in the position of a national Establishment, so long as the people of this country insist on a connection being maintained between religion and education, so long the Church is entitled to expect that the interests of the University, that the discipline of the University, that the government of the University shall be moulded in conformity with the principles of religion, and with the principles of religion in that specific form in which they are held and taught by the Church of England.”

And then, after expressing his disinclination to draw any line which could be avoided between admission to the University and admission to such endowments of the University as did not carry with them the power of government, he declared—

“That supposing due regard should be taken for the security of the religious teaching and discipline of the Church in the University of Oxford, then he considered there would be great advantage—advantage to Dissenters, advantage to the Church, advantage to the nation, if provision were—and he thought it could be—made for the admission of Dissenters to the profits and advantages of education at the University of Oxford.”

I have never heard anything fall from my right hon. Friend which would lead me to think he had changed those opinions. I have no doubt he still thinks it right that there should be due security for Christian and religious teaching in the University, and that he thinks this may be afforded at the same time that Dissenters may be admitted to the full benefits of the University. Let us see now whether there is anything in the provisions of this Bill necessarily inconsistent with that principle. I will take the indictment against this Bill which was laid before the late Archbishop of Canterbury. I avow that I have a great respect for those whose opinions are stated in that document, though they thus state what they believe would be the effect of this Bill—

“At the present moment there is a Bill before the House of Commons which, if it should become law, would completely destroy the existing connection of the University and Colleges with the Church. The effect of this measure would be (1) to transfer the supreme government of the University in Convocation to a body, the individual members of which will not as such be under any legal obligation to profess any Christian doctrine whatsoever; and (2) to throw open the Fellowships to all persons without regard to religious faith. We cannot contemplate these results without dismay; for as the tutors are selected from among the Fellows of Colleges, we are convinced that the admission to Fellowships of persons not necessarily Christians will imperil the continuance of religious education in Oxford, and tend to the establishment of a purely secular system. This, we are persuaded, would be repugnant to the deep convictions of the mass of the English people, whether Churchmen or Nonconformists. It is our firm belief that the only method of securing definite Christian education on truly liberal and comprehensive principles is to maintain the connection of the University and the Colleges with the National Church.”

Now, let us consider, in the first place, what is the real substance and meaning of the statement, that the effect of this measure would be to transfer the supreme government of the University in Convocation to a body, the individual members of which will not, as such, be under any legal obligation to profess any Christian doctrine whatsoever. What is the real meaning of that? That you will not enforce a test on them. That is what it means. It does not mean that you will have in Convocation such a number of persons not believing in Christianity as will be likely to exercise a material influence on the government of the University. If it does mean that, I am entirely unable to see any ground for such an opinion. As long as Christianity is the general belief of the nation, it may surely be expected to have its adequate representation in the University even without tests. It must be remembered that at present, if there be in the University so large a number of unbelievers as would subvert and un-Christianize its character, there is no security in tests against that. There is no security against persons becoming unbelievers. You may at the time a person takes the degree of Master of Arts impose a certain test; but you do not re-administer that test as often as he goes into Convocation. If persons are unbelievers, and set at nought the whole spirit of the institution to which they belong—if they care nothing for moral character—such persons would probably be willing to take the test. At all events, if they took it formerly on an occasion when it was necessary for them to do so, that would give you no security that they would not afterwards depart from the obligation which the test implies.

Sir Roundell Palmer

There is, then, no substantial security afforded by the test that the members of Convocation must really be persons who will uphold Christian doctrine. If the general Christian character of the place can be maintained, that is your security. The test would be nothing without it. I come now to deal with the Bill as it affects the teaching of the University. It affects the University in two ways. It provides first that no test shall be applied as a condition of a lay degree. I have dealt with that; but next it says in the 4th clause—

“From and after the passing of this Act no person shall be required, as a qualification for or as a condition of holding any public professorship or other academical office or place of emolument which is or may be tenable by a layman, or as a condition of teaching, within the said Universities or either of them, to subscribe any article or formulary of faith, or to make any declaration, or take any oath respecting his religious belief or profession, or to conform to any religious observance, anything in any Act of Parliament, instrument of foundation or endowment, or statute, of the said Universities or either of them to the contrary notwithstanding.”

Now, I ask the House in examining the question what the effect of that clause would be, to remember that there is nothing in this Bill repealing or purporting to repeal any of the statutes of the University. And it is important the House should know what the effect of those statutes is. As to the University Professors—of whom there are thirty-six—six being Professors of Divinity, or ex officio Canons of Christ Church—the University statutes forbid any Professor or Lecturer to teach, directly or indirectly, or dogmatically to assert, anything which is in any way opposed to the Catholic faith, or good morals; and enjoin them all—and in an especial manner all Professors or Lecturers in philosophy—to use all opportunities of recommending sound religion to their pupils and discouraging all anti-Christian opinions. The Vice Chancellor has a general power of punishing all offenders against the statutes of the University. Many of the Professors are removable by academical authority for any breach of duty; and others by authorities external to the University. Therefore I think it is clear that, as to Professors and Lecturers, without breach of the statutes of the University, which this Bill will leave unaltered, they could not teach anything against the religion of Christianity, or against the doctrine of the Church of England. I now come to the Colleges. The address went on to suggest that the Bill would “throw open the Fellowships to all persons without regard to religious faith.” It proceeded thus—

“We cannot contemplate these results without dismay; for as the tutors are selected from among the Fellows of Colleges, we are convinced that admissions to Fellowships of persons not necessarily Churchmen will imperil the continuance of religious education in Oxford, and tend to the establishment of a purely secular system.”

But let us see whether by the Bill this is so. By the Bill the Colleges are entirely saved from all interference with their present constitution. All the Bill does is to remove tests imposed by Act of Parliament, which are external and foreign to the constitution and statutes of the Colleges. That is a different thing from what is represented in the address; because the statutes of the Colleges and of the University contain the clearest and strongest provisions against any consequences of such a character as those apprehended in the address. I have not examined the statutes of the Colleges of Cambridge; but in all the statutes made for the Colleges of Oxford by the Commissioners under the Act of 1854, or by the Colleges themselves, it is provided, that those persons are to be chosen to Headships and Fellowships who are most fit to hold those offices in the College, as a place of religion, learning, and education. It would be impossible for men, not wilfully disregarding the moral obligation imposed upon them by those statutes to elect persons known to hold irreligious opinions. Daily service in the College chapels, with regulations for the attendance of the members of the College generally, are provided for; a certain proportion of the Fellows are required to be in Holy Orders; and contumacious non-conformity to the Liturgy of the Church of England is, in twelve Colleges, made a ground of deprivation; while in the other seven there are equivalent, or still stronger provisions, requiring adherence not only to the Liturgy, but to the doctrine of the Church. As to the College tutors, the statutes of the University require all scholars in Colleges to have tutors till they graduate; and they forbid any one to be a tutor who is not—among other things—religione secundum doctrinam et ritum Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ sincerus. Nor is the judgment on this question left solely on the College authorities; the Vice Chancellor is to decide upon it, in case of any controversy; and the Vice Chancellor may stop the exercise of his office by any tutor who is proved before him not to have this qualification. All tutors are also enjoined to be diligent in instructing all their pupils—Dissenters excepted—in the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England, under pain of censure and punishment by the Vice Chancellor. There are similar provisions as to the Halls. The House will see, therefore, that this Bill is a measure, removing certain external Parliamentary enactments, but not taking away the existing securities contained in the statutes of the University and of the Colleges for the maintenance of religion within those institutions. I cannot be interpreting the Bill wrongly in supposing that it is not intended to interfere with these things. My hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General last year interpreted it as I interpret it now. He then referred to these statutes in the following terms:—

“All, then, that we ask to be done with the Colleges is that the State should remove restrictions on their freedom of action which the State itself imposed; all things else regarding them will remain as they are now. ‘Their statutes, old and new, will remain unaltered.’”—[3 Hansard, xcii. 212.]

And then he went on, in rather stronger language than I should have ventured to use, to say that—

“Every single Fellow is bound by statute and by oath to elect the man whom he believes, after examination, to be most fit to be elected a Fellow of the College, as a place of religion and learning; you must have a majority of the Fellows scoundrels, or else men who have become infidels since their own election, before this measure could even aid in the election of any but a man at least honestly believed by the electors to be a moral and religious person.”—[Ibid., 217.]

That is stronger language than I should have ventured to use in this House, but nothing could more emphatically prove what is the avowed intention and purpose of the hon. and learned Solicitor General in bringing in the Bill. He does not in any way propose to interfere with the character of the Colleges or the Universities as places of religion, or by this Bill to authorize anything to be done inconsistent with their present statutes. As I understand the Bill, it leads to nothing but the abolition of a certain Parliamentary subscription test—it leaves the statutes of the Colleges and of the Universities unimpaired, while it takes away a certain subscription test which on certain formal occasions is now required to be administered. Now, what is the test? I believe it is only a subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles.

MR. BOUVERIE: It is a declaration of conformity with the Church of England.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER: In the Colleges it may be so; but surely, if you are to look to laws and not to spirit in such matters, the laws I have referred to, the constitution, the statutes of the Colleges and Universities, with the powers of government which enable the authorities of the Colleges and of the Universities to enforce those laws, are infinitely better and more safe to trust to than the effect of some past test taken at some past time, and which, when once taken, is a net from which afterwards there is full opportunity to escape. There is no possibility of escape from the permanent laws of the Colleges and Universities; and, although it may be, that, in the exercise of, perhaps, a very sound discretion, there is no disposition on the part of the authorities of the Colleges and Universities to enforce these laws in an inquisitorial way, or to press them to an extreme and tyrannical extent, they bear a moral witness to the character of the institutions, and tend to the moral regulation of the conduct of those who come into them, and they morally condemn any members of the Colleges and Universities who are notoriously unfaithful to those obligations. No doubt, last year something was said—I hope it is not true—there are some things of which it is bliss to be ignorant, and in this case I partake of that bliss, for I am entirely without personal knowledge that such is the fact—but allusion was made in the debates of last year to some persons in the Universities who enjoy the benefits of some of the Fellowships, who were supposed to hold the opinions of M. Comte, or to deny the immortality of the soul. I am desirous to disbelieve that such is the fact, more especially as I have no evidence in support of it. But, assuming it to be true, of what possible use can your test be when it does not exclude persons holding those opinions from Fellowships? The true defences against such opinions are—first, the moral sense of the community; and next, the permanent laws of the community. If these are insufficient for the safety of the Colleges and Universities, what additional protection can you hope to obtain from the dead test which you made a man take some years ago when he became a Master of Arts, or upon some other formal occasion? It cannot be relied upon as a moral obligation, because nothing can surpass the moral obligation of the permanent regulations of the Colleges and Universities which form the basis of the agreement which a man has entered into with the society of which he is a member, and which is to the effect that he will observe their laws and will conform to their spirit. Therefore, I say, you may safely throw aside these tests as being of no value, for they leave behind them all that which is of value—namely, the spirit of the society, the positive laws of the Colleges and Universities, and the sanction which accompanies those laws. It is to these we must look. Now, it is very remarkable to observe in what manner some excellent persons regard this subject, who feel, as I myself do, that the Universities, if they ceased to be places of religious teaching, would be as salt that had lost its savour. They are unwilling to place confidence in anyone who will not give them the assurance that the religious character of the Universities is to be preserved. And yet, some of the most eminent and excellent of the leading men of the University of Oxford, of this way of thinking, have proposed to abandon some of the Colleges to all sorts of religious denominations—some, even, holding tenets very remote from those of the Church of England—if they may only be permitted to keep others for the Church of England. But I want to keep them all for the Church of England, in the sense in which that Church has a legitimate right to and interest in them. I want the prevailing influence to remain, but to be reconciled with the liberal admission of Dissenters. When I am told that the eminent persons to whom I have alluded are willing to give up certain Colleges to those whom they regard as their irreconcilable opponents, I am reminded of the following lines in Cowper's Needless Alarm :—

"Friends! we have lived too long. I never heard Sounds such as these, so worthy to be feared.

I hold it, therefore, wisest and most fit
That, life to save, we leap into the pit."

I think that the moral, also, is not inapplicable to their case—

"Beware of desperate steps. The darkest day, Live till to-morrow, will have passed away."

Now, I may take the liberty of stating to the House my own view of what may and should be done upon this subject. I am bound to state that I think the apprehensions of which I have spoken ought not to be met without great respect and sympathy, at least by those who so thoroughly sympathize—as I do for one—with the principles entertained by those to whom I have referred; and I think that when we look at the Bill it is deficient in the full expression upon the face of it of the intention which, I am sure, its authors do entertain, to preserve intact the general authority and influence of religious teaching in the Universities. I shall, therefore, with the permission of the House, endeavour to explain the Amendments of the Bill which I should propose to effect. In the first place I think it would be just as well to introduce into the Preamble of the Bill language which will make clear on the face of it our intention to adhere to that view of the Universities which was expressed in the former Act. Therefore, I propose to amend the Preamble in the following manner :—

"In line 2, after 'Cambridge,' add, 'as places of religion and learning.' Line 4, after 'divers,' add 'unnecessary.' Line 8, after 'removed,' add 'under proper safeguards for the maintenance of religious instruction, worship, and discipline in the said Universities and the Colleges within the same.'"

In Clause 3, lines 22, 23, I propose to omit the words "or any of the Colleges or Halls thereof respectively." I also propose to insert two further clauses, one of which is as follows :—

"Nothing in this Act shall be deemed or construed to interfere with or alter, any further or otherwise than is hereby expressly enacted, the system of religious instruction, worship, and discipline which now is, or hereafter may be, lawfully established in the said Universities respectively, or in any of the Colleges within the same, or the statutes and ordinances of the said Universities and Colleges respectively relating thereto, or the power of any persons exercising authority in the said Universities and Colleges respectively to maintain and uphold such system of instruction, worship, and discipline, according to such statutes and ordinances."

The other clause which I intend to propose is one which I think the House will accept when they are told that it is merely a simplification and abridgment of one already in force with regard to the lay Professorships in the Scotch Universities.

In 1853 the old test, required from lay Professors in the Scotch Universities, was abolished by Act of Parliament, and instead of it, the lay Professors in them were called upon to make a declaration to this effect—

“Every person hereafter to be elected, presented, or provided to any such office [of Professor, Regent, Master, or other office in any of the Universities or Colleges in Scotland, such office not being that of a Principal or Chair of Theology] shall make and subscribe, in presence of the Senatus Academicus of such University or College, the declaration following:—‘I, A. B., do solemnly and sincerely, in the presence of God, profess, testify, and declare that, as Professor of —, and in the discharge of the said office, I will never endeavour, directly or indirectly, to teach or inculcate any opinions opposed to the Divine authority of the Holy Scriptures, or to the Westminster Confession of Faith, as ratified by law in the year 1690, and that I will not exercise the functions of the said office to the prejudice or subversion of the Church of Scotland as by law established, or the doctrines and privileges thereof.’”

I think it unnecessary to introduce the provision as to the subversion of the Church, for I do not see what power to subvert the Established Church can be possessed, through their connection with the University, by the persons from whom the declaration will be required. But I do conceive that the general principle of the declaration is one which may properly be followed, and that the House will think it only reasonable that what is required from lay Professors in the Scotch Universities should be equally required in Oxford and in Cambridge, more particularly as they will, in effect, only promise to obey the statutes of the University. Upon this subject, therefore, I propose to introduce the following clause into the Bill:—

“Every person hereafter to be elected or appointed to any Professorship in the said Universities, or either of them, or to the office of Tutor or Lecturer in any College within the same, shall, before he shall be capable of entering upon or discharging the duties of his office, or of receiving any emoluments thereof, make and subscribe before the Vice Chancellor of the University, or before the head or chief governor of the College for the time being (as the case may be), the declaration following:—‘I, A. B., do solemnly and sincerely declare that as Professor of [or Lecturer in —, or Tutor of —, as the case may be] and in the discharge of the said office, I will never endeavour, directly or indirectly, to teach or inculcate any opinion opposed to the Divine authority of the Holy Scriptures.’”

So far the declaration I propose is in the very words of the Scotch declaration; it then goes on to add—

“Or to the doctrine or discipline of the Church of England as by law established,”

being an abbreviated form, but in substance the same. I cannot help thinking that if the House agree to take what I have just read, with the other Amendments which I have ventured to suggest, they will, while leaving the main objects of the Bill absolutely untouched, sufficiently prove that it is not the intention of Parliament to subvert the religious system and discipline of the Church of England in the Universities; but that it is the intention of Parliament to reconcile it with liberality in the administration of that system. I do not propose anything, which could operate as an exclusive test, unless it could be seriously supposed that the Professor intended to violate the statutes of the University, and to abuse the opportunities of his office in a way which no man in this House would attempt to justify. I do not propose to call upon him for any declaration of personal opinion or belief. I only ask for precisely the same security which already is required in the case of the Established Church of Scotland. I confess I can hardly see how such a proposition can be reasonably objected to. The House will perhaps permit me to conclude by expressing my adoption—with the exception of a single expression, which I think ambiguous, and which might therefore be misunderstood—of a passage in a book, which was quoted or referred to by the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford on Wednesday last. The passage is one proceeding from a venerable man, whose authority I am sure will be none the less in this House, and none the less with my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, because the author, having served his country eminently for many years in high judicial position, and having acquired with all who know him a reputation for wisdom and personal virtue of the highest degree, has also conferred upon the country the benefit of giving to it such a successor to his name and reputation as my hon. and learned Friend. The advice which that excellent man, full of years and full of wisdom, has given as the result of his mature consideration—a result not arrived at without difficulty or without reluctance—is this. I have already said I shall omit a few words, and hereafter I shall give my reason for omitting them. He is addressing himself to those interested in the Universities, and wishing to maintain in them the system of religious education and instruction—

“Recognize an inevitable necessity, not the less inevitable because you may struggle against it with partial success once and again; make a virtue of the necessity; seek to guard your concession with all such conditions as may, in your opinion, make it most salutary for the future”—and that shall be my apology for seeking what I propose to do by my Amendments now—

“but remembering that England is no longer what she was when our Colleges were founded; that her population is not more increased in numbers than in wealth, and in at least a certain and improvable kind of education and refinement, in refined aspirations, to be guided rather than checked; and that the desire for academical training it is almost unnatural for the Universities to oppose; that, consequently, those who now besiege your citadel have, at the very least, a plausible ground of right; that their claim, if it be indeed rightful, should and can only be satisfied by full and frank concession—concession worthy of yourselves; that it is far better that those who press on you should enter by the gates than through a breach; and that it is far more Christianlike, and therefore far more politic, to admit them as brothers than as conquerors.”

The only words which I omitted were words which I observe were repeated by my hon. and learned Friend in his speech—“It is a case in which you give nothing if you give less than all.” These are the words which I say might be misunderstood; they might be taken to mean that the man who desired to keep his own share of the common good gave nothing if he did not give up his own share of everything that made it valuable to him. I do not think that was the sense in which the excellent man whose words I have quoted used these words; that is not the sense in which I would myself accept them; but, with that sole qualification, I am able myself, and I should be glad, if I were able, to persuade others, to act unreservedly in the spirit of this advice.

MR. G. O. MORGAN said, he had listened with the deepest attention to every word which had fallen from so distinguished an authority as the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer). And if he ventured in any way to criticize so masterly a speech, it was because he believed the supporters of the measure were entitled to base their defence of it upon much broader grounds. The compromise which the hon. and learned Gentleman wished to effect and the modifications which he desired to introduce into the Bill were such as he (Mr. Morgan) should view with regret. They amounted practically to the substitution of one test for another, and he believed that all these tests, restrictions, and disabilities were either essentially useless or essentially mischievous. They either excluded nobody, in which case they were not worth the paper they were written on, or they tended to narrow the area of selection and to diminish the number of candidates for Fellowships and tutors, and by diminishing the competition they necessarily tended to lower the standard of merit among the candidates. The principle involved in this Bill was one of the most important as well as one of the most clearly and strongly defined that ever was presented to the House; for he took it to be nothing more or less than—were they to go on restricting these great Universities, with their magnificent endowments, their unrivalled educational machinery, and their world-wide prestige, to the position of mere nurseries for the training of clergymen of the Church of England, or were they to regard them as national institutions administering public trusts for public purposes? If the narrower view, which regarded these Universities merely as theological Colleges were adopted, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Mowbray) undoubtedly had made out a fair case against the Bill. But could any unprejudiced man logically defend a system which excluded from all participation in the government of the Universities, and from all power of competing for any of the prizes or privileges that were worth competing for, one-half, and that not the least intelligent half of the population of the State. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman opposite was the old argument against secularization of Church property, which fell so flat on the country last year. According to his view, the property of the Colleges was impressed with certain trusts and must continue subject to them, and the State had no more right to wrest this property from the Church of England than to interfere with any man's private estate. A more fallacious argument never was addressed to the House. If the right of the State were excluded, and regard were had entirely to the intentions of the founders, the Church that would be entitled to this monopoly of endowments in the country would not be the Church of England but the Church of Rome. [Cries of "Oh!" and "No!"] The right hon. Gentleman had only put his finger on one single College out of the nineteen at Oxford to which that principle would not apply. ["Cambridge?"] Well, there were only three out of seventeen. The pious founders enjoined upon the holders of the Fellowships the duty of singing mass for the repose of their souls, and also enjoined strict rules of celibacy. By way of carrying out their intentions Roman Catholics now-a-days were shut out from the benefits of the Colleges, which were at the same time freely open to persons professing the opinions of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) and his hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley). The able argument of the right hon. Gentleman the late Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) that endowments were left to the Church of Rome as the national Church and passed to the Church of England when it became the national Church, was altogether inconsistent with the argument of his Colleague, that those endowments were private property and inalienable as such. The steps taken, in 1854, of throwing open Scholarships and Exhibitions in Oxford and Cambridge to Dissenters were either too little or too much. He would ask, was it really meant by this system of checks to keep the wolf out of the fold? But nothing could be more mischievous than a system of checks which were no checks at all. Now, he would like very much to know how many men trembling on the brink of Popery had subscribed to those tests; how many free-thinkers, how many men to whom religion was a mere sham and a name? Why, he himself knew an old Fellow of a College who used to boast that he would like to see the oath he would not take in order to keep his Fellowship. They admitted such men and excluded conscientious Dissenters. It was the old story—

Then it was said the Dissenters had got Colleges of their own, and this was only a sentimental grievance. He was not so much afraid now of this taunt of a sentimental grievance as he would have been twelve months ago. The Irish Church was then said to be a sentimental grievance, but it convulsed the country and it upset the Government. But this he would say, that if there was one question more than another upon which the Dissenters of this country had thoroughly made up their minds, it was this question of opening the Universities. The practical view taken by the constituencies of Wales and Scotland proved that. Hon. Gentlemen opposite might say, if they liked, that the number of Dissenters who would enter the Universities, in any case, was small, and, therefore, the grievance could not be very great. But they had no right to argue from the number of Dissenters who went to the Universities now, when they took away the attractions which would naturally draw them, to the number that would attend if the Universities were open. They had made the Dissenters a sort of proselytes of the outer gate, but when they came to the inner gate within which the good things were, then they shut it in their face and kept them out in the cold. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Mowbray) had said in his speech on Wednesday last that, as the Bill had only been printed on Thursday, the University of Oxford had not time to petition the House against the measure, but that was no argument against the Bill. If they had to wait in all cases to reform corporate bodies until those bodies invited reformation, they would have to wait for a very long time. If a Bill was brought forward to reform the Corporation of London, should they take the opinion of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen upon it? The Convocation at Oxford and the Senate at Cambridge were composed of highly respectable persons, but they did not represent the public opinion of the Universities. If the House wanted to find out the real feeling of the Universities upon this subject they must go to the Universities themselves, and to the gentlemen who were engaged there in the laborious work of tuition. These were the men who were the brain of the Universities, and they were ably represented in that House by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) and the hon. and learned Member for the city of Oxford (Mr. Vernon Harcourt). If the House went to them it would find that there was not only a majority, but a growing majority in favour of this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had said—

“Pass this Bill and you will destroy the religious character of the Universities.” That would be a grievous penalty indeed, and he, for one, would not be prepared to bear the blame of it. But he must add his voice to the protest of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General that this Bill would have no such effect. He protested against the assumption which underlay every sentence of the right hon. Gentleman, that men could be made religious or irreligious by Act of Parliament. Then it was said—“If you pass this Bill, will the religious parents of England send their sons to the Universities?” But did the right hon. Gentleman forget that the persons to be admitted by this Bill would be drawn from the great body of Christian Dissenters of England, than whom there were no men more anxious about the religious education of their children? He defied the right hon. Gentleman to say that the standard of religious education was lower in Wales or Scotland than it was in the most orthodox county in England. Then an argument was founded upon the names of the Colleges; but surely it might as well be argued that Ave Maria Lane and Paternoster Row must belong to the Church. It was said that they would have no security that the religious worship of the College chapels would be maintained. But the Bill provided for that. He could no more see how the presence of Dissenters in the University would be incompatible with the daily performance of worship in the chapels than the presence of Dissenters in a parish was incompatible with the due celebration of worship in the parish church. If ever there was a time when the Church of England could be said to be on her trial it was now, and was this the time to come down to that House and proclaim to the country that the position of the Church of England in the Universities was so insecure that she could not hold her own unless she were hemmed round by these absurd and obsolete safeguards? Such a defence as that was doing the Church of England more injury than the attacks of her most uncompromising enemies. If the Church of England would only trust a little more to the purity and simplicity of her doctrine than to these external sources of strength, he believed she would gain ten times more than by this miserable system of ecclesiastical exclusion. He looked upon this measure as a great act of justice, and believing that it was for the true interest of the nation, and that the cause of religion would gain rather than suffer by it, he should give it his hearty support.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: Sir, although as a new Member, I have much hesitation in taking part in a debate of such importance, I am compelled to do so by the keen interest which the Scotch Universities have in the question. This interest is not merely abstract, but is, as I shall hope to show, immediate and practical, being alluded to in the second clause of the Bill before the House. It is now fifteen years since Parliament abolished all religious tests among the Lay Faculties of the Northern Universities, and the experience which they have thus gained ought to be some guide to us now, either by confirming the apprehensions or removing the fears of those who doubt the wisdom of the proposed measure. From the time of the Reformation to 1853, the Professors of the Scotch Universities were subject to severe tests, and for a portion of that period to the vigilant visitation of the national Church; and by an Act of 1585 our graduates were included. The tests were perplexing in their variety; and although usually Presbyterian, yet at one time they were as strictly Episcopalian as those now in use at Oxford and Cambridge. Ultimately, in 1707, the Act of Security enjoined upon all Professors, who were then the sole academic governors of the Universities, the signature of the Westminster Confession of Faith “as the confession of their faith.” These words were too solemn and significant to be lightly treated, but their application led to so many inconveniences that one or two Universities—notably that of Edinburgh—declined to enforce the Act, while the others which obeyed the law were in constant trouble in consequence of it. In 1853 my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate introduced an Act for the total abolition of tests in the Lay Faculties of the Scottish Universities. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) moved the second reading of this Act, and was met with strong opposition of a like character, and, in like terms, to that used on the present occasion. The then Member for the University of Oxford (Sir Robert H. Inglis) urged that the severance of the lay faculties from the Church of Scotland would be injurious to the highest interests of that Church. He stated that the direct consequence of admitting Dissenters among the governing bodies of the Universities would be to damage the theological teaching of the ministers of the Church who were then, as they are now, educated within the Universities. He even feared that, if the measure passed, the Universities themselves would be soon torn from the bonds which united them to our common Christianity. The hon. Baronet predicted that, if the Act of Security were tampered with, the union of the two countries would be endangered, although it had been ratified by the solemn Oath of the Queen. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) also warned the House that they were enacting a measure for filling the chairs of our Scottish Universities with infidels and Papists. Scotland was, therefore, fully warned that disasters would follow the adoption of the Act—the picture of that “terrible future,” as the hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Mowbray) has now called it, being painted with as dark a background, and with as gloomy colours, as we have seen used on the present occasion. But what have been the actual results of our experience? Half an ordinary generation and a whole professorial one have passed since 1853, and not a single infidel nor one Roman Catholic occupies a chair amongst us. Dissenters in abundance have professorial seats, and this may strengthen the fears of the hon. Gentleman opposite. Not a few of these have come from Oxford and Cambridge, and are much valued by us, but these signers of the Thirty-Nine Articles, and the three Articles of the 36th Canon, have never attacked the Church as established by law in Scotland. Free Churchmen and United Presbyterians, I am glad to say, also occupy our chairs; but, nevertheless, the Church of Scotland, through the Theological Faculties, continues to train its future ministers with the most perfect confidence. The graduates have now received a large share in the government of the University. They are associated into a General Council, or, as it would be termed in Oxford, a Convocation, with a power, which the latter does not possess, of initiating reforms.

The majority of this Council, I believe, consists of Dissenters, when you include Episcopalians under that category, and yet they have never, by a single act in their academical capacity, tried to loosen the ties which bind the Theological Faculties to the Church. Our ministers are trained by a three-years' curriculum, and then may take theological degrees, which, incredible though it may appear to hon. Gentlemen opposite, are not cumbered by tests of any kind. Though Dissenters can and do take these degrees in divinity, I have never heard of an instance in which they use their academical vantage ground to assail the Church of Scotland. The fact is, that our Theological Faculties act in the most perfect harmony with the Lay Faculties; and, in my ten years' residence in Edinburgh, I have never met a single minister of the Church of Scotland, who has not cordially approved of the abolition of the tests by the Act of 1853. Then, as religion has not suffered by the abolition of tests, we may be assured that the temporal interests of our Universities have actually been benefited by the change. For ten years before the Act of 1853 the Scottish Universities were losing their hold on the affections of the people; for the Free Church had spread Dissent over the land, and one-half the nation was not in accord with the national Church. Steps were taken to raise Colleges for the purpose of competing with the ancient Universities, which for centuries had been closely bound up with the national life. But since tests have been abolished, complete sympathy has been established between the Universities and the people. The proof of this is, that both students and graduates have increased. In the University of Edinburgh, with which I am best acquainted, if we take the averages of ten years before the Act and of ten years subsequent to it, the increase of students is 12 per cent, and that of graduates is 170 per cent. This gratifying increase of academic activity, as shown by graduation, is, however, partly accountable to other reforms which followed in the train of the first. Surely, Sir, I was right in stating that the Scotch experience is worthy of your attention. It is true that I have been obliged to confine our religious experience to our Theological Faculties, because our northern Universities have no religious teaching in the Lay Faculties. We may be wrong in this, though I do not think we are. It is true that there is neither denominational teaching in our primary schools, nor a mixture of religion with secular instruction in our Universities, yet no one will accuse Scotland of being an irreligious nation. At the same time, the supporters of the Bill now before the House—although they think that the trumpet-note of alarm that religion is in danger has been sounded too loudly—do not wish to interfere with the established system of combining secular with religious teaching in Oxford and Cambridge. All that I contend for is this—that if infidelity, if irreligion, if hostility to the Church be necessary consequences of the abolition of tests, then they were more likely to crop up in rank luxuriance under our free Scottish system than they will under the closer collegiate system of the English Universities. That they have not done so proves that the fears of hon. Gentlemen opposite are altogether illusory. The right hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Mowbray) denied that Oxford and Cambridge Universities are national institutions, and described them as special institutions held in trust for a particular denomination. This argument we on this side of the House are not likely to admit; but I agree with the right hon. Gentleman in the first part of his statement, that they cannot claim to be truly national institutions, when, as a fact, they limit their privileges to from one-third to one-half of England and exclude Scotland and Ireland. I claim for Scotland the right to participate in all the educational advantages of the great English Universities. We freely recognize in them a finer culture and a more extended scholarship than we are able to offer in our own Universities. The love for the English Universities, which induces so many Scottish students to attend them, existed in the breasts of my countrymen long before Oxford and Cambridge had loaves and fishes, in the form of endowments, to tempt us over the Border. It requires little knowledge of the early history of Oxford to know that she was divided into two nations—one of northern men, the other of southern men. They were not unequal, either in number or in power, and fought against each other many fierce intellectual conflicts of Realists and Nominalists, and side by side with each other many fierce physical battles of Gown against Town. These memories cling to us yet, and we still send our students, by the aid of scholarships, to obtain the high culture of the English Universities. The result has been beneficial to the whole nation. By the channel of communication which these scholarships keep open, you have received from us such men as the right rev. Prelate at the head of the English Church. We ask then, as a part of a common kingdom, that our Scottish Presbyterian students should enter the Universities—which rich endowments have raised to so high a position in learning and scholarship—upon the same footing as Episcopalian students. I hear an hon. Member say that they are free to enter. That is true, but they are only free to win honours shorn of all that renders them valuable; for, surely academic degrees divested of academic privileges are singularly barren. If you throw open the gates of an orchard to the boys of a mixed school, and tell them that all are free to enter, it would be a mockery, when they did enter, to rule that only the Episcopalian boys should climb the trees and pluck the fruits, while the Dissenting boys must keep to the dead level of the walks. Would you be surprised if the generous nature of boys revolted against the partiality, and if they viewed it both as an insult and as an injury. But this is practically what is done to the youth of the nation who enter the portals of the great English Universities. It does not mend the matter to say that tests have now worn down to such mere formality, that they are readily accepted by Dissenters, and especially by Presbyterians. These tests deter men of keen conscience and quick susceptibilities from accepting Fellowships, though they readily admit those of lax religious faith; but this, Sir, is their condemnation. The Solicitor General referred to the religious persuasion of the Senior Wrangler of the present year as a barrier to his obtaining the fruition of his labours; but this is no isolated case. I know a man who was Second Wrangler in his year, and who has since honoured the University which trained him by advancing pure mathematical science more than any man in this country. His name is as well known and honoured in Continental States as it is here; but this man, I believe, never even obtained his degree, certainly not his Fellowship. If the endowment of a Fellowship be worth anything, here was the occasion for its application as a means for giving learned leisure to a man whose genius produced fruits of no marketable value. But my friend was a Jew, like the Senior Wrangler of this year, and so Cambridge rejected him, and he had to win bread for himself as an actuary in an insurance office. It is true that I could cite cases of an opposite kind, in which Presbyterians, though strongly attached to their own forms of worship, yet, finding little repugnant to their doctrines in the English Church, have signed the Articles and conformed to its services in order to enjoy the Fellowships, but only till they had an opportunity of returning to their first love. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen laugh, but surely tests taken in such a loose fashion cannot benefit the Church which requires them, and may sear the consciences of those who take them. The temptation to do so is great—for infidelity after signature is not attended by penalty. In conclusion, let me express the hope that the effects of this measure will be as beneficial to the English Universities as a like measure has been to the northern Universities. Notwithstanding the splendid histories of Oxford and Cambridge, and their present educational glories, there must be a feeling of regret on the part of their friends that they are so scantily attended by students. In Scotland we have one University student for every 900 of the population; in England, including Durham, and allowing 1,000 matriculated students for London University, there is only one student to 4,400 of the population. No leading State, except Russia, has such scanty numbers. The conclusion is obvious that the English Universities are not now in accord with the mind of the English people. It was not so in past periods of their history. At one time Oxford alone had a much larger proportion of students to the population than Scotland has now; and even after the Reformation she had three times as many as at present. Its educational revenues in those prosperous times were but moderate. Less than one year of Oxford's revenues would now buy up the whole capital of the University of Edinburgh and all the salaries of its Professors capitalized at twenty years purchase; and yet, with all these gigantic resources, Oxford possesses only 200 more students than the poor northern University. What can be the reason for this small diffusion of her educational powers? It is not owing to any weakness in her teachers, for they are of the highest eminence and scholarship; it cannot be due to a restricted curriculum, for that is now extended and liberal; it certainly does not result from stinginess in money rewards, for they lavish these with a prodigal hand. Indeed, we are told by the Rev. Mark Pattison, the Rector of Lincoln College, in his excellent work on academical organization, that one out of three students at Oxford are paid for attendance in the form of scholarships. Yet, with all these academic inducements and bounties, the students only slowly increase, and merely in proportion as the bounties are augmented. I believe that there is more than one cause for this want of sympathy between the Universities and the people, but the main cause certainly is that they have raised a denominational barrier between themselves and half the nation. This Bill does not propose to knock down this barrier, but it makes many breaches in it, through which numerous students will pass. Burke has said—

“The citizens of a State are a partnership; a partnership in all science, in all art, in every virtue, in all perfection.”

It would be well for the English Universities if they recognized fully the truth of these noble words, and if they gave to all citizens alike, and without reserve, the freest partnership in those treasures of learning and of virtue which they are so well calculated to impart, and which the nation has entrusted to their keeping.

MR. NEWDEGATE thought the argument which the hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh opposite (Mr. Playfair) had just addressed to the House was most peculiar, notwithstanding the eloquence in which it was clothed. The hon. Gentleman, for example, omitted to allude to the fact, that the appointment of Heads of Houses at Oxford or Cambridge were not made or held on the same terms as the appointment of Professors in the Scotch Universities. The hon. Member had alluded to expressions used by the late Sir Robert Inglis and himself in 1853, when the tests for admission to the Professorships of the Scotch Universities were about to be abolished, and when he had asserted that these Professorships might be held thenceforth by infidels or Roman Catholics. He denied that such had been the result; but was the hon. Member prepared to say that no person who disbelieved the great truths of Christianity held a Professorship in any of the Scotch Universities? The hon. Member shrank from such an assertion; indeed, if he had not, it was evident the tests were abolished; that he had no criterion by means of which he could dispute the opposite of his inference. All this part of the hon. Member's argument rested on mere assumption. While paying the highest tribute to the superior culture of the English Universities the hon. Member expected the House to accept his dictum, that none of the Professors at any of the Universities in Scotland disputed the great truths of Christianity, or had a leaning towards the Church of Rome. And how did the hon. Member support his assertion? What was his illustration? One of the hon. Gentleman's main objections to the system in force at Oxford and Cambridge was that it had excluded a gentleman who was of the Jewish persuasion, and, consequently, not a Christian. The hon. Gentleman had failed to give any valid assurance that the anticipations which he had formed in 1853 had not been realized, or that they might not be realized. The hon. Member for Denbighshire (Mr. G. O. Morgan) had been kind enough to declare that his (Mr. Newdegate's) religious opinions were identical with those held by the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley). Now, he felt bound in justice to the hon. Member for Peterborough to remind the House of the fact that the hon. Gentleman had repeatedly declared, that there was no such identity, although it sometimes happened that the hon. Gentleman's views coincided with his own on subjects relating to the effects of the Roman Catholic religion. With regard to his own opinions, they were Catholic in the sense of the Church of England, and therefore strongly Protestant—as strongly Protestant as those of any Italian. Such were his opinions, but they were not shaped by the hon. Member for Peterborough, as that hon. Gentleman had expressly stated more than once. The hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) had asked the House not to insist upon retaining the existing tests, because he asserted that the law would be sufficient without them. It appeared to him that our modern progress was very reactionary, and he would mention a striking instance, which proved the truth of this assertion. Formerly the law enacted that no one except a Protestant should occupy the Throne of these realms, but Parliament found this security so insufficient, that forcible and emphatic declarations were enacted and were by law required to be made, and had been made by every Sovereign since the days of James II. The tendency of the present day, however, seemed to go back to the practice of the period when there was no such test. The hon. Member for Denbighshire had declared that the Universities were not national, meaning probably that they were not cosmopolitan. The Universities of Oxford and Cambridge were no less national than the Church of England, and he denied that the Church of England was not a national institution simply because Dissenters existed. Indeed, if he were to hold the opposite doctrine he should be adopting the intolerance of the Church of Rome, whereas he maintained that the tolerance of the Church of England and the open existence of Dissent were tests of her nationality. The hon. Member's statement, however, if true, which it was not, afforded no argument for sweeping away the securities by which the law had hitherto limited the teaching of the Universities to the doctrines of the Church of England. If any charge of intellectual or literary deficiency could be substantiated against Oxford and Cambridge, the promoters of the present Bill would be able to make out a case; but, in point of fact, their excellence in these respects was the cause of envy, and it was to gratify that envy the House was asked to abolish the limits within which the Universities had attained so high a degree of excellence. He (Mr. Newdegate) believed that if the constituencies of the kingdom had been fairly informed on this subject the majority would be found to be adverse to the Bill. With reference to the Amendment intended by the hon. and learned Member for Richmond, he observed that they afforded evidence of his consciousness of the necessity for some test or criterion of the religious opinions held by the Heads of the Colleges; but, inasmuch as his Amendment would require the test of each Head of a College alone, he would thereby disassociate the Head of the House from the Fellows of the College, and would destroy the constitution of the Colleges. And the hon. Gentleman concluded by an exhortation to Members on the Opposition side of the House to yield their opinions, and to acquiesce in that which they disapproved. That doctrine, if accepted generally must prove fatal to all Parliamentary government which depends upon the honest expression of opinion in that House; because it would destroy all sense of personal responsibility, not merely the responsibility of the Administration of the day, but all sense of personal responsibility on the part of each Member of this House to those who had returned him as their representative on the faith of his fairly expressing their opinions. He had been returned to that House to oppose this measure, and it was a duty in which he would not fail.

MR. W. FOWLER said, I shall not detain the House, but I desire to say a few words on this very important question. I am glad that the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Mowbray) has admitted that the Universities are "national" institutions. This clears the ground; but he goes on to say that, being such, they are "invested with a distinct trust, connecting education with a definite form of religious teaching." It is in the first place to be observed that the "form" now used is not that originally intended. Hon. Gentlemen opposite may talk as they please about being "Catholics," but I maintain that it is the glory of the Church of England that she is a Protestant institution. Moreover, I say that the venerable men who founded the Colleges at Oxford and Cambridge would not have approved the form of religion now taught there. At the Reformation the mind of the nation changed, and the consequent change in the Universities was "inevitable," as the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General has justly remarked. And yet we are often told that these tests, as now established, cannot, under any circumstances, be altered. Now I desire to consider this question from a point of view somewhat different from that which has been sometimes taken. The law which creates these tests was a natural law in former times, when intolerance was the rule of the State. We then had one predominant religion, starving out, if possible, all other religions. The law, in short, adopted one religion as true and declared all others to be false. All such intolerant laws, of which the present law is a remnant, said, in short—"We have the truth, and we will force you directly or indirectly to take our view of the truth." This is entirely contrary to the spirit of Christianity, which says—"I have the truth, and I will, if I can, persuade you to accept it." The times are past when torture or imprisonment for religious belief are possible; but such a law as that we are discussing amounts, in fact, to an indirect persecution—"No, no!"—I say "yes;" Hon. Gentlemen may say "no" as long as they like: the fact remains. Hon. Gentlemen opposite say there is no grievance; but I say there is a grievance. The first thing I did on coming down to the House to-night was to present a petition from a gentleman who was Senior Wrangler and First Smith's Prizeman in 1861, and who has ever since resided in Cambridge; but who, because he is a Dissenter, has not had his Fellowship, nor been admitted to his proper position in the Senate of the University. The truth is that the Dissenters go to the University as an inferior caste, and are like goods marked "dangerous." I am sometimes disposed to think that you had better never have removed your old restrictions than attempt to remain in your present illogical position. But then we are perpetually met with what the Solicitor General calls the non possumus argument. We are told that we must look to the will of the founder and abide by it. Now, in the first place, speaking generally, I think we allow men to speak too long after they are dead. But, in the next place, you do not respect the will of the founder. Only lately, the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Fitzmaurice) told me of a case where a Roman Catholic who had distinguished himself as a graduate was refused a Fellowship in his College which had been founded by his own ancestor. There was no respect here to the "will of the founder." But then, it is said, even if you do not have the same religious teaching as that indicated by the founder, you must have some religious teaching. The hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) has shown that, even if the Bill pass, you will still have religious teaching. But I would ask, if you are so fearful of scepticism and so jealous as to your religious teaching, how is it that you do not keep out this scepticism with your present machinery? I confess I do not think that any harm would be done by the addition to your numbers of a few distinguished men who do not conform to the Church of England. They are certainly far better than men who profess to conform and do not in heart believe what they say when they accept these tests. Hon. Gentlemen are fighting with the creations of their own imagination when they say that, because a few Dissenters are added to the Senate, the whole teaching and government of the Universities will be changed. There is a great inconsistency in the whole matter. You allow the Parsee and the Dissenter and the Church of England man to mingle together as students at the age when they are peculiarly susceptible to impressions from men of their own age, and when, therefore, these heretical people are most dangerous, and you express no fears; but when they are grown up and have attained to distinction, you are afraid of them and exclude them. And now I want to ask hon. Gentlemen opposite what is this religious training which is, as we are told, of such great importance to the nation. I cannot describe it from my own experience, as I was not educated in either of the old Universities; but I will describe it in the words of one of the most distinguished graduates that the University of Oxford has produced in our days. He says—

“For years—I had almost said centuries—the prevailing temper of the governors of Oxford has been steadily set against religious earnestness, from whatever quarter it may come.”

And again—

“I do say that to speak of the Oxford system having been founded on religious influences or guided by personal religious teaching in any sense which could be interfered with by the presence of Nonconformists in Convocation is really to fly in the face of the plainest facts, and to take refuge in the merest theory and imaginative dreaming.”

These are the words of Her Majesty's Solicitor General. Something has been said about the College chapels, but I deny that mere going to College chapel is religious training. Moreover, whatever good there is in it is expressly retained in the Bill. But after all, says the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite—if you get this Bill, something else will follow. So it may if the Bill works well, but not otherwise. There is nothing to force Parliament on, if this legislation proves injurious. I am satisfied, Sir, that there is no danger in this Bill. You will not find Dissenters more sceptical than Members of the Church of England; and, more than this, I am sure that the young men who come from the families of Dissenters will be found to have had just as careful a training as those who have been brought up in the Church; and even if Dissenters should hereafter have more power in the Universities, the hon. and learned gentleman may still use the old motto, Dominus illuminatio mea, without fear. Before I conclude, I wish to refer to the speech of the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) last year, in which he made some strong remarks as to the dangers of “free thought.” I think, Sir, we ought not to give way to these fears. It is an age of inquiry, and the University ought not to shrink from it. We cannot stop the progress of men's minds, especially when we have a free Press. It is the old story about hedging in the cuckoo. Men will think; and thought will be free within as well as without the Universities. Good men are too timid, and act as if they had no confidence in the faith they profess. If they believe in their religion, they believe that it will prevail. I will only add that I do not think the declaration proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Richmond can be accepted. I have heard his speech with much pleasure and admiration, but I do not like his proposal. I ask the House to pass the Bill, and thus to break off another link from the chain which connects us with the times of intolerance and persecution, on which we look back with no kindly feelings.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question put, “That the Debate be now adjourned.”—(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

The House divided:—Ayes 75; Noes 251: Majority 176.

Question again proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question,”

MR. BERESFORD HOPE, who rose amid cries of "Order," said, that the question was one which peculiarly affected his constituency (Cambridge University), and it had assumed a new complexion since the speech of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer). ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is out of Order in now addressing the House.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: The Motion for adjournment having been defeated, I was rising to speak upon the Main Question.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman having made a Motion has exhausted his powers in this debate.

MR. NEWDEGATE, who rose amid cries of "Spoke," said, that he should conclude with a Motion.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman having spoken in this debate cannot make any Motion.

MR. BENTINCK wished to point out to the House—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member having seconded a Motion cannot speak again.

MR. BENTINCK said, he rose to Order. He apprehended that having merely seconded the Motion by a gesture he was at liberty to address the House on the Main Question.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member having seconded the Motion is not entitled to address the House.

MR. RAIKES moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Raikes.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he thought that the speeches addressed to the House to-night called for an answer from that (the Opposition) side, and they had a right to expect that the House would hear them; but, as he had himself held out expectations to his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) that they would wait to see what course would be taken upon the Amendments of which notice had been given, and as he knew that great numbers of hon. Gentlemen were informed that there would be no division on the second reading, he thought that they were bound to allow the debate now to be brought to a conclusion. He hoped, therefore, that the Motion for adjournment would not be pressed, and that he should then be allowed to say a few words upon the Main Question.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked whether it was not competent for an hon. Member who had spoken upon the Main Question to move the adjournment?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, the silence which my hon. and learned Friend (Sir Roundell Palmer) has preserved for so many years upon this question is at last broken, and the House has listened to his remarks with obvious interest. I was not in the House in 1854, and therefore was not able to take any share in those debates in which he took a prominent and, no doubt, very effective part. My hon. and learned Friend tells us that at that time he foresaw the course of events, and rather pointed to my noble Friend who is not now in the House (Lord Stanley) as having been the author of the present measure. I believe that at that time my noble Friend drew a distinct line between the Universities and the Colleges. Even in more recent times, within the last two years, the Solicitor General himself was not prepared to interfere with the Colleges, as he has by the present Bill and the measure of last year. Upon the first occasion when he introduced a Bill on this subject he said distinctly that it would interfere only with the Universities; he kept it entirely apart from the plan of my right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie). He added, "I have nothing to say upon that Bill," and though I know he was even then in some doubt upon the subject, he took no part in supporting that Bill, and did not even vote upon it. This was what occurred in 1866 and 1867, and it was not till 1868 that the Solicitor General combined the Bill of my right hon. Friend with his own measure. Now, I mention these things, not for the purpose of throwing any discredit upon those whose opinions have so advanced, but I may justly claim for those who took a different view that they prophesied that that course must be taken, and that that little Bill was the precursor of a much larger Bill, just as the present measure is only the precursor of some very much larger one. [Cheers.]

The hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) cheers that sentiment. He has always wished that a permissive or quasi permissive Bill should give place to a compulsory Bill, and no doubt in a short time we shall see this Bill followed by measures as strong and as compulsory as those which we predicted when the Bill was introduced in 1866. My hon. and learned Friend has endeavoured to lead the House to the conclusion that this Bill will practically effect nothing in the Universities, that it will leave things exactly where they are, that we need not be in the least afraid of it, and that though there were logical sequences to the Bill of 1854, there are none to this Bill. Now, is that the case? Are there no such logical sequences to the present measure? What has he told us? Why, that practically the connection of the University with the Church of England will be just what it was before; that the University will be a place for the promotion of religion and learning just in the same sense as before; that nothing will happen on the passing of this Bill, which practically requires the religion of the Church of England from those who are in a professional and tutorial capacity. If we are to judge a measure by the intentions of the introducer of it, as the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) stated, what were the words of the proposer of the present Bill in 1867, when he had not arrived at the conclusion of advocating anything like this measure, for then he did not deal with the Colleges at all, but only with the Universities? The hon. and learned Member for Exeter (the Solicitor General) then said, speaking on the second reading of his Bill—

“I am ready to admit the Bill is a small one and only deals with one definite point; nor do I expect if it were to pass that any great or important changes would take place in consequence. But, on the other hand, I should not be dealing candidly with the House if I disguised from it that the Bill put forward a very important principle. It will establish the nationality of the University as against the Church of England—it will destroy its exclusive character and change its constitution.”

That was explicit, and what my hon. and learned Friend says he means. The hon. and learned Member for Richmond has alluded to what took place in 1866, and what was said on that occasion had a soothing effect, it appears, on the mind of the hon. and learned Member, who, however, if he had perceived the real meaning of those expressions, should have resisted this measure to the death. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government expressed an opinion with regard to the admission of the Dissenters, and I understood my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond to say that a quotation I had made from that speech did not express the right hon. Gentleman's meaning according to the passage which he afterwards read. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government on a recent occasion represented most distinctly the danger of the admission of different creeds into the governing body, especially of the Colleges, and in 1867 he made a speech against the Bill of my hon. and learned Friend, and expressed in strong language the propriety of keeping up the religious character of the Universities, that character being a definite and Church of England one. I admit that there is as much personal religion among Dissenters as among Churchmen, and that many of the Dissenters are men of deep religious feeling, but that renders this question more serious when you bring Dissenters in contact with the Colleges. The hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh University (Mr. Playfair) speaks of Oxford as if it were Edinburgh; but the fact is that in Edinburgh the students are spread through the town, while in Oxford there are Colleges, in which they reside, and if you introduce the element of religious discord into the Colleges you will not be doing that which will conduce to the advantage of those Colleges. At Oxford, there are Colleges with four or five resident tutors, and I assume that if the Bill were to come into operation there would be among them men with too strong religious feelings to allow them to conform to the Church of England. Suppose a Roman Catholic, or a Jew, or an Unitarian to be admitted to a Fellowship in one of these small Colleges. That would alter the relations that existed between the Fellows. The Head might still be of the Church of England, but the conversation, the discipline, everything would be changed. There would no longer be that freedom of intercourse in the discipline, religious as well as other, which existed before. [“Oh!”] The College would be what it was not before, a body of persons living together, with different religious sentiments. And, in addition, persons without religion at all are to be admitted. I admit that the conduct of some persons who are now admitted on taking the test, in indulging in other places in expressions of infidelity—in the College they are bound by a certain respect to decency to pay what is called homage to religion—is disgraceful to them, but it does not follow that the admission of a person without taking any test at all, is desirable, although he may be a more honest man; for the number of those who so disgrace themselves is not great, and they constitute but rare exceptions. According to the statutes of the Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, the Fellows, as a governing body, act together as members of the Church of England, carrying on religious instruction in accordance with that profession. In the case of the Endowed Schools, where persons of all creeds are admitted to the benefit of the schools, this House has always refused to admit Dissenters into the governing body of trustees of any Church of England foundation. The hon. Member argued that if the intentions of the founders of these institutions were to be respected, it should be remembered that the founders were Roman Catholics. That argument introduces a wide question, and has an application not only to Colleges and Universities, but to the Church of England itself. It would establish a principle calculated to pull down the Church of England. Now, I hold that there was not an alteration in the position of the Church of England at the time of the Reformation, but only a fair and reasonable change in the character of the Church, which, having thrown off certain errors, still continued to be the national Church, and entitled to the endowments. On the same principle, I hold that the Colleges are entitled to their endowments. I should like to see something done to remedy what some may feel to be a grievance. I wish very much there could be created out of the funds of the Universities—of the Colleges if it may be—Fellowships which may be held as a reward by those who come up, whatever their creed may be, and whom we have admitted to all the benefits of education; and I should be glad if they could be put in a position which would show that they had won honours at the University; but I object to an admixture in the governing bodies, in the Colleges, and in the University itself, which must necessarily lead to their being eventually secularized. If the time ever comes which you anticipate, when persons of different creeds shall be blended together in the governing bodies, the time must be when respect for conscience among the men composing them will eventually lead to the secularization of those endowments, and to getting rid of all connection between religion and the University as such. That is what we protest against. That is what was foreseen by Sir William Heathcote, in 1866, when he wished to bring this controversy to a satisfactory conclusion. For three years my hon. and learned Friend (Sir Roundell Palmer) has been looking on in silence, and at last he has been compelled to speak. He proposes certain Amendments, and I should be sorry to say offhand what I think of them, but I see plainly enough that hon. Gentlemen opposite do not want to change one test for another, and they would rather prefer that which exists than that which my hon. and learned Friend proposes. At the same time, as my right hon. Friend (Mr. Mowbray) said, there is a strong desire if it be possible to bring this question to a conclusion; it must be a satisfactory conclusion; and, as far as I am concerned, I should be glad to give my assent to anything I could accept without violation of principle; but so far as I can see at present, I do not believe that these clauses, which it will be necessary to consider carefully, would be such that I could assent to them as a settlement without violation of principle. I express myself strongly upon these matters, because I feel strongly. I trust that hon. Members will not be led by the bigotry of latitudinarianism to intolerance to the Church of England, but will permit us to hold, without intolerance, to that which we already possess, and will believe that, in maintaining the right, as I hold, of the Church of England to those endowments for its benefit in the Colleges and in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, I am not seeking to deprive them of privileges to which I do not believe them to be entitled. I am desirous at the same time that they should have the benefits of a liberal education in the Universities without claiming positions there which, I believe, were never intended for them, and would not be a benefit to them, but would lead to fresh disputes and controversies. With that belief I have always opposed this Bill in its present shape and I always shall.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, it being understood that no division is to be taken at this stage of the Bill, and that there has not been any desire on the part of the Universities, or those who have spoken for them—as I can affirm—to prevent a liberal education being given in the Universities to those who are not members of the Church of England, the only question we have to consider is how we can reconcile education, followed by all honours and rewards, with certain qualifications, such as are required in other institutions called national, for members of the governing body. It is with a view to this reconciliation that I am anxious to see the Amendments of the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer). They have been lucidly explained, but the House ought to see them, and the Universities and Colleges should have an opportunity of considering them, before any definite action is taken. For this reason, while I cannot vote for the second reading—for I cannot take the Bill as it stands—I am willing to wait until we have seen the Amendments, and, therefore, in case of a division, I shall take the course—unusual for me—of leaving the House, in order to reserve for myself the opportunity of considering the Bill and the Amendments in Committee, and seeing whether a settlement can be arrived at which may be satisfactory to all parties.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: Sir, I will not take up time now by replying to the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. It may be convenient, perhaps, as my hon. and learned Friend has given me an opportunity of seeing his Amendments, that I should state how they strike me and what of them in principle I can accept and what I cannot accept. As I understand the Amendments of my hon. and learned Friend, they may be divided broadly into two parts—first, certain verbal Amendments which he thinks will make the Bill more clear than it is at present, and the insertion of a clause by which the doctrine, discipline, and public worship of the Church of England, according to the existing ordinances and statutes of the Universities, subject to all future legal changes and all inherent powers of change in the Universities and Colleges, shall, so far as this Act is concerned, be preserved intact. These Amendments will only make more clear the object of the Bill, and, as far as I am concerned, they shall be accepted frankly. By the other Amendment my hon. and learned Friend intends to propose the adoption of what may be called a negative test; and to provide that lay Professors shall undertake as Professors not to teach anything contrary to Holy Scripture or the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England. At whatever risk of misconstruction and of pain to myself in differing from one for whom I have so profound a respect, I must say that no consideration will induce me to accept the latter Amendment. I say that for this other reason—it appears to me to be unnecessary, and it will therefore be purely mischievous. I have never disguised the difficulties surrounding this measure. I should be ashamed of myself if I spoke with anything but the respect and sympathy to which they are entitled of the views and apprehensions as to the security of the future religious teaching of the Universities which, although they appear to me to be quite unfounded, are entertained sincerely by hon. Gentlemen opposite. I will only ask them to be equally fair with me. I will ask them to admit that there is a considerable amount of evil which needs to be remedied. I ask them to admit that there is a certain amount of wrong and injustice which calls loudly for redress. No measure of this kind can be passed into law without a certain amount of risk in theory and it may be of evil in practice. The question for us as statesmen and lovers of our country is this,—Is the gain we seek worth the price at which we propose to purchase it? Is the state of things which we propose for the future better or not better than the state of things which we know exists? This I conceive to be the true issue in this case. Upon that issue my own judgment is in favour of going forward, and upon that issue with the greatest respect, and yet with perfect confidence, I venture to ask the judgment of the House of Commons.

Question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday 5th May.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE TWO HOUSES.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he would beg to give notice that he would tomorrow move that, in conformity with the Message from the Lords, a Committee of six Members be appointed for the purpose of taking into consideration the arrangement of Business in relation to the two Houses in the hope of devising some means for improving them. That would best be done by moving that the Message of the Lords be taken into consideration. It would come on immediately after the Notices as an Order of the Day.

SEA FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. BLAKE, Bill to amend the Laws relative to the Sea Fisheries of Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BLAKE, Viscount BURKE, Colonel ANNESLEY, and Mr. KAVANAGH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 51.]

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

Committee—Common Law Courts (Ireland) (9).

COMMON LAW COURTS (IRELAND) BILL.

(Earl Granville.)

(NO. 9). COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD WESTBURY moved to insert a new clause, vesting the appointment of the Master and certain other officers in the Chief Judge of each Court. At present this patronage was vested in the Lord Lieutenant, and the exercise of it was sometimes accompanied by anomalous and inconvenient results. The English Judges appointed the officers of their own Courts, and it was invidious to place the Irish Judges in a different position, especially as these officers were important auxiliaries in the administration of the courts. The change was recommended by a Royal Commission in 1862, and the present was a very opportune moment for carrying it into effect, there being little probability of the patronage being exercised for some time. He was glad to learn that the Government were prepared to accede to the proposal.

LORD DUFFERIN said, that the object of the measure being to assimilate the procedure of the Common Law Courts in England and Ireland, the Government were of opinion that on this point also there should be an assimilation, and they were prepared to accept the clause moved by his noble and learned Friend.

LORD CAIRNS said, it was most anomalous that appointments which in this country were made by the Chiefs of the different Courts should in Ireland be made by the Lord Lieutenant. The existing practice in Ireland was inconvenient and injurious, and placed an invidious and responsible task on the Irish Government. He could quite understand their willingness to get rid of that task, for it was only natural that there should be differences of opinion between the Government which appointed these officers and the Judges, who, of course, believed themselves to be best qualified to make the selection.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that he had on a former occasion expressed a strong opinion on the matter, and he was therefore glad the Government had accepted the clause. He was sure they had done so on principle, and not on account of the probability of the exercise of the patronage being remote.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that his assent to a proposition of this nature was not new, as he approved such a change when he acted as a Commissioner on the subject with the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Chelmsford), and his signature was appended to the Report.

Clause agreed to.

Further Amendments made : The Report thereof to be received on Friday next.

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock, to Thursday next,

IRELAND—PROPERTY OF THE IRISH CHURCH.—QUESTION.

MR. MELLOR said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is a fact that Archbishop Bramhall was instrumental in purchasing tithes from lay impropriators in Ireland amounting to £30,000 per annum or more; and, whether the purchase money was or was not raised by large private subscriptions in England; and, if so, whether the tithes so purchased by that most Right Reverend Prelate will be retained by the disestablished Church in Ireland?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Question put to me by the hon. Member refers to a point of historical investigation to which I had no time to allude in the speech I made on the subject of the Irish Church, and which I can hardly explain in a satisfactory manner within the compass of a reply to a Question. I must, therefore, ask the hon. Gentleman to be content for the present with my making a very brief answer to the various portions of his Question. I do not think it is the fact—

“That Archbishop Bramhall was instrumental in purchasing tithes from lay impropriators in Ireland amounting to £30,000 per annum or more.”

I have no doubt that Archbishop Bramhall did acquire, during the reign of Charles I., both very considerable amounts of tithes and quantities of land for the Church; and that he may have given a sum of money for that purpose I am not prepared to dispute. But I do not believe that these transactions were at all in the nature of what are now understood as purchases. Therefore, to the question whether the purchase money was or was not raised by large private subscriptions in England, I must answer that I am not aware that any proof exists that any considerable sum of money was raised by private subscriptions in England for that purpose. With regard to the latter part of the Question—namely—

“Whether the tithes so purchased by that most Right Reverend Prelate will be retained by the disestablished Church in Ireland,”

That of course the hon. Member would be able to answer from the Bill itself. They would not be retained.

LAW OF EXTRADITION.—QUESTION.

MR. M'CULLAGH TORRENS said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill this Session embodying the Recommendations contained in the Report of the Select Committee of last year in favour of a uniform and permanent Law of Extradition?

MR. OTWAY said, in reply, that it was the intention of his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to introduce into the other House of Parliament a Bill on the subject to which his hon. Friend had referred.

INDIA—BANDA AND KIRWEE BOOTY. QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, Why the Papers relative to the Banda and Kirwee Prize Property, which were moved for and promised at the end of July 1866 and again in 1867, have not yet been produced; and, whether the Booty realized by the Government of India from the seizure of the Funded Property of the captured Chiefs of Kirwee is to be distributed to the Troops?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, these Papers were delayed because, after communication with all the Departments concerned, we could not succeed in getting the whole of them. I should think that since the payment of all the money due they will have lost their interest; but if the hon. and gallant Member will communicate with me, and wishes to have what we can give, we shall do the best we can to meet his wishes. I understand his second Question to refer to certain Government promissory notes, about which a memorial was lately sent to the Secretary of State. If that is so, I have to say that the Secretary of State has informed the memorialists that he cannot accede to their petition.

ARMY—ALLOWANCES TO TROOPS IN CHINA AND JAPAN.—QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, When the Correspondence relative to the Scale of Consolidated Allowances to the Troops in China and Japan, ordered on the 23rd February, will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that the Correspondence in question was rather voluminous, but he believed it would be laid on the table in a very few days.

DIET OF MERCHANT SEAMEN. QUESTION.

MR. GILPIN said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he has considered the desirability of introducing a dietary scale for Seamen into the Mercantile Marine Bill; and, whether he has been informed that the carrying out of the Admiralty Scale for Troops and Her Majesty's Emigration Commissioners' Scale for Emigrants has been highly satisfactory, and that a similar scale for Seamen could now be arranged without entailing additional cost to shipowners?

MR. BRIGHT, in reply, said, the answer he had to give to the Question put by his hon. Friend was very short. By the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 a dietary scale, as agreed upon between the parties, was to be inserted in the articles of agreement. The Board of Trade had no power in the matter; and, generally, he might say he thought that to settle questions of what should be the supply of food between employer and employed would not be a very desirable occupation for that Department.

Mr. Grant Duff

ARMY—CANTEENS.—QUESTION.

MR. R. SHAW said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the sale of wines and spirits in a canteen to non-commissioned officers and civilians (such canteen being licensed for the sale of beer only) is in accordance with the regulations relating to barracks; and, whether the Commanding or any other Officer has the power to authorize the sale of wine or spirits in any part of a barrack?

MR. CARDWELL said, he must answer the first part of the Question of the hon. Member in the negative, and add that any person selling in a canteen either beer or spirits and wine was obliged to take out an Excise licence, and could sell only those things which his licence covered. As to the second part of the Question, no Commanding or any other Officer on the home stations had the power to authorize the sale of wine or spirits in any part of a barrack without the approval of the Secretary of State for War.

POSTAL—MAILS TO THE UNITED STATES.—QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he would beg to ask the Postmaster General, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table Copy of Letters from Mr. John Burns to the Secretary to the Post Office, dated the 9th, 10th, and 12th instant, in regard to the Cunard and Inman Contracts; and, whether any, and, if so, what arrangements have been made by Her Majesty's Government for the conveyance of the British Mails to the United States, in the event of those contracts not being ratified?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that there would be no objection, that he was aware of, to laying on the table the letters which his hon. Friend asked for. As to the latter part of the Question, he had to state that he had not thought it necessary at present to make any arrangements in the case of those contracts not being ratified. In that event there would still be existing the contract with the North German Lloyd's Company, to convey the Mails to America once a week. Other companies had also made offers to carry those mails, but at present it had not been deemed necessary to enter into any arrangements on the subject.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he would beg to ask the noble Marquess, in reference to the answer he had just made, Whether it were true, as had been stated in the Debate the other evening, that the Government had given notice to the North German Lloyd's to terminate the Contract they had entered into?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No; it was stated the other night that, in a letter addressed to the Post Office, the Treasury suggested that it might be desirable to give such a notice, but I thought that, as the debate was about to come on, it would not be desirable to give the notice.

THE ROYAL PATRIOTIC FUND OFFICE.
QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE KING said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, On what day he will be prepared to answer the Question as to the defalcations by a clerk in the Royal Patriotic Fund Office; and, if he will now say what was the date of the last audit of the accounts?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, a meeting of the Commissioners will be held about the middle of next month, and immediately after that meeting has been held I shall be ready to answer the hon. Member's Question. With regard to the second part of the Question, I have to state that the last audit was down to the end of the year 1866. The accounts, however, are ready to be audited down to the present time.

IRELAND—MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.
QUESTION.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, On what day the Returns, ordered on the 8th of this month, with respect to the College of Maynooth will be in the hands of Members?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: I am sorry, Sir, I cannot positively state the date when the Return will be ready to be placed in the hands of Members. Although it is a plain and simple one, some confusion has arisen as to which Department is bound to furnish it, and it has been found necessary to send over to Dublin for it. I trust, however, that the Return may be supplied without waiting for any further correspondence on the subject. As to the information itself, I think the hon. Gentleman will find that it is already before the House in the Report of the Maynooth Commission.

IRELAND—POOR LAW COMMISSIONERS.
QUESTION.

MR. W. H. GREGORY said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether any application has been made to the Treasury by the Irish Poor Law Commissioners for the deficiency in the amount requisite for the payment of the Medical and Education Charges under the Poor Law during the past year?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE replied that he was not aware that the Poor Law Commissioners had actually made the application.

INDIA—JHANSI PRIZE MONEY.
QUESTION.

MR. T. CHAMBERS said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, When the Jhansi Prize Money (second instalment) will be paid; and, whether there will be any prize money for Gwalior, Calpee, and other places in Central India captured by Sir Hugh Rose?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, nearly the whole of the money known as the Jhansi Prize Money was paid away at the first distribution. Only about £10,000 was kept back to meet expected claims. Most of this reserved fund has now been paid away. If there is any further distribution it will be an altogether trifling one. The term Jhansi Prize Money includes all the prize money due for the booty captured by Sir Hugh Rose's force at Gwalior, Calpee, and other places in Central India.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)
(No. 2 BILL.—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he wished to ask the Vice-President of the Council, Whether the Government intend to proceed with the Contagious Diseases (Animals) (No. 2) Bill in time to give the House a fair opportunity of discussing it?

MR. W. E. FORSTER replied that he had originally put the Bill down for the first Monday after Easter, but as he had been informed that that day would not suit many Members, in consequence of the quarter sessions being held on that day, he had since postponed the second reading till Thursday, the 8th of April. It was certainly the intention of the Government to press forward the Bill this Session.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would postpone the second reading till the Monday following, instead of Thursday, as a large number of quarter sessions would be held throughout the week.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that if the Bill were to be postponed from time to time, it would be very difficult, considering the state of Public Business, to have it considered at all during the present Session.

HAMMERSMITH BRIDGE—UNIVERSITY BOAT RACE.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can give any information to the House as to the result of his investigation with respect to the state of Hammersmith Bridge?

MR. BRUCE: Sir, by the direction of the Board of Trade, this bridge has been minutely examined by a competent engineer, who was assisted in his examination by the engineer of the company to which the bridge belongs. The result showed that the bridge, although never a very strong structure, is fully as strong now as it has been at any previous time. As it has borne large crowds without any accident occurring, it has not been thought expedient to prevent its use on the occasion of the Oxford and Cambridge boat race tomorrow. Notices have, however, been posted that access will be limited to the footway; and, in addition to this, there will be a force of policemen, who will endeavour to limit the crowd to the footway, leaving the carriage way for the use of carriages only. It is believed that the bridge will be fully competent to bear that diminished crowd.

PARLIAMENT—RULES OF DEBATE. QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK: Mr. Speaker, I wish to call your attention for a few moments to a point of Order which arose last evening on the second reading of the University Tests Bill—in reference to the right of the Mover and Seconder of a Motion for the adjournment of a debate to speak on the Main Question. It appeared to many Members of the House that the decision which you, Sir, then announced from the Chair was somewhat at variance with the practice of this House, as that practice is ordinarily understood. In calling attention to this question, I must state that I wish to show no disrespect whatever to you or the high office which you hold. Ever since I have had the honour of a seat in this House I have done my best to bow to all the decisions that you have announced, and to share in the admiration which has been expressed by the highest authorities as to the mode in which you have conducted yourself since you have sat in that Chair. The circumstances of the case are briefly these—After twelve o'clock last night my hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. B. Hope) moved the adjournment of the debate. He did not address himself to the Main Question, but simply moved the adjournment. Some confusion then arose, and, without rising from my place, I endeavoured in the most formal manner to second that Motion. The division was taken, and the Motion for the adjournment having been rejected, I proceeded to address myself to the Main Question, whereupon I was stopped by you, Sir, and was told that, having seconded the Motion in the manner I have mentioned, it was not competent for me to speak on the Main Question. These are the simple facts of the case, which can be corroborated by three or four of my hon. Friends near me, and I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, Whether, under such circumstances, I had or had not a right to speak on the Main Question?

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: Perhaps, Sir, in answering the Question of my hon. Friend you will also kindly inform me and the House what are the rights of a Member who has moved the adjournment of a debate. I have always looked on such a Motion as containing all the elements of a perfect Motion, and that if it passed in a short and informal manner it did so only by the connivance of the House. I may say that the Motion I made last night was pressed to a division against my own wish. The result of that Motion did not appear to me, with all respect to you, Sir, to be of the essence of the question, the essence of the question was the Motion put from the Chair. Of course, however, I did not raise any question last night, as you, Sir, had ruled upon the matter; but the House will, I am sure, be glad to know for its guidance what is the law on the subject.

MR. SPEAKER: I will answer the Questions of the hon. Gentleman in the order in which they have been addressed to me. After the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) moved the adjournment of the debate the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Bentinck) said, in a very distinct tone of voice, that he seconded the Motion. The House declined to permit the adjournment; and after that the hon. Member for Whitehaven rose to address the House. Of late years there has certainly been a relaxation of the rule with regard to seconding Motions, partly for the convenience of discussion; but hon. Members will bear in mind that when there have been contests for the adjournment of the debate, if one Member has moved the adjournment of the debate, and another Member has seconded it, it is not competent for either the Mover or Seconder of such a Motion immediately to rise and move the adjournment of the House. That must be done by some other voices. It was on that account when the hon. Member for Whitehaven rose to speak I told him that, having seconded the adjournment of the debate, it was not competent for him to move the adjournment of the House or to speak on the Main Question. If he had power to speak on the Main Question he would have had power to move the adjournment of the House; but, having seconded the adjournment of the debate, it was not competent for him to speak until some other Member had moved the adjournment of the House. That is the reason for the judgment which I gave last night, and it is, I believe, in accordance with the practice of the House. With respect to the Question which has been put to me by the hon. Gentleman who moved the adjournment of the debate, I may observe that when the House is disposed that the debate should be adjourned, it is constantly the object and desire of the hon. Member who wishes to have pre-audience on the next evening to rise and move the adjournment of the debate, and such a Motion is generally acceded to even without being seconded, by the common acceptance of the House. But when the adjournment of a debate has been moved, and the House has declined to assent to the Motion and has divided upon it, the hon. Member who moved it and had an opportunity to address the House if he chose, has under those circumstances lost the power of addressing the House on the Main Question.

PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS—THE BALLOT.

MOTION FOR AN INSTRUCTION TO THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. LEATHAM: Sir, before calling the attention of the House to the subject of the Ballot, I must express my regret that my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol (Mr. Berkeley), whose lieutenant upon this occasion I am, feels himself unequal at the present moment, through ill-health, to the task of bringing the question before the House with the necessary attention to detail. I hope that even before it shall have passed through this preliminary stage my hon. Friend may find his health sufficiently re-established for him to resume his old position, and to crown with his own hands the work upon which for many years he has bestowed indefatigable labour. I think that we shall all hail the return to the front of a champion whose strokes were always playful, and who at a time when the Ballot was probably the most unpalatable question which could be brought before the House, invariably contrived, by the flow of his genial humour, to impart a relish to it. Sir, I fear that I cannot emulate the sparkling fancy of my hon. Friend; but I can, at least, emulate the spirit of fairness and courtesy which distinguished his speeches, and I hope that when I sit down it will be in the power of no opponent of the Ballot to say, however much the question may have suffered in advocacy, that the discussion has suffered in tone. For, Sir, I wish it to be understood at the outset that I am not bringing this question before the House as a party question. It is clear to my mind that, in a strictly party sense, neither party has anything to gain from the Ballot. The evils which we believe that it is calculated to check are equally inimical to the interests of both parties in the country; and I am sanguine enough to believe that before long men of both parties will acquiesce in the expediency of adopting a measure which is our only probable escape from them. But, Sir, if the Resolution which I am about to move is to be regarded as in no degree offensive in intention to hon. Gentlemen opposite, it must be accepted as equally friendly to Her Majesty's Government. No one could have been more pleased than I was with the speech which a few days ago was made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department, and, as the House well knows, many other Members of the Administration—I think the majority—have already expressed an opinion in favour of the Ballot, while the remainder, in their recent utterances, have certainly not displayed that inveteracy of repugnance which would lead us to infer that their minds are hermetically sealed against argument and persuasion. I rejoice at this, because I do not believe it possible for any Liberal Government to occupy that Bench for a twelvemonth which does not make the Ballot a Cabinet question. But it may be said the question is already in the hands of the Government; why cannot you leave it there? The question is not in the hands of the Government, but of an impartial Committee of this House. I know that we have assented to the appointment of that Committee. It may be open to doubt whether the great question of the Ballot was one which ought to have been referred to a Committee at all, especially in conjunction with a number of other questions more or less irrelevant. But it is too late to discuss the policy of this course now. All I wish to say is, that we did not assent to that Committee in order to stifle discussion, in order to shelve this whole question without debate for another Session of Parliament; but many hon. Members assented to that Committee simply in order that those who were manifestly praying for more light might receive it. This is not one of those crude, undebated, ill-digested questions which we are in the habit of referring up-stairs, and then waiting patiently until the Report comes down. It is regarded by many Members of this House, and by vast numbers of persons in the country, as a question of vital and urgent importance—one with regard to which this House does not abdicate its right of deliberation to any Committee for a single hour. And it has reached a stage when free discussion is essential—discussion out-of-doors, discussion, if you will, upstairs, but especially discussion in this House, the debates of which exercise a most material influence upon public opinion in the country. Now, those who have assented to this Committee are disqualified from opposing the introduction of the Ballot, on the ground that the Legislature has recently passed a measure which was adapted to put an end to the evils against which the Ballot is directed, because by appointing this Committee they have admitted the insufficiency of that statute. And evidence of this insufficiency is afforded by the universal chorus of congratulation in which at this moment the whole tribe of electioneering agents exults. Even if it were possible to construct a harmony of the Judges, just as we have constructed a harmony of the Gospels, what would such an encyclopædia of wisdom be but a handbook to the science of bribery and intimidation? Does anybody who has read the recent decisions doubt the possibility of sailing completely through the Act of last Session? No doubt the navigation in some parts will be intricate, but the intelligent navigator, armed with the judicial chart, will have no difficulty in threading the passage. Why, Sir, the Judges, when they have completed their labours, will have buoyed the channel from end to end. So much for the efficiency of our measure in putting a stop to bribery, intimidation, and treating. But I shall be told, perhaps, that the Ballot will prove equally delusive. No doubt the perverse ingenuity of man will at times evade all your precautions; but the question is not, will the Ballot put an end to bribery and intimidation, but whether it will not heap discouragement and obstacle in their way. In proportion as the bargain becomes less secure there will be less inducement to make it. The intimidator himself will tremble when he reflects that the victim of his coercion has a safe and sure revenge. You might as well discard the use of locks and bolts—because the perverse ingenuity of man can pick or force them—as discard the precaution of the Ballot on the ground that picklocks and crowbars are still left in the hands of the thieves and robbers of the Constitution. But this question will be settled by an appeal to facts rather than to theories. Our opponents go on arguing just as though the Ballot were a bold experiment of the political empiric. The Ballot is not a conjecture, it is a fact. The Ballot is a success. So far is it from being an innovation, that yours is almost the only free country where it is not an established institution. The moment a nation becomes free it takes to the Ballot as naturally and heartily as it takes to liberty itself. The other day a great country in the south of Europe became free. It threw off a yoke so odious and yet so long endured that men began to wonder, not only at the patience of their fellow-men, but at the long-suffering of Heaven. This newly-enfranchised nation had to choose the form of government under which it meant to live. The passions and prejudices of centuries, inflamed to the utmost by religious rancour, embarrassed and embroiled that choice. The people who had to make it had grown positively grey in the ways of violence and discord—they were children in those of liberty and order. They made their choice by Ballot. Let me read to the House the testimony of an eye-witness, of one who appears to have been no enthusiast about the Ballot, and who was communicating his impressions to a great leading journal which has never been enthusiastic about anything. Writing from Madrid, he says—

“I have never heard a Spaniard speak of an election in his country except as of a disreputable farce. In order to satisfy myself about the grounds for this general distrust, I attended yesterday at one of the polling places, and I must say that to all outward appearance anything more fair and exemplary than the proceedings of a Spanish election I have never seen.”

The spectacle of order presented by Madrid was, with very few exceptions, presented by the whole Peninsula. And what happened in Spain has happened in the case of every nation which has become free. Its freedom has been sealed by the Ballot. The country which achieved liberty immediately before Spain was Prussia. The whole nation was enfranchised after Sadowa, and as a necessary seal to their enfranchisement they have the Ballot. Retracing the history of freedom in Europe, the next name which we find upon the roll of free nations is Sweden, then Italy and the Netherlands, then Belgium and Greece. All these have the Ballot. Even Austria and France—nations which as yet have only contrived to get glimpses of freedom—have the Ballot. There are three great countries in Europe still without the Ballot—Russia, the last stronghold of mediæval serfdom; Turkey, the outpost of barbarism in Europe; England, the fortress of liberty throughout the world. But why follow the example of universal civilization? The Ballot is un-English. It was not un-English in 1526, when we find it in full operation at the election of the magistrates of London. Nor was it un-English in the days of the Stuarts. James I. attempted to strangle in its cradle British power in America in obedience to the will of Spain, and by the election of his creatures as officers of the Virginia Company. He was baffled by the Ballot, and hence British America. In the reign of Charles I. the king quarrelled with the great company of traders known as the Merchant Adventurers, because by Ballot they refused to elect, to their own destruction, his nominee as their deputy at Rotterdam. It was then that that Father of English liberty proceeded to make the Ballot un-English. I am indebted to a most able speech by Mr. Hepworth Dixon upon the Ballot for a State Paper, which I will read to the House. It is Charles I.’s Order in Council against the Ballot—

“At Hampton Court, this 17th of September, 1637—His Majesty, this day sitting in Council, taking into consideration the manifold inconveniences that might arise by the use of Balloting boxes, which is of late begun to be practised by some corporations and companies, did declare his utter dislike thereof, and, with the advice of their Lordships, ordered that no corporation nor company, either within the City of London and liberties, or elsewhere in this His Majesty’s kingdom, shall use, or permit to be used, in any businesses whatsoever, any Balloting box, as they tender His Majesty’s displeasure, and will answer the contrary at their peril. Whereof, as well the Lord Mayor of the City of London for the time being, and all other mayors and head officers of corporations, as all governors, masters, and wardens of all companies in and about the cities of London and Westminster and elsewhere, are to take notice and see this, His Majesty’s pleasure and commandment, duly observed.”

But although Charles I. proscribed the Ballot, the use of it still lingered, after Charles I. was removed, within the walls of Parliament itself, and Commissions and Committees were frequently nominated under it. But, perhaps the House will be startled when I state that Mem-

by Ballot. Within the last few days Mr. Boyd Kinnear has presented us with extracts from a pamphlet in his possession, dated 1688-9, signed "N. T." and entitled "Some remarks upon Government, and particularly upon the establishment of the English monarchy, relating to this present juncture; in two letters written by, and to a member of the Great Convention." I will, with the kind permission of the House, read part of one of these extracts. The writer says—

"It is customary in the borough of Limsington in Hampshire, to elect by the Ballot. The manner is to give to every electing burgess (their number being limited and known) a different coloured ball for every competitor, each colour being respectively appropriated to the several competitors; as suppose there should be three candidates, each elector has three small balls given him, which he so manages as to keep only that in his hand which by its colour belongs to the person he intends to choose. This being inclosed in his hand, he puts it into a close box made for that purpose, leaving no possibility to anyone to detect what coloured ball he put into it. Thus, each having put in his ball according to his vote, the balls of one colour are separated from those of another colour, and so, according to the majority of balls of one colour, the return is made. This method I know to be of great advantage where it is made use of. It prevents animosities and distastes, and very much assists that freedom which ought to be at elections. No man in this way need fear the disobliging of his landlord, customer, or benefactor, for it can by no means be discovered how he gave his vote if he will but keep his own counsel. If this or some such device were appointed to be made use of in every borough all over the kingdom, I am persuaded it would abundantly answer expectation in the many advantages which would attend it."

And so a most material precedent has been established in our favour, and against the foolish cry of those who say that the Ballot is un-English. A few years before Charles I. attempted to make the Ballot un-English, the Ballot box was carried over in the Mayflower to America. I need not remind the House of the story of the Pilgrim Fathers, how, unable to endure the thralldom under which they lived at home, they left home, friends, country, fortunes, everything except those free institutions which no longer flourished in England, but which were borne by them into the unpeopled wilderness to flourish for ever beyond the sea. The Ballot was adopted by the free colony of Massachusetts in 1634. It was adopted by every other colony or State in succession in the order of their civilization—the New England States leading the way, the slave States bringing up the rear. I shall be told that the American Ballot is not a close Ballot, and in most of the States no doubt that is so. But why is it not a close Ballot? Because the relations between land and capital on the one hand and labour on the other there are such that the Ballot is no longer necessary; and the example of America shows how we may return to open voting under the Ballot the moment those conditions are removed which make the Ballot desirable. But there are other populations more nearly allied to our own even than the Americans who elect by close Ballot. In the colonies of Victoria, South Australia, Tasmania, and New South Wales, all elections take place by Ballot. Its adoption has been attended with the most signal and indisputable success. The first authority which I shall cite is that of my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Childers). In the course of a speech upon the Ballot, in 1860—which was my right hon. Friend's maiden effort in this House, and which was full of that promise which he has since so amply redeemed—he thus expresses himself—

"Ever since the first concession of representative institutions to Australia, vote by Ballot had been one of the measures of reform, agitated in the Colonies and their Legislatures. It was not, however, until the eve of the introduction of what is called 'Responsible' or Parliamentary government, that it met with general advocacy. About that time public attention was directed to the corrupt practices which there, as in this country, too frequently attended Parliamentary elections. The prevailing evil was not so much intimidation as bribery. . . . But bribery and treating, in the vulgar forms in which we know them, were rife in the town constituencies; and to check them, and at the same time to reduce the excitement and expense of contested elections, the Ballot was proposed. . . . The Ballot was not in Victoria as in England exclusively advocated by the popular or Liberal party, and opposed by Conservatives. On the contrary, some of its most strenuous advocates sat on the Conservative side of the House, and unquestionably its most formidable opponents were the leaders of the extreme democratic party. And to this, I think, much of its success is due. For not being a party measure, its details were honestly discussed, and settled by the ablest men in the House. . . . And what, Sir, has been the result? . . . Why, by the common consent of almost every public man who has seen its working, the Ballot has been thoroughly successful. It came into operation in the year 1856, when I was myself elected under its provisions. I cannot speak to the number of elections in other colonies; but in Victoria I understand that about 300 have taken place since that time. They have been dis-

Shortly after my right hon. Friend delivered this speech he gave evidence before the Select Committee on the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act. We are always having Corrupt Practices Prevention Acts, and Select Committees upon them—we are always washing our hands upstairs, but they are never clean. My right hon. Friend was asked by the Chairman, with reference to a constituency in Australia which had been notorious for bribery: "What was the result after the adoption of the Ballot as to that particular constituency?"—"I may say," replied my right hon. Friend, "that bribery became almost extinct there." "Was there treating also in the constituencies?"—"The treating used to be worse than the bribery, but treating in the towns became almost extinct." The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) asked: "Was the intimidation of voters a common subject of complaint?"—"No; the intimidation talked of was rather mob intimidation. That is entirely done away with: the election is now conducted as quietly as a funeral." Contrast that with the scenes proved to have taken place at Drogheda. The Chairman next asked: "Is canvassing as keenly conducted as it was before you had the Ballot?"—"I think that it is not nearly so keenly conducted." The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) asked: "Have you the means of knowing whether the expenses of candidates have much diminished?"—"I should say that they have, very much, judging from popular rumour." Finally, after my right hon. Friend had given a great deal of evidence to the same effect, the Chairman asked him: "I understand you to say that you consider that that change in the mode of taking the votes has given general satisfaction in the colony?" My right hon. Friend replied, "I think it has given undoubted and universal satisfaction." Now, Sir, there is just one point in this evidence to which I would specially call the attention of the House in passing—namely, the effect of the Ballot on bribery and treating. This is most material to our case, because while almost everyone admits that the Ballot must check intimidation, there are those, as I shall show presently, who dispute altogether the fact that it will check bribery and treating. If the House is anxious for corroborative evidence as to the success of the Ballot in Australia, I am in a position to furnish it in abundance. But I am anxious as much as possible to economize the time of the House, and therefore propose to cite one more authority only. It may be said that when my right hon. Friend gave his evidence the Ballot had only been a very few years in operation, and that his experience only extended to the colony of Victoria. The evidence which I am about to cite is not only very recent, but refers to the colony of South Australia. Mr. Anthony Forster, late Member of the Legislative Council of Adelaide, published, in 1866, a most able and interesting work, entitled South Australia; its Progress and Prosperity. He says (p. 200)—

"The operation of the Ballot in the Australian colonies has placed the constituencies beyond the suspicion of bribery and corruption. Speaking for South Australia, I may say that there has never been a question raised there as to the perfect adaptation of that mode of taking votes to all the requirements of the elections. Whilst one of the last elections for the city of Adelaide under the system of open voting was simply disgraceful, requiring the intervention of the police and almost of the military, the first elections under the Ballot were conducted with the utmost propriety and decorum. The contrast was so striking as to be a subject of general congratulation."

Now let me take a witness from quite a different part of the world. In an interesting book entitled From the Levant, published a few weeks ago, Mr. Arthur Arnold gives a description of a Greek election which he witnessed last year. He says—

"No stranger would have supposed that an excited struggle for power had commenced when the poll opened. In no city with which I am acquainted are politics so generally the subject of conversation. The people are by temperament most quarrelsome, and you will expect, as I did, that a Greek election would be at least as riotous as a similar ceremony in Ireland. On the contrary, English people do not go to their churches and meeting-houses in a more orderly manner than the Athenians did to the poll. And it cannot be doubted that this remarkable absence of anything approaching disorder was due to the mode of election—the Ballot. With the vote by voice in Athens, after the English manner, we should certainly have seen the Greek capital full of bloodshed. Every other man in Athens and in the Greek provinces every man is armed with weapons not slow to take life."

Now, Sir, before I leave this part of the subject, let me remind the House that what is virtually the Australian Ballot has been resorted to in this country upon more than one occasion with marked success. "When the Maryport Improvement and Harbour Act was applied for in Parliament, in 1866, the promoters sought power to secure voting by Ballot at the election of trustees, that being the method of voting which had been practised in the town since 1833, when the first Act was obtained. When this clause of the Bill was brought before Lord Redesdale his Lordship drew his pen through it, and wrote on the margin, "I cannot consent to this fanciful legislation;" but the promoters made out such a good case in favour of the mode of voting which they had hitherto been accustomed to, that a compromise was effected, by means of which the promoters of the Bill obtained legislative sanction for the continuance of the Ballot; for, although the Act established open voting, a proviso was added that open voting should not be practised until the ratepayers found that the Ballot did not answer. Thus the Ballot continues at Maryport. The votes are taken upon the Australian system, and the Ballot at the trustee elections is held in high estimation. This opinion is not confined to people who advocate the adoption of the Ballot at Parliamentary elections; on the contrary, many of those who speak so highly in its praise are genuine Tories. They would not have the Ballot introduced into Parliamentary elections, they say; but in these local contests they freely affirm that they could not arrive at a just estimate of the opinions and wishes of the electors without secret voting. There are so many people in positions in which they would fear to incur the displeasure of their customers or employers by voting against them, or giving offence to friends that, on every side, it was confidently asserted that, if the Ballot were not in use at Maryport, but a very small proportion of the people who now vote so freely would come to the poll at all." The only other instance of an English Ballot with which I shall trouble the House, occurred the other day at Manchester. It was a test Ballot, to decide the relative claims of two candidates belonging to the same political party. Of the entire success of the experiment the whole London Press bore witness. The utmost order prevailed, although the contest was a very keen one. I need only say that having been present both at the polling booths and at the declaration, it is impossible to over-rate the efficiency of the machinery employed, which was a modification of the Victoria system. The representative of the leading journal says—

"There were many critical observers of the whole process, but no one has yet suggested a loophole for fraudulent evasion of the rules, unless it was by the very difficult and probably useless attempt to conceal a card and carry it away, and thus prove, at all events that no vote had been given by the person who obtained it."

Well, Sir, against this array of facts, all tending to prove that the Ballot is practicable, and that it is in the highest degree salutary, we have to set the speculations and arguments of theorists. In the first place, we are told that the Ballot will not defeat the ends of bribery and intimidation, because a sense of moral rectitude will restrain men who have promised from corrupt or fraudulent motives to vote in a particular way from voting in any other way when the vote is secret. We are told that it is a venial thing to vote against one's conscience, but a crime to break the immoral promise to do so. There is shame and remorse for us in the latter case—there is only mortification in the other, and so the immoral promise must bind, but the violated conscience may take care of itself. Sir, I wonder where some people pick up their morality? What casuist affirms that a wicked or immoral promise is binding? or that any engagement to do wrong is paramount to the eternal obligation to do right? Is there any hon. Member who seriously doubts that the coerced elector will soon discover this, and act accordingly? But we are told that the Ballot would lead to lying. Whether is greater—the lie in the words, or the lie in acts? Sir, I have read with great attention the arguments of a great writer who recently had a seat in this House, and who will always have a place in the respect of Europe. I think that it will be admitted upon all hands that the argument adopted by Mr. Mill could not possibly have been more strongly stated than it has been stated by him. Indeed, he has bestowed so much care upon the exact shape into which this argument has been thrown, that he seems scarcely willing to trust himself—he, who is so great a master of expression—with any other form of words by which to convey his precise meaning, and in his work on Representative Government, has reproduced the argument in the very terms in which it is stated in his pamphlet on Parliamentary Reform, because, as he says, “he does not feel that he can improve upon them.” If, therefore, we can show that an argument so fully considered, and so carefully drawn, is unsound, it may be taken, I think, that the case of our opponents has collapsed. Now, no one regrets more than I do the absence of Mr. Mill from the seat which he adorned in this House. I regret it especially to-day, because his presence would have guarded me against the possibility of misrepresentation; but in his absence it will be with a peculiar anxiety that I shall guard myself. Well, Sir, Mr. Mill not only lays down a line of argument, but he makes a great admission. I will endeavour to deal with the admission first and the argument afterwards. The admission is practically contained in these terms — that if the state of things which existed in this country thirty years ago existed now, he would still be in favour of the Ballot. He says—

“Thirty years ago it was still true that in the election of Members of Parliament the main evil to be guarded against was that which the Ballot would exclude [note in passing this testimony to the efficacy of the Ballot] coercion by landlords, employers, and customers. At present I conceive a much greater source of evil is the selfishness or selfish partialities of the voter himself. A base and mischievous vote is now, I am convinced, much oftener given from the voter's personal interest or class interest, or some mean feeling in his own mind, than from any fear of consequences at the hands of others, and to these influences the Ballot would enable him to yield himself, free from all sense of shame or responsibility.”

Sir, in one sense it is a great misfortune that Mr. Mill is cut off by the very rigidity of his principles from those sources of information which are open to less scrupulous men. If Mr. Mill had personally canvassed the great constituency which has just failed to appreciate his services at their true value, I cannot but believe that he would have re-written the whole passage which I have read. And what is the whole system of canvassing but an elaborate scheme of coercion—coercion by landlords and agents, coercion by customers, coercion by the men of a man's class or clique or sect? In how many thousands of instances may a man's vote be mathematically described as the resultant of divergent forces acting in the same plane, and all of them illegitimate; or the neutrality of voters as a statical couple, when the two forces exactly balance one another? But perhaps I shall be asked, where are the evidences of this pressure? Why, are not the newspapers filled with the complaints of men who have been coerced? Because it is the province of intimidation not only to strangle opinion, but to strangle it in silence. The hand which is strong enough to stifle it, stifles its cries. There is no offence committed by one man against the liberty of another which is so difficult of proof. What little self-respect remains to the man who has been coerced suggests every possible excuse for the base vote, except the shameful one that he is no longer master of his own actions. Men are thus made accomplices in their own dishonour, and with their own hands efface the evidences of the violence to which they have succumbed. An instance in point was brought to my notice the other day which, if it were not so pitiable, would be infinitely amusing. Four tenants upon an estate in a Scotch county promised with alacrity, and some of them with enthusiasm, their votes to one of the candidates at the last election. They were summoned to two meetings at the landlord's house, and there they were plied with such irresistible arguments that they came in a body to withdraw their pledges. But the point to which I wish to draw the attention of the House is this, that subsequently these four men—though every neighbour they had knew that they had been coerced—signed a paper to the effect that they had not. But, Sir, it is not only intimidation of this character, or the intimidation of workmen by masters, like that of Mr. Harrop at Westbury, which we have to deal with—this is a many-headed monster. We have to deal with the intimidation of mobs like that at Drogheda — where the Judge said, that beyond all doubt a system of organized intimidation and outrage prevailed on the part of agents or friends of the sitting Members which deterred supporters of the opposing candidates from recording their votes. And we have to deal with that form of mob intimidation which was practised the other day at Blackburn. Now I have no hesitation in alluding to the Blackburn case, because I have just heard the issue of the Petition, which has terminated in the unseating of both Members petitioned against. The facts, therefore, which I am about to state may be taken as proved. After the publication of the result of the registration, I am informed that the following Circular was issued:—

Now, what followed the issuing of what is now known as the Blackburn “Screw Circular?” The days immediately succeeding the municipal election, and immediately preceding the Parliamentary election were marked by a series of outrages which drew upon Blackburn the attention of the whole country. On Tuesday morning, November 3rd, by a simultaneous movement, the operatives in at least half-a-score of factories expelled from the rooms their Liberal fellow-workmen to the number of several hundreds. These expulsions were aggravated by many gratuitous outrages upon the persons of obnoxious individuals. Even women were kicked, hustled about, their hair and clothing torn, and otherwise maltreated. Masters and managers when appealed to, with but one or two exceptions, refused to interfere; in some instances with slight expressions of regret and disapproval, and in others with curt discourtesy. In scarcely a single instance was a remedy afforded to the aggrieved parties, not even the customary notice of discharge. Now, I make no comments upon this Blackburn intimidation, for the obvious reason that I did not bring the question before the House as a party question, and that I should scorn to make political capital for my party out of the narration of atrocities which I am sure hon. Gentlemen opposite must condemn equally with ourselves. But it is not merely intimidation of this remorseless and lawless character with which we have to contend. There is a kind of undue influence which is infinitely safer, equally efficacious, and all but universal; the coercion which is subtle and impalpable, which never commits itself; which I may describe as being in the air, a deadly but invisible miasma. This is a species of intimidation which exists even in the face of elaborate assurances to the contrary—in the face of notices posted up in conspicuous places, to the effect that the tenants or the workmen, or the employés, are at liberty to vote as they please. But the tenants and workmen know better. They know that if they vote as they please they will become marked men, and men not marked for special indulgence. The tenant knows that in all probability that barn will not be built, and that there will be difficulty about the rent. The workman knows that if he votes against the master his next oversight will be followed by dismissal, and the next feast of St. Monday by a penitential Tuesday, and so these men vote as it is prudent to vote; and because the law is not broken, because there are no open menaces—nothing vulgar or ugly—everybody is delighted with the high-minded generosity of the master and the squire—I say generosity, for if a man in the position of landlord refuses to canvass his tenants personally or by his agent, it has come to this, that such conduct on his part is regarded, not as the necessary result of the least spark of gentlemanly feeling, but as the most signal proof of virtuous forbearance. But there is a form of intimidation more subtle even than this—a form of intimidation which exists in the imagination of timid men, and which very possibly is the result of a false inference. Let me give an illustration or two taken from what occurred at the last election. Hon. Members will be aware that at the city of Carlisle there are large railway works. At the last election 157 men who were voters were employed at those works. One of the candidates was a railway director. Of these 157 men, 139 plumped for the director, three split their votes, and fifteen voted against him. Now take a county. I have here an analysis of the polling at more than a dozen little centres of population in a county constituency not 100 miles from London. First, we come to a village, the chief resident being a member of the Conservative committee. The votes polled were 21—19 by the Conservatives, and 2 by the Liberals. Then we come to a small town; the chief resident a leading member of the Liberal committee. Votes polled, 57—Liberals, 45; Conservatives, 12. Then a town, the chief resident a nobleman, who, my informant states—I know not upon what authority—is at present out at elbows with his party; the steward a Conservative. Votes polled, 127 — Conservative, 93; Liberal, 34. Then a village; chief resident, a Liberal Baronet, whose predecessor was a Conservative. Votes polled, 65—Liberal, 49; Conservative, 16. At the previous election, when the Conservative predecessor was alive, the votes polled were 48—Liberal, 20; Conservative, 28. Then a village; the chief resident a convert to Liberalism. Votes polled, 45—Liberal, 31; Conservative, 14. At the previous election, before the conversion, the votes polled were 35—Liberal, 14; Conservative, 21. Then we come to two adjacent villages; chief resident, one of the Conservative candidates. Votes polled, 27 —Conservative, 25; Liberal, 2. Then to two adjacent villages; chief resident, a Liberal Peer, the relative of one of the Liberal candidates. Votes polled, 53—Liberal, 36; Conservative, 17. Then to two adjacent villages; chief resident, the chairman of the Conservative Committee. Votes polled, 44—Conservative, 37; Liberal, 7. Then to two adjacent villages; chief resident, one of the Conservative candidates. Votes polled, 118 —Conservative, 82; Liberal, 36. Of the 82, 36 plumped for their candidate, but not until near the close of the poll, thus helping to throw out the other Conservative candidate. Then we come to two adjacent villages; chief resident, a Liberal Peer, the relative of the other Liberal candidate. Votes polled, 71—Liberal, 62; Conservative, 9. Then to a village; the chief owner a non-resident Liberal Peer. Votes polled, 22—Liberal, 19; Conservative, 3. See how this man is respected in his absence. Then to a town parish; chief resident, a Conservative Peer, formerly Member of Parliament for the county. Votes polled, 55—Conservative, 47; Liberal, 8. Then to a village; chief resident, a nobleman's son, formerly Conservative Member for the county. Votes polled, 50—Conservative, 34; Liberal, 16. Lastly, we have a village; chief resident, a gentleman who aspires to be a Conservative candidate. Votes polled, 33 — Conservative, 27; Liberal, 6. Now none of these figures include split votes. I respectfully commend them to the attention of Mr. Mill. Does he think that votes are thus swept up, and not only swept up, but swept backwards and forwards with every change of ownership, without the presence in the mind of the voter of that "fear of consequences at the hands of others," which existed thirty years ago, and the existence of which then made the Ballot the lesser evil? Now, Sir, it is very possible that Mr. Mill may say that his arguments referred to a different situation from that which exists, and that the wide extension of the suffrage which has since taken place to men in dependent positions, by immeasurably extending the area over which intimidation may be applied, has virtually restored that state of things which existed thirty-nine years ago, and under which the Ballot is the lesser evil. If this be so we shall be delighted to hail his return to our ranks; but, in the meantime, we are compelled to deal with arguments which have never yet been withdrawn. I have endeavoured to show that a state of things exists under which it is expedient to adopt the Ballot even if we must admit that its adoption will be attended by the evils anticipated by Mr. Mill. I will now endeavour to show that it will not be attended by those evils. What are those evils? Mr. Mill says that—

"People will give dishonest or mean votes from lucre, from malice, from pique, from personal rivalry, even from the interests or prejudices of class or sect, more readily in secret than in public."

Now, I maintain that the interests and prejudices of class or sect would dictate the vote more generally under public voting than they would under the Ballot, for a man's class or sect is his public; and even if he be desirous to vote above these petty and sordid considerations, the displeasure of his class restrains him. How does Mr. Mill think that the saw-grinders would vote under open voting when the selfish interests of the saw-grinders were at stake? Even the extreme case put by Mr. Mill of a majority of knaves restrained from repudiation by the difficulty of looking an honest man in the face afterwards may be disregarded, because repudiation is never resorted to in a civilized community without reasons so plausible that they govern public opinion, and so rob it of public disgrace; and even if this were not the case, the man who votes with a majority screens himself behind a multitude. I must strike out private malice and pique, too, for we are not a nation who care to stab in the dark. More than half the pleasure of revenge is to think that our victim knows the hand from which the blow has come. Give the Ballot and you will blunt the weapon at once. Nor need we regard the assertion that the voter may vote from feelings of personal rivalry, for it can only apply to the very limited class out of which Members of Parliament are chosen, and it is to be hoped, for the honour of our class, to a very limited fraction of that. There only remains, then, as the inducement to vote meanly—lucre; and Mr. Mill thus raises the whole question of the Ballot in its relation to bribery. It has been contended that the Ballot would act as a check upon bribery, because the briber would never know that he had value received, and because the voter could take the bribe, and then please himself, as indeed in a multitude of cases he does now, under open voting; for example, the Yorkshireman who sold his gamecock for £7 to a supporter of Mr. Ripley's, though he assured him any other cock at 1s. would answer his purpose as well, and then, having pocketed his £7, went and voted for my right hon. Friend the Vice-President of the Committee of Council. But the idea is, that the man who does not respect his conscience will respect his bargain, and that the rogue who has been bought will vote as faithfully for the rogue who has bought him in the dark as in the daylight—an idea of the supremacy of conscience among rogues which, to my mind, is ludicrous in the extreme. But I understand Mr. Mill to contend that the Ballot will positively encourage bribery, because men will take bribes under it who would be ashamed to do so if their votes were known, their previous predilections being known also. Possibly there may be isolated cases of this character, although bribery is always a secret transaction, but such a possibility is far outweighed by the certainty that under the Ballot that most outrageous species of bribery known as half-past three o'clock bribery will positively cease, because the relative position of the candidates upon the poll cannot be known, and, therefore, all the data which govern the half-past three o'clock market price of votes will be absolutely wanting. Take the recent case of Norwich as an illustration of what is meant by half-past three o'clock bribery. I will give it in the words of the Judge—

“The election took place on the 17th November. Up to the middle of the day everything seems to have gone on honestly. About the middle of the day there was a considerable majority in favour of Mr. Tillett and the other gentleman who stood with him. Between three and half-past three, in No. 3 ward, there were forty votes polled for Sir Henry Stracey. Between half-past three and four the number was 121. In No. 6 ward, between three and half-past three the number voting for Sir Henry Stracey was forty-three; between half-past three and four it was 103. In No. 7 ward, between three and half-past three sixty-six votes were recorded for Sir Henry Stracey, and between half-past three and four 123 voted for him. It is further proved that in three public-houses at least—and it may be in many more—there were a number of men of the lowest class of voters waiting and on the ‘look-out,’ according to the expression of one of them. I have not the slightest doubt that these men were collected in these public-houses waiting to be bribed. I have not the slightest doubt that they were bribed, and that the great proportion of that low class of voters who voted in the afternoon of that day, between half-past three and four, were bribed voters.”

So much, then, for the argument that the Ballot will tend to encourage bribery; and, bear in mind, our experience in Australia is an ample confirmation in fact of the conclusions of reason. I have now endeavoured to show that the evils supposed to be incident to the Ballot will hardly exist. I have also shown the magnitude of those evils which do exist under open voting, but which the Ballot is calculated to remove. In conclusion, let me endeavour to deal with an argument which in wildness transcends anything which even the inventive ingenuity of our opponents has devised—the assertion that, if the vote be made secret the voter will naturally infer that the vote is his absolutely—his to do precisely what he likes with as much as the money in his pocket—his to barter for any private advantage—his to sell to the highest bidder—his to use in the promotion of the greedy interests of his class. This is the “false and pernicious impression” which Mr. Mill expects the vote by Ballot to make upon the mind of the elector, and the inference of course is, that instead of voting for the general good, for his party, for his colour, for the candidate of his choice, for anything which men vote for now—when he finds himself alone with his conscience he will stifle it. Or this argument is based on the hypothesis that a man's conscience is a thing outside him, something which he borrows from the public and leaves in the ante-room of the polling-booth with his umbrella. It is certainly based upon the hypothesis that the voter never reads the newspapers, never listens to the candidates' speeches, never discusses politics with his friends; that, in fact, from the dissolution of Parliament to the day of polling he is shut up in the Ballot box, for he can do none of these things without being reminded at every turn that as an elector he is the guardian of great principles, and that the very reason why the State secludes him at the moment when he performs this sacred trust, is that she may leave him alone with his responsibility. But says Mr. Mill, if the public is entitled to his vote, it is entitled to know his vote. Unquestionably in one sense it is, and know it it will, along with that of all his neighbours, at four o'clock. It is the decision of the majority that the public is concerned with. The public is much too great a personage to interrogate every individual elector and to criticize his vote. It cannot descend to such details; and if it could, it would abstain. The public itself although it has a right to demand that the vote shall be given in its interest, is in doubt upon the truth of the very principles which in the persons of the candidates are striving for the mastery. The public is divided in its own mind, and at the very moment when it would pretend to criticize my choice, it is dependent upon my choice, among many, for the way in which it is finally to make its own. If, therefore, this halting, expectant, irresolute creature—the public, is by the very nature of things incapacitated from deciding upon the propriety of my vote, is it not a gross intrusion for it to step in and say—"I cannot trust you to vote for me unless I watch you, although I do not know as yet what voting for me means?" The fact is, that our opponents mistake the knot of persons by whom each voter is surrounded for the public. I demand the exclusion of this knot of persons, in order that he may see the real public which stands beyond.

The public which stares the philosopher in the face in his closet with such intensity of expression that he can see nothing else, is absolutely shut out by the voter's entourage. Put the voter into a closet, and he may see what the philosopher sees. At present he sees his landlord with startling distinctness; he studies every line in the frown of his displeased customer; the sawgrinders' deputy peers round the corner at him. All these are realities. But the public which is on such easy terms with the philosopher is to him a distant and retreating shadow, armed neither with horse-pistols nor notices to quit. It is in the interest of that public that I speak. This is the public which you leave with the juryman when that other public is shut out. Why do you isolate the juryman? That he may consider the verdict his to sell to the highest bidder, or his to render to his country and his God? Do for the political juryman what you have done for the judicial one. Show him and those about him whose the verdict really is. When the squire is not by, and the priest is not by, and the agent and overlooker are not by, and the secretary of the trades union is not by, and all a man's customers are not by, perhaps the idea may grow up among them—the idea which has hitherto presented itself in a feeble, hesitating shape—the idea which your open voting has done its best to encourage for centuries—the idea that they are not entitled to his vote. This is the idea which I wish to see established—the idea that the vote is so sacred a thing that even a man's bosom friend has no right to meddle with it—that it is an affair of his secret conscience—a trust not only for the public, but for Him who made the public, who is infallible and just, while the public is full of error, prejudice, and passion. Enact the Ballot—establish this idea, and you will clothe, for the first time, with a sacred inviolability that which is not only the foundation of this great House of Parliament, but of the whole structure of the liberties of England. And now I fear that I have trespassed so long upon the patience of the House that I have left myself but little claim to speak to my Motion. I hope, however, that it is one which will commend itself at once and without argument to the judgment of the House.

The House is no doubt aware that there are marked differences, both in principle and detail, in the mode in which the Ballot is taken in the various countries in which it is in use. Your Committee will, no doubt, examine witnesses from these countries to show the efficacy or otherwise of the Ballot. It will not add to the expense or labours of the Committee to examine the same witnesses with regard to the actual machinery by which the Ballot is taken. If the Committee should report in favour of the Ballot, the information thus acquired will enable us to legislate at once with all the details before us. If, on the other hand, the Committee should report against the Ballot, then details cannot fail to be useful to those who will discuss this question afterwards—for do not let any hon. Member go away with the impression that whatever may be the Report of the Committee this question will be allowed to drop. For these reasons, therefore, Sir, I beg to move the Resolution of which I have given notice.

MR. HARDCASTLE said, that, in rising to second the Motion, he would offer no apology for doing so, as this was a question in which he took a strong interest—one, in fact, for which he had given his first vote twenty years before. He regretted now to see very few faces of those who then went into the Lobby with him. At that time, the question was considered to be one of great interest by all electoral reformers; but since that time, and up to the present, it had sunk considerably in public estimation. During the slack water later years of Lord Palmerston's Government, the Ballot fell very much in public estimation, but the last General Election caused it to resume all its original importance. If he wanted any evidence of the fact, he had only to refer to the Committee which had just been appointed. He agreed with his hon. Friend, who had proposed this Motion, that it was unnecessary to regard the Ballot as a party question. At the same time, when he remembered that all the influence of one description which could be exercised on a Parliamentary Election was territorial influence, he could not expect that the Ballot, or any other system of voting which was calculated to lessen that influence, would be received with much favour on the other side of the House. That was not the case, however, in other countries, for in a pamphlet, published by the First Lord of the Admiralty, it was stated that in the colony of Victoria the Ballot was regarded with favour by the Conservatives, whilst open voting was preferred by the Democrats. The power of voting in this country was conferred on certain classes, classes which had lately been very much enlarged. The members of those classes were not compelled to exercise their franchise, so that the power of voting could not, in the strictest sense of the word, be looked upon as a trust; no doubt, it was a moral trust, but not a legal one, to the exercise of which any legal responsibility was attached. Being, however, a moral trust, anything that interfered with its free exercise must be at variance with the spirit of the Constitution, and they had to ask themselves under what circumstances could a man vote freely. When he spoke of voting freely, he meant when a man voted according to his own unbiassed convictions, or as the result of legitimate persuasion and argument addressed to him by others. Now, any detail of electoral practice which interfered with either of those alternatives must be injurious to the freedom of voting. They had then to ask whether open voting, which was, in fact, only a detail of voting, did or did not interfere with those conditions; and he thought it was absolutely unavoidable that they should answer that question in the affirmative. He did not think it necessary to refer to anything beyond the events of last year to prove his affirmative. What had they not seen during the last General Election? Was it not manifest that workmen always voted with masters, tenants with landlords, and shopkeepers with customers? There was one explanation of this state of things as between the ruling and the subject classes, and that was that the latter so voted because they could not help it. If this was the case, it was a disgrace and a danger to our representative system, and, he believed, would be ultimately fatal to it. They had tried many remedies, and only one remained to be tried—namely, secret voting. Two forms of influence were prevalent in all elections, one addressed to the hopes, and the other to the fears of the voter; and those influences were known as bribery and intimidation.

Which of these two was the worst? Clearly intimidation, because bribery could only be exercised on the dishonest, whilst intimidation might be applied to every member of the constituency. This was his belief, and he thought he should be able to justify it. With secret voting the first of these influences, bribery, would be greatly diminished; and the second, intimidation, would entirely disappear. It was true that men might still be bribed in batches; but for one person who would be willing to bribe in batches under the Ballot, ten would be willing to bribe in batches under open voting. But there was another kind of bribery to which he must allude—namely, what was familiarly known as the half-past one o'clock bribery, which, in his opinion, would be destroyed, because under secret voting the state of the poll at that hour could not be known. A cheque for £200, changed for half-sovereigns at Norwich, to which his hon. Friend had referred, would not have been cashed if the persons bribing were not aware that the opponents were neck and neck; in short, bribery would be seriously damaged by the Ballot, and intimidation would be entirely effaced. He thought that this could not be too strongly stated—that bribery could only act on the dishonest, whilst the more honest the voter the more likely was he to be influenced by intimidation. They must remember that conscientious voting was the very salt of the electoral system. He believed that if it were possible to ascertain in what way the House could be constituted so as to secure the best of all combinations of parties—and to secure that votes should be so given as to effect that combination, still if the votes given for that purpose were given under undue influence the purpose must fail, the state of our Constitution would be dangerous, and its freedom must ultimately fall away. With this belief he urged the adoption of secret voting; but there were two questions to which he must address himself for a few moments. One was, could they get a plan to make voting really secret? and the other was, was the present the time that that plan should be adopted? His hon. Friend had referred to the several forms of the Ballot that existed in foreign countries. He had told them that the Ballot was in force in every country in Europe, except Russia and Turkey. He (Mr. Hardcastle) was not going to trouble the House with all the details, but he should like to refer to the manner in which the Ballot was worked in a neighbouring country. He selected France, because they were told that in that country the edifice of liberty was not yet crowned, nor was it likely to be for some time. The Ballot laboured under great disadvantages in that country, and yet it was remarkable what results it produced. In a pamphlet—about the accuracy of which there could be no question—the writer said that the Government named the candidate for every district, and even the placards and announcements were under the control of the Emperor. The placards were not like our election posters, but were official documents, signed by the prefet or his deputy, and those prefets and deputies and all the maires of communes and villages were appointed by the Government. Those officers had to approve of every address of a candidate before it was published, and all the preliminary proceedings were arranged under their orders. The police, the gendarmes, and other subordinates in their employ were used to canvass for the official candidate, and when the election took place the polling places were surrounded by those officials, who gave every possible obstruction to the candidate of the Opposition. In spite of all that, however, Paris and Marseilles were entirely represented by Members of the Opposition; let him ask, what chance would such men have had had there been open voting? Some reference had been made to Spain, and he should like to read one or two sentences descriptive of an election in that country, because it showed that in that country, and in times of great political excitement, the Ballot could be exercised in the most peaceable manner. The writer said that he went to the Ateneo, a kind of political club, where he found the President sitting with four secretaries, and each voter came in and gave his vote without the slightest ceremony, and went out as quietly as he had come in. He did not exactly know how the voting was carried on for the North German Parliament further than that it was stated in the official Register that it was taken by Ballot. It was hardly necessary to go to any other country in Europe; but with the permission of the House he would say a few words about America, because there it had been said that the Ballot was a failure. In the first place he believed that although the Ballot was originally introduced into America for the purposes of secrecy, it had since been adhered to more for the sake of expedition; the fact being that all elections were not only Parliamentary, but municipal, and included the return of many classes of local officers. For this reason the printed lists were used merely to save time and where no concealment was necessary. It had been said that the elections for New York were usually the scenes of great disturbance; but a friend who had been in New York informed him by letter that he was present at an election there in 1867; that the printed lists of names were no essential part of the Ballot machinery, but were provided for the sake of convenience and to save an elector the trouble of writing many names. Electors who did not wish to conceal their votes could obtain tickets at booths, which must be 100 yards from the polling place. All that the State could do was to give the opportunity of secrecy to all who chose to avail themselves of it; but if a man chose to wear a parti-coloured riband, he could not be prevented. His friend described all the arrangements as being excellent, and stated that even in the rowdiest wards the proceedings were carried on in the most peaceable manner. Each ward had its own polling place, into which the voter came, gave his name and address, and dropped his ticket into the urn, and there was not the slightest difficulty of either ingress or egress. His friend could not recollect hearing of any row, and his only means of knowing that it was election day was, that when he went into a tavern to get a chop neither wine, beer, or spirits could be obtained — a restriction which he (Mr. Hardcastle) hoped the Committee would bear in mind. It had been frequently urged that the use of the Ballot in America had not been attended with success; but the same charge could not be urged against its employment in Australia, where it had been remarkably successful. Mr. F. S. Dutton, a gentleman who had watched the working of the electoral system in South Australia for many years, and who had stood contested elections under the system of open voting and under secret voting, bore testimony to the riot, tumult, and extravagance which prevailed in the former case, and the orderly, inexpensive, and thoroughly efficient system of vote by Ballot. According to this gentleman's description the voting continued from nine till four, the returning officer and clerk sat with the Ballot box before them, and upon an elector giving his name certain questions were put, and if it was ascertained that the name appeared upon the electoral roll, the vote was taken by the Ballot. There was this objection to the plan that it was impossible to scrutinize the votes thoroughly, but this was met by the system adopted in Victoria and described by his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty. Then after the nomination, the returning officer sent a requisition to the Clerk of the Peace for a number of voting papers equal to the number of electors on the roll, and the papers were handed to the electors with an instruction to them to strike off the names of candidates for whom they did not poll, and the returning officer signed his name and affixed a number to each paper. When the elector came up to vote the returning officer wrote on the back of the paper the elector's number upon the roll, and then handed it to him. The voter took the paper to a table not overlooked by the poll clerks or by the public, and after erasing the names of those for whom he did not vote, dropped it into the Ballot box. The voting papers were examined in the presence of the scrutineers, but they were so placed that the numbers could not be seen. They were then sealed up, and until an election committee ordered the seals to be broken, the votes were protected by the strictest secrecy. That was about as perfect a system of balloting as the ingenuity of man could devise, and he trusted it would be the plan adopted when the Ballot was introduced in this country. The Leader of the Opposition, in his speech upon the Address, at the beginning of this Session, said in reference to this subject—“In my opinion it would be a very unwise course”—— [“Order, order!”]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman cannot quote a speech made in the present Session.

MR. HARDCASTLE said, he would only refer them to the speech without reading it. The right hon. Gentleman was desirous that nothing further should be done in the present Session to alter the law just introduced, and spoke in a complimentary way of the inquiries that had taken place, describing them as searching and satisfactory. He would admit that they had been searching, but very much doubted whether they had been satisfactory. He found that one of the principal results had been to make bribery and corruption more easy than it was before. He believed, moreover, that the decisions of the Judges had done very much to discourage further petitions and further inquiries, and this had been the effect especially of that most anomalous of all the petitions, the petition with reference to the Westminster election. At Bradford, Baron Martin, observing that with 21,000 electors on the roll, £7,200 had been spent by Mr. Ripley, doing no more good than if it had been thrown into the sea, declared that such an expenditure would never stand scrutiny while a Judge had to try election petitions. But in the case of Westminster the same Judge, dealing with an electoral roll of only 18,000 names, seated the respondent, who had spent £8,900 in 1868, not to mention £5,000 spent in 1865, and who had been in a very extensive and lucrative business, consisting partly of the business of a printer, and might therefore be supposed to be able to carry through many of his election arrangements at a cheaper rate than the other candidates. Immediately after the publication of the result of the Westminster petition a very remarkable state of things occurred. At the beginning of the Session there were fifty-four election petitions. From that time to the 1st of March twenty-three of the number were tried and seven withdrawn; but in the first eight days of March following the trial of the Westminster petition nine were tried and six withdrawn, so that the proportion of petitions withdrawn to those tried had increased from one to three to two to three. What were the facts brought out at this searching but not satisfactory inquiry? What he disliked far more than the expenditure of £8,900 among 18,000 electors was the kind of persons employed. Mr. Grimstone told the Judge that he had at first attempted to dissuade the hon. Gentleman from standing; but, when he insisted, expressed his readiness to become his chairman for the St. George's Ward, but required that "old Harry Edwards" should act as secretary. From the Report of the St. Alban's Commission, which led to the disfranchisement of that immaculate borough, it appeared that in 1847, out of 295 votes polled for Mr. Raphael, who came in at the head of the poll, only about thirty were not bribed, and that £3,500 was advanced to Mr. H. Edwards for the purposes of the election, of which sum the greater part was expended, with the knowledge of Mr. Raphael, in bribing voters. In 1850 £2,500 was advanced, of which the greater part was expended in bribery, and in the course of the evidence Mr. Edwards admitted that since the passing of the Reform Act about £19,000 had passed through his hands for election purposes. Election Committees and Election Commissions had been tried and had failed, and election trials having equally failed to secure electoral purity, let them see whether the object could not be obtained by the substitution of secrecy for open voting.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Select Committee on Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, to take into consideration the various methods of taking Votes by Ballot which are at present in use in portions of the British Empire and in other Countries, together with any modifications thereof which may be suggested, and to report upon the most efficient and convenient system of Balloting."

SIR GEORGE GREY: I do not rise, Sir, to say anything against that part of the hon. Gentleman's Motion which refers to the expediency of adopting the Ballot at our municipal and Parliamentary elections. I rise to speak strictly to the Motion placed on the Paper by the hon. Gentleman, and to state the reasons which make me think it will be inexpedient that the House should consent to give the proposed Instruction to the Committee. In waiving all discussions as to the expediency of adopting the Ballot, I do not in any way undervalue the importance of the subject. I am perfectly willing to admit the evils under the present system of voting, and am perfectly conscious of the deep interest that is taken in the question of the Ballot by many of the largest and most important constituencies in the kingdom. The hon. Gentleman who has brought forward this Motion has said that by adopting the course he has suggested much valuable evidence may be obtained. But while advocating in his own person the adoption of the Ballot—and, of course, I am well aware that there are a great many who agree with him—he has wisely abstained from asking the House to express any opinion while we are on the eve of an inquiry on the Motion of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Bruce), with a view to inquire into the best means that can be adopted for securing tranquillity, freedom, and purity at our municipal and Parliamentary elections. Now, Sir, it is perfectly well understood that one of the subjects which the Committee will have to consider is the expediency of adopting the Ballot; and I cannot think that in considering that question the Committee will exclude that evidence which my hon. Friend wishes the House to be in possession of—namely, evidence as to the machinery by which the Ballot should be worked, supposing it to be adopted, in order that it might fulfil the purpose for which it was intended. I agree with the hon. Gentleman fully that it is not so much the Report of the Committee—the opinion of the Committee, which may be an opinion arrived at unanimously, or may be one come to by only a small majority—that we ought to look to in a question of this kind, as the evidence taken by the Committee and the authority of the witnesses by whom that evidence has been given; but it is a clear and well-understood rule in respect of Committees of the Whole House on Bills, that no Instruction can be given them to do what could be done without such Instruction, and although this rule does not strictly apply to Select Committees, it is unusual and inexpedient that the House should direct the attention of the Committee to one particular topic, to the exclusion of or in preference to others which fairly come within the scope of the inquiry, or give the Committee a particular direction to consider a matter which, without such direction, would necessarily come under its consideration. It appears to me that is a sound rule; because, if you instruct a Committee to direct its attention to one special subject, your doing so implies that you wish it to direct its inquiry to that particular subject, to the prejudice or exclusion of others. [“No, no.”] If that is not your wish, why do you give special instructions? If it is not, why do you not give specific instructions to the Committee on other points? In this case, why not direct the Committee to consider whether the custom of nomination at the hustings should be continued or abolished, and, if abolished, what machinery should be adopted instead of it? The House is not asked to express an opinion as to the adoption of the Ballot, but merely to give an Instruction to the Committee to consider the question. That Instruction is unnecessary; and, as in the list of the Committee are some strenuous supporters of the Ballot, I cannot see that any good object can be achieved by the proposal of my hon. Friend, while its adoption might be regarded as an attempt to restrict the Committee in the performance of its duty of giving a fair and impartial consideration to all the topics that will come before it. I have another objection to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman. If the Gentlemen whose names have been placed on the Paper should be appointed to serve I shall have the honour of being one of the Committee. Now, I should wish to enter on that Committee with as little prejudice as possible in favour of my own opinion, and with a desire to give calm, and impartial consideration to all that may be said for or against the Ballot. I think the advocates of the Ballot, as well as those who may be opposed to it, ought to enter on the inquiry in that spirit; but if the House adopt the Instruction of my hon. Friend their doing so will have the appearance of prejudging the question. It will intimate a foregone conclusion, and convey an impression that, in respect of the Ballot, all which the Committee has to do is to inquire as to the most convenient and efficient form in which the Ballot can be adopted. The discussion raised by my hon. Friend may be useful in directing the attention of the country to the subject, and indicating the points to which the attention of the Committee may usefully be directed when it is considering the question of the Ballot; but for the reasons I have already stated I hope he will not divide the House on his Motion. When the House appoint a Committee of this kind, they ought to place full confidence in that Committee, and unless it is supposed to be failing in its duty, we ought not to restrict its action by Instructions such as those now proposed to be given.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, that he entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) that the Committee ought to enter upon their duties wholly untrammelled by any such Instruction as that which was now proposed. He thought the high character and fair bearing for which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had always been distinguished ought to have been sufficient to satisfy the Mover and Seconder of the Instruction that the Committee would be an impartial one. He regarded the Motion as an improper endeavour to fasten on the Committee a preconceived opinion. During the many years he had been in that House he had heard the subject of the Ballot discussed very frequently without ever having said a word on it himself; but after the extraordinary speeches of the Mover and the Seconder of the Motion he could not remain silent. The hon. Member who seconded the Motion (Mr. Harcastle) had taken, he must say, a most narrow-minded and one-sided view of the question. He had said a good deal about the expenditure at the Westminster election, but not a word respecting the money that had been squandered at Youghal. What were the facts? At Westminster, with a constituency of nearly 20,000, the hon. Member (Mr. Smith) had spent £8,900; at Youghal, with a constituency of 120 voters, £5,000 had been distributed; yet to the latter expenditure the hon. Gentleman—that consistent Ballot man—had not a word of objection to offer. For himself, he must say that he had been in the House thirty-three years, and he had never before known a case of such extravagant election expenditure in so small a constituency, and by one who was a total stranger to it. The only connection between the Borough and its representative seemed to be that the one had money to spend, the other votes to sell. On looking through the list of those who had supported the Ballot in that House, he found the name of the only candidate who, in the trials since the last General Election, had been pronounced personally guilty of bribery. If the Ballot had been in use, the probability was that gentleman would now be in the House and amusing his hon. Friends with accounts of how he had paid his money and secured votes. The hon. Gentleman who seconded the Motion had abstained from any reference to these facts. All the stress had been laid on the expenditure at Westminster. He never remembered a more marked instance of straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. The Ballot was advocated, not because it would prevent bribery, but conceal it; and for that very reason it would never receive his support. The House had been told how well the Ballot worked in France, where, in such towns as Paris, Marseilles, and Lyons, Opposition candidates were returned, notwithstanding all the influence of the Government; but the hon. Gentleman who cited these examples said nothing about those remote districts in which the French Government even prevented the names of Opposition candidates from being published. In the rural districts the Ballot was the purest farce, the grossest fallacy, and the direct cause of coercion, intimidation, and falsehood. The hon. Gentleman said he thought intimidation worse than bribery. Of course a man who liked secret voting would not wish public opinion to be brought to bear upon public crime, but he thought that the more secret the crime the more dangerous it was, and intimidation could not be so secret as to escape notice. Did those who supported the Ballot honestly and sincerely wish to put down bribery, or did they desire by means of secrecy to secure its continuance, and to protect those hon. Members who owed their seats to its influence from those little inconveniences to which, if they now resorted to it, they were exposed? After sitting for thirty years in that House he had come to the conclusion that there was no sincerity upon the subject, and that hon. Members had no real desire to put an end to bribery. ["Oh!"] He would give them good reasons for his belief presently. It would be useless to mention names in this matter because those whose names he could give, as having been declared guilty of bribery, were those who had been detected, and who were well known in that House. But those who now desired the Ballot wished to protect themselves from the risk which had been run by their poor friends who had been found out. An hon. Gentleman who had been found out during the last Parliament made a manly appeal to the House. He said—"You know these arrangements are well understood; don't you pretend that you don't do the same;" and this statement was met with cheers. He had known instances where men who professed the most spotless purity had been guilty of the most systematic and the most corrupt bribery. Of course the hon. Gentleman who had brought the question before the House had investigated the matter, and was well acquainted with the cases to which he alluded in this distant manner, in which those who had been the most guilty had successfully concealed the facts from the public. He begged to enter his protest against this systematic hypocrisy. While denunciations were hurled against Tory corruption thousands of pounds were sent down to the local bank in a feigned name for the purposes of corruption on the Liberal side. But when such a case was made public, did any of his fellow-Ballot men declare that the guilty party had lost his social position because he had obtained his election by corrupt means? And this brought him to the point to which he wished to draw the attention of the House. He wished to say that it was the hypocrisy of those who pretended that they wanted to secure purity of election by means of the Ballot that had kept up the system of bribery in this country. ["Oh, oh!"] Ah, he knew they would not like it, but he would prove his point, though he would not bring the blush of shame to some of their faces by mentioning names. ["Name, name!"] He declined to mention any names, because, by so doing, he would be only holding up the man to general disapprobation, whose chief fault was—not that he had been guilty of the crime, but that he had been detected—and detection did not prove he was worse than his fellows, but merely that he was less experienced and skilful. It was notorious that when bribery had been the most barefaced the constituency, afraid of being disfranchised, had managed, by means best known to those who desired secret voting, to get the petition withdrawn from the cognizance of that House, and thus the parties bribing escaped the punishment they deserved. ["Oh! oh!"] They said "Oh!" did they. Well, of course they did not like to be probed in a sore place, and no wonder at it. The reason he disliked secret voting was that, in addition to the crime, disgrace, and immorality of corruption, they would have the baseness of hypocrisy superadded. In a free country, possessing a free Constitution, a free Press, having free institutions, and affording perfect freedom of action, if there was any real desire to put down bribery, bribery could not exist. Instead of skulking into the secrecy of the Ballot box, let them improve the moral tone of the community, and elevate public feeling upon the subject. If they were really sincere upon the subject, they would have the remedy in their own hands. Let it be announced publicly that any man guilty of bribery shall be excluded from the pale of society as though he were a swindler or a thief, and they would hear little more upon the subject. Instead of doing this they listened with complacency, and perhaps, enjoyment, to the tales of the successful dodges by which bribery had been perpetrated with impunity. As long as they admitted men having the moral stain of corruption into their society, he did not believe in the sincerity of their wish to put down bribery. The late Mr. Coppock was one of the most successful Liberal bribers and corruptors that ever lived in this country. He was the life and soul of the Reform Club. He was in the habit of receiving enormous sums of money from gentlemen at the Reform Club, and then he went down to the country and bribed any constituency that was willing to accept his bribes. One of the best instances of that gentleman's practices was at the borough of St. Albans. There was a very respectable gentleman of the name of Mr. Bell, who in an evil hour fell into the hands of this purist, Mr. Coppock, and who said to him—"If you will give me £4,000, I will get you a seat in Parliament." The boldness of the man appeared in this, that he used to send the money from the Reform Club direct, and he never sent bank-notes—he always sent sovereigns. In this case Mr. Bell's address was printed in that fine glowing tone which Ballot men use; then came denunciations of Tory bribery; then came a layer of sovereigns—then came another layer of denunciations of Tory corruption—and then another layer of sovereigns—this was all stated in evidence and can be seen in the Library—and the whole was packed up together and sent down to St.

Lord Claud Hamilton

Albans. The affair was managed so badly however that Mr. Bell was unseated, and the borough was disfranchised. He had alluded to these circumstances to show that a high assumption of purity was not always truthful. A friend of Mr. Coppock had told him that Mr. Coppock had said that if they could get the Ballot he would be answerable for every borough in the kingdom. A man, he said, who was prepared to give £3,000 or £4,000 for the chance of a seat, with the possibility of an election petition, would be quite willing to pay £5,000 or £6,000 for a safe seat. And once the Ballot was adopted, his course would have been to open negotiations with the leading Liberals of a borough, and give them to understand that he had a friend, and, if he were returned to Parliament, that it would be in his power to place £5,000 or £6,000 at their disposal; but that not one farthing would be given till the time for petitioning had expired, and the seat was perfectly secure. In that way Mr. Coppock declared that with the Ballot he could answer for almost every borough in the kingdom. To attempt therefore by a preliminary discussion to create the impression that the advocates of the Ballot had any disinclination for corruption or bribery was a delusive proceeding, against which he felt it right to enter his protest. If in a free country public opinion could not raise the moral tone of the constituencies, and lead them to look with scorn upon the demoralizing and disgraceful practices of corruption, it was hopeless to expect that good would be effected by the adoption of a secret system. Nothing was supposed to prevent misconduct and robbery at night so effectually as gas lamps. Let society therefore turn the indignant blaze of enlightened opinion upon conspirators in their dark holes and hiding places, and a remedy for this degrading practice may be secured. But the Ballot once adopted criminals would rejoice, and purity of election would be further removed than ever.

SIR HENRY LYTTON BULWER said, he feared he was one of those who would fall under the sweeping denunciation of his noble Friend opposite, for he was an advocate of the Ballot. But the House, he thought, was placed in a somewhat false position by the proposition of his hon. Friend near him (Mr.

Leatham). For what did he propose? That the Committee should be instructed to do that which it was its bounden duty to do—that which it was stated it intended to do, and that which, in fact, formed one of the reasons for its appointment. Yet, if Gentlemen opposed the Motion from a wish not to place the Members of the Government—who were the advocates of the Ballot, and who would contend that the Committee should be left free—in a false position;—then, they might be suspected of not being true to the principles which they professed; on the other hand, if, as advocates of Ballot, they supported and carried the Motion, they would merely leave the question in precisely the position in which it stood at present—without having obtained any new advantage. He would therefore ask his hon. Friend to withdraw at least that part of his proposition which contained an Instruction to the Committee. He spoke the more freely on this subject because he did not entirely approve of the course adopted by the Government. He thought the country was the Committee on this question. Vote by Ballot had been canvassed through the length and breadth of the land for many years; and he, for one, should not obtain any light or instruction or any sanction for his opinions from whatever Report this Committee might deliver. Those who were in favour of the Ballot had no need for the resolution of any Committee on the subject; they never told their constituents that their opinions were not formed, and that they waited to see what a Committee appointed by the Government would think of it. On the contrary, they said—“We are in favour of the Ballot; we have reflected upon it, and we are in favour of that mode of ascertaining the opinions of the electors.” He thought then the Government Committee was not required, but he thought also the present Motion was superfluous; it could do no good, and might do harm by giving the appearance of a division amongst those who were in reality united. He had not intended to trouble the House with any observations on the general question, but having risen, he would venture to point out to the noble Lord (Lord Claud Hamilton) the conclusions to be drawn from his own observations. The noble Lord, in alluding to France, had said the Ballot succeeds in all large towns where the influence of public opinion was felt; but in the country, where the force of public opinion did not exist, the Ballot was a failure. What stronger argument in favour of the Ballot could possibly be addressed to Englishmen? Where were the remote towns in England in which public opinion did not exist and make itself felt? He ventured to say that there was not a great town and hardly a small town—not even Tamworth, which he himself represented—in which there was not as strong a public opinion as in the great centres of France, to which allusion had been made. He had always been and was in favour of the Ballot—not from party motives—for, though he believed it would be a great individual benefit, he did not think it would much affect the condition of parties. But he was in favour of the Ballot because he thought it a simple act of justice. He could quite understand how gentlemen might differ on the question as to who should vote for Members of Parliament and who should not; he could quite understand how the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade might be wide as the poles asunder as to a proper constituent body; but when once you had given a man a vote you were bound to see that he could vote as he liked, without injuring himself by doing so. The duty of an elector was to vote conscientiously, and the duty of the Legislature was to see that he could vote conscientiously. In fact, it was the peculiar province of the Legislature to make it easy for a man to do his duty; and if an elector could not vote without incurring the loss of employment or of the habitation in which he dwelt, it was for the Legislature to see that this danger was removed from him. Nay, if such was the case formerly, it was much more the case now, for we had been adding immensely to the constituencies from those classes of our population who were most dependent. What benefit was conferred upon these electors by the extension of the franchise if they were not protected in its exercise? It was no advantage to men to be placed in a position where they had to choose between their interests and their opinions. Hon. Members doubtless had called before now at a shop and

been told by the proprietor—"Well, I think you are a very good sort of gentleman and I should be very glad to vote for you, but my customers are all on the other side;" or at a cottage where the occupant had said—"I think you made a very good speech at the Crown and Anchor the other day, and I should be glad to vote for you; but if I did I should have to walk out of the door by which you have just come in, and my wife would never forgive me if we were turned out of the house where all our children have been born." Candidates might, perhaps, wish that the electoral body had the spirit of martyrs, but they could not expect such spirit—and the law which had to deal with men must deal with them as they were, and not as it might be desirable that they should be. He would not, however, be led into a speech on the Ballot on this occasion, because he thought the question before the House was not that of voting by Ballot, but that of instructing the Committee to consider the various modes of voting by Ballot. If the Committee adopted vote by Ballot it would naturally do this; if it did not, there would be a fair opportunity—no earlier one having been taken—for the House to pass its own opinion on the general question. He therefore again ventured to advise his hon. Friend, since he did not propose a Resolution which would decide the Main Question, to leave the details of it to that body which would have, when it made, to justify its Report.

MR. SCOURFIELD, having sat on every Committee which had been appointed to consider the Corrupt Practices Act, said, that to the best of his recollection no Instructions of any kind had been given to such Committee, and he did not see any reason why the Instruction now proposed should be given.

MR. C. WEGUELIN said, that he entered the House without any intention of speaking on the present debate, and should not have done so but for the attack made upon him by the noble Lord the Member for Tyrone (Lord Claud Hamilton). He could not in justice to himself and to the constituency which he still represented allow the noble Lord's observations to pass unnoticed. He felt certain the noble Lord could not have read the evidence given on the trial of the election petition against him, or the judgment of the learned Judge who had tried the case. Had he done so, he would not have made the remarks of which he rose to complain. So far as he (Mr. C. Weguelin) was personally concerned he wished to take all the blame that was justly due for any folly that he had committed; but those who knew him, and the position in which he was placed, were well aware that if he had sinned it had been more through ignorance than corrupt intention. As for the opinion of those who did not know him, or the circumstances in which he was placed, he confessed he was tolerably indifferent, but he did protest against a supposed criminal being tried twice over. He had always thought that when a man had been fairly tried the judgment of the court should be final; and, as that House had elected a tribunal for the trial of cases which it had before tried by its own Committees, he could not help thinking it was bad taste on the part of any Member of that House to call in question the judgment of that tribunal. He would only say that in spite of the large expenditure at Youghal—which no one deplored more than himself—after a trial of ten days, the Judge declared that not one single case of bribery had been, in the smallest degree, established. He was charged with personal bribery in seventeen cases, but they did not dare to ask him one question in regard to any of those charges, and the Judge declared that the witnesses by whose evidence the charges had been attempted to be substantiated had all grossly perjured themselves. The Judge said he had been asked to declare that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed in Youghal; but he declined to do so, and said it would be a gross injustice to the town if he did so. How, then, did it happen that a larger expenditure took place than had ever occurred in any constituency of the same size? Those who had read the evidence would see how the money went. It was not proper for him to say more about it. It was recorded in the evidence, and he believed the Judge was convinced that he sincerely and to the best of his ability during the whole course of the election—and it lasted four months—did all he could to stop it, and he could assure the House that he had no intention except to win his election fairly and honourably. Members were too prone to accept the garbled reports about his election which had appeared in the London Press. They seemed to have been made up from the speeches of the counsel for the petitioners, but every one of those allegations was disproved by the evidence. The hon. Member concluded by thanking the House for the indulgence with which they had listened to his explanation.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON begged to assure the hon. Member for Youghal (Mr. C. Weguelin) that, when he came down to the House, he had not the slightest intention of alluding to him; but that the reference made to the Westminster election by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Hardcastle) induced him to place the case of Youghal in contrast with that of Westminster.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he earnestly hoped that, whether the Instruction proposed by the hon. Member (Mr. Leatham) were accepted or not, the inquiry by the Select Committee would be a most full and searching one, because his vote on the question of the Ballot would entirely depend upon their Report. He had voted against the Ballot, and his reasons for being unable hitherto to support it were not so much theoretical, but because he saw very great difficulties and dangers in the way of secret voting. In the first place, the very worst form of corruption—that of personation, because it was accompanied with perjury—was liable to be increased. If an election were carried under the present system by personation the wrong could be amended by means of a scrutiny, but with the Ballot that became more difficult. He could not at present understand how the evidence could be obtained that was to justify a scrutiny. Another objection was that the election might not depend upon the votes actually given. In America this result had occurred, and the manufacture of a new phrase, "ballot stuffing," seemed to denote a very common habit in that country. The hon. Member (Mr. Leatham) told them that the Ballot had passed the age of experiment, and had been adopted by the whole civilized world. But was independence always obtained by it? All over the Continent it appeared that when a Sovereign called a new Minister to his Councils, that Minister obtained a large and overwhelming majority at the elections.

That, he thought, proved that the Ballot did not, as practised in those countries, secure the independence of the voter. With regard to America, it should be remembered that, in by far the greater part of the United States, secret voting was unknown. It had been adopted in Massachusetts after long discussion and much opposition, and the advocates of secret voting were permitted to draw up the Act. But a year afterwards it was discovered that there were things to be amended, and they had gone on amending the Act until it had become a large and bulky statute. At last, so complex and difficult were the necessary arrangements found to be, that though the Act was not abolished, a clause was added to enable any elector to vote either according to the complex and secret system or the open system of Ballot. From that day, as he was informed, not a vote was given by secret Ballot. They had been told that in Australia the difficulties and dangers to which he had alluded had been successfully met. He hoped it was so; but he should like to see a very careful inquiry before we should follow the example of Australia. We ought to remember that Australia was comparatively a new country, and it was just possible that the arts and sciences of electoral corruption had not been there so fully developed as they had been here; and, perhaps, neither the candidates were so rich, nor the voters so poor. If the Report of the Committee should prove, as he hoped it would, that the evils which he feared would be avoided, he should joyfully hail the result and accept the Ballot as the means of getting rid of the practices which now disgrace our elections.

MR. R. TORRENS said, the noble Lord the Member for Tyrone (Lord Claud Hamilton) had made a statement in which every one would concur, and that was, that if human nature should be very much changed for the better in this country, and we should get rid of all those inclinations which induced men to intimidate and corrupt, the Ballot would not be needed. The noble Lord had illustrated at considerable length the benefits to be derived from open voting, for he said that no mode for checking burglaries and crimes of that description had been found so effectual as to throw a flood of light on everything. But the misfortune was that in this case light was not thrown on the landed proprietor who coerced his tenantry, or the man of wealth who bribed his fellow-man, but on the victims. It was quite clear that the noble Lord had mistaken the scope and object of the Ballot, as well as its effects. The object of the Ballot was to screen the person who might be made the victim of intimidation or corruption; it was not in any way to protect the briber or the person who had recourse to intimidation. He would very briefly describe the manner in which the Ballot had been put in operation in Australia, and state from his own personal experience how effectually it had remedied the mischiefs of which we complained at home. In the first place, it was evident that the show of hands was entirely inconsistent with the Ballot, which would at once do away with the necessity of the Bill proposed to be introduced by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), for there would be no hustings, and none of those expenses of which the hon. Gentleman sought to relieve the candidate. What was done in Australia was this. The candidates were prohibited from addressing the constituencies for forty-eight hours before the day of election. On that day the returning officer attended at the court house, and two citizens presented to him in writing the name of the candidate whom they wished to nominate and second. If the number of candidates was not greater than that of the vacant seats the matter was at an end, but if it was, a Ballot was had recourse to. The poll book of the district had been prepared several months before the day of election, and was kept in the custody of a Government officer. Another Government officer of high character was sworn to take charge of the Ballot box, and in addition scrutineers were appointed by the different candidates. The business of the scrutineers was to examine the different voters, and they were selected because they knew the district well, so as to be a check on personation. As each voter came up he mentioned his name, and the scrutineers had an opportunity of seeing that he was the right man. Care was taken to have a sufficient number of polling places, and that made it all the easier to get scrutineers who knew the faces of the persons who came to record their votes. The penalties against personation were very severe, and that together with the scrutineers prevented anything of the kind. The voter on coming to the poll received a card, on which was printed the names of the candidates, and he walked into a place like a sentry-box, and with a pencil scored out the names of those for whom he did not wish to vote. He then came out and dropped the card into the Ballot box. When the Ballot box was opened the scrutineers overlooked the counting of the votes. Every step in the process was checked. He had himself been elected under this system, and as an elector had frequently used it in voting for members of both branches of the Legislature, and could certify that the system did not conduce to personation, nor had it been attended with the mischievous consequence which had been predicted concerning it. He would give a practical proof of what he advanced. The hon. Member who had introduced this subject (Mr. Leatham) quoted, from a work on South Australia, a passage which referred to two elections which had occurred in the city of Adelaide. At the first election, which was carried on by open voting, a great deal of bribery and violence had been practised; at the second election, which was conducted by Ballot, no bribery or intimidation of any kind occurred. He was present on both occasions. On the first, he saw many broken windows and broken heads, men carried by on stretchers, and a great deal of drunkenness. He had it from the mouth of one of the candidates that his expenditure amounted to nearly £2,000. He himself was a candidate at the next election, which only cost him £200, and it was conducted in so quiet a way that a stranger passing through would probably never have observed that an election was going on. There was not the smallest disturbance, and the expenses were mainly incurred in the hire of committee-rooms to address the electors in. It was said that there was now no secret voting there; but it should be recollected that there were certain medicines which produced no effect whatever on a healthy body, but were very useful in expelling a disease when the system stood in need of medicine. Such was the effect of the Ballot. When applied to a community as corrupt as that of Australia had been from bribery, intimidation, drunkenness, and violence, it operated very effectually. But after a few years the very idea passed out of men's minds of trying to coerce their neighbours or bribing them. The thing was looked upon as utterly disgraceful, and then all might acknowledge how they intended to vote. The machinery of the Ballot was still availed of, though men at public meetings came forward and said they would vote for Mr. So-and-so. Let them contrast that system with the one which obtained in this country. The evidence placed on the table showed that extensive drunkenness and ruffianism prevailed at elections. In some places eight women out of every ten in the town were drunk on the polling day; in others, men were brought to the polling-booth in such a state of intoxication that they could not utter the name of the candidate they wished to vote for. Sometimes a voter declared that he would "vote for the brewer." In the course of his own canvass of the borough which he represented the gentleman who accompanied him on his rounds again and again told him that it was of no use calling at one voter's house because the man's wife was a bed-maker at a College, nor at the house of another voter, who was himself a cook at a College, for neither of them would dare to vote for him. He did not believe the superiors of those Colleges and ecclesiastical establishments would exercise the amount of coercion which people in the town believed they would exercise; but the dread of it prevailed among the electors. Many tradesmen had told him—"You may place my name on your reserve list, and if your return is in danger I will come up and vote for you; but I shall not vote unless you really require my vote, as I should injure my business in voting for you." Those men should be protected from such influences. Having himself voted repeatedly under the Ballot in Australia, and having also been elected there by it, he could state that, although not a perfect specific in all matters, it operated as a complete remedy for intimidation and undue influence, and it likewise put a check upon bribery. He did not wish to over-state the case for the Ballot. Bribery might still occur where the electoral districts were very small, because a candidate might send down a very large sum of money to be distributed in a borough in the event of his being returned. But that was done at this moment. To his own knowledge that practice prevailed in a small borough not far from where he lived in the country. The hon. Member for that borough had been in the habit, for years, of sending down to it a very large sum of money—he was informed £4,000—and then there was no contest; but if he did not send the £4,000 then there would be a contest. He did not regard the Ballot as a party measure, for although it might exempt certain voters in the country districts from the coercion and undue influence of their landlords, and thus diminish the power of the great territorial magnates, on the other hand, it would operate in a very salutary way in the boroughs. When they considered the organization of the trades unions, there was ground for serious alarm lest, under the influence of their different executives, who were absolutely despotic over those who joined those trades unions, the expression of individual opinion might not be entirely annihilated among the various trades of the country. The Ballot would protect them from that danger; and with such a shield the decrees sent forth by the executive of a trades union, ordering the members to vote in favour of particular candidates, would have no effect. When any candidate was proscribed by one of those bodies, the workmen, under the system of open voting, durst not vote for him, for if they did none of their fellow-workmen would enter into any employment with them, and they would thus lose the means of earning their bread.

MR. DAVID CHADWICK said, he wished to contribute a few facts to that discussion without entering into any argument. He desired to place his own experience of the Ballot in opposition to what a noble Lord on the other side (Lord Claud Hamilton) had said of its operation under some mischance in some backwood State of America. He came to that House fresh from the ranks of the people, having taken a most active part in political measures during the last twenty years—and he believed there was no measure of so much political importance, and which would give so much satisfaction to the country as the Ballot. He had seen the Ballot in operation in America, and he had watched with the eye of a student of political economy the last contest but one in that country, when Abraham Lincoln was elected President for a second time. He went, accompanied by the British Consul and Mr. Cyrus Field, to fourteen different polling-booths during that contest and noted the whole conduct of the voting; and what was the result? Why, that in New York, which had been agitated to the greatest extent for the previous six months, on the day of election all was as quiet and orderly as could possibly be conceived. The people went to exercise their suffrages as if they were performing a great moral and religious duty. It was true the public-houses, the gin-vaults, and the beer-houses were closed—a regulation which we might well imitate; and it was also true that they were spared the riotous proceedings of the nomination day—another precedent which this country might advantageously follow. He denied that a person could bribe, control, or intimidate under the Ballot. He believed the mode of voting by Ballot in America was as near perfection as they could expect any human institution to be. The American voter's landlord might walk before him, and his employer behind him, without either of them being able to intimidate or coerce him. He could likewise, as the result of twenty years' experience in elections, confirm the opinion of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) that bribery, intimidation, or undue influence prevailed over two-thirds of the electors of every borough and county in this country, such practices not being confined to politicians on one side only, but being resorted to by the friends on both sides. It was a very difficult thing to convince employers that their workmen ought not to accept their advice in political matters. He had asked an employer why he would not favour the Ballot, and that employer could not understand why an employer of labour should not have more influence over those he employed than anyone else. That employer could not understand why his workmen should not believe that his intelligence was superior to their own, and accept his judgment on political questions in preference to their own. He (Mr. Chadwick) said to that employer—“I would venture to place the political intelligence and experience of any half-dozen of your foremen against your own,” and he Mr. (Chadwick) dare say that in point of intelligence, experience, and knowledge of political economy they would be superior to that employer, A vote was in his opinion a right and not a trust; but, however that might be, it ought certainly to be given with perfect freedom. It was as unjust as impolitic, and as wrong, to interfere with the voter in the exercise of his vote as it was to tamper with a jurymen in the box. There was no political question of half such importance as that of purifying the mode in which Members of Parliament were elected, and he hoped therefore that the hon. Member for Huddersfield would persevere with his Motion.

SIR FRANCIS CROSSLEY recommended the noble Lord the Member for Tyrone (Lord Claud Hamilton) to read at his leisure the speech which was delivered by the present First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Childers) on the 9th February, 1860, shortly after the right hon. Gentleman first obtained a seat in the House. The noble Lord did not advance a single argument against the Ballot, but contented himself with saying that it meant secrecy, and that secrecy meant deception. If the noble Lord looked at the report of the speech referred to, he would find that in Australia the adoption of the Ballot had not produced the evils he so much dreaded. He entered Parliament about seventeen years ago, with a determination to do all he could to make the House in reality what it was in name—the House of Commons. The Conservatives were then adverse to extending the suffrage, fearing that a disturbance of the settlement of 1832 would tend to Americanize our institutions. He found, too, that most of the Leaders on the Liberal side of the House, with the notable exceptions of the present Prime Minister and Earl Russell, were afraid to make any change in our electoral system. Lord Palmerston professed himself content with the settlement of 1832, although if the people had clamoured for an extension of the suffrage he would have acquiesced in it rather than resign Office. He did not, however, believe—when he was well off with things as they were—in building up a wall to run his head against, and was determined “neither to burn his bridges or destroy his boats.” After Lord Palmerston’s death, however, the Leaders on both sides of the House found it impossible to resist the demand for Reform, and for his own part, as far as the extension of the suffrage was concerned, he was very well satisfied with the change which had been effected. But every man upon the electoral register should have the power of voting as he liked, and should not be controlled or compelled to vote in a particular way by somebody else. They were told that a vote was a trust, and that the way in which it was used should be published to the world. But now that every householder had a vote that argument lost much of its force, because the trust, if it was one, could only be exercised for women, children, and lodgers. But if it were a trust, why could not the voter be trusted with it? Could he not use it better if allowed to vote as he thought right than he could by being compelled to vote as some one else thought right? An hon. Friend of his, who was a Member of that House and a large landowner, once said to him, “I have never any trouble about the votes of my tenants. When a farm is to let, my manager tells the applicants that it is the farm which gives the vote, and not the tenant; that he can put in any tenant he likes, and that there must be no misunderstanding whatever about the vote. Consequently I have no trouble with my tenants, who go to the poll like sheep.” But that was altogether wrong in principle; if it were not, it would be better for the landlord to have all the votes of his estate in his own person and for the tenants to have none at all. He himself was a large manufacturer, but he had no desire whatever to have any influence over the votes of the people in his employ. He was in favour of the Ballot, because he believed that under that system we should have no more chance of personation or of bribery than existed at present, and we should get rid of intimidation and of the disgraceful turmoil and riot that too frequently occurred now at election times.

MR. GLADSTONE: I can very well understand the object of my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) in making this Motion, and in raising the discussion which he has raised. There was undeniable truth and force in his objection that the appointment of the Committee, which, however, he did not in other respects criticize or condemn, has the effect, so far as public debate and public indications are concerned, of consigning the question of secret voting, in which he feels so deep an interest, to silence for a considerable length of time. I cannot wonder, therefore, nor can I make the slightest complaint that my hon. Friend should have thought fit to invite the attention of the House specifically to this subject, while I am bound to admit—in common, I think, with all who heard him—that he performed his task in a speech of remarkable ability. I do not know, from the desolate state of the Benches opposite, whether it be true that it is the business of an Opposition in this country to oppose the existing Government. If so, I do not think, in the present state of those Benches, that they are sufficiently performing that duty. With the exception of that specially independent portion of the House which sits below the Gangway, I might say that in this debate we have had the matter almost entirely to ourselves, and that we can discuss it as persons who are united for the most part in a common object—a common object as regards political purposes for which we are associated, and the subject of this discussion. There is not, I believe, a man sitting on this side of the House—and certainly I am not he—who will deny or question, for one moment, that it is our absolute duty, as has been so well said by my right hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth (Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer), to give every facility we can to the voter for the proper discharge of his duty, and to take out of his way, if it be in our power, all impediments which lie in the way of the attainment of that object, and to secure, on his behalf, the means by which he can exercise his right of suffrage with perfect freedom. It is in that spirit that I, for one, am disposed to look at this debate; and undoubtedly I think my hon. Friend has considerable reason to feel grateful to the more strenuous opponents of secret voting, most of whom are to be found on the other side of the House, for the manner in which—with little more than one single exception—they have left him this evening in the possession of the field. Having said this much, and having fully recognized the legitimacy of this discussion, I can well account for the earlier part of the Motion of my hon. Friend. With respect to the latter part of that Motion—namely, the Instruction which he proposes should be given to the Select Committee the House is about to appoint almost immediately—I hope he will permit me respectfully to make a few representations. He proposed the Committee should take into consideration the various methods of taking votes by Ballot, which are at present in use in various portions of the British Empire and in foreign countries, together with any modifications thereof, which may be suggested, and report on the most efficient and convenient system of balloting. As I have said, I look upon this debate—with which my hon. Friend has no reason to be dissatisfied—as the main object which he has in view; and therefore I feel the less difficulty in urging upon him, or, at least, in laying before him some considerations which appear to me to show that his Motion should not be pressed. I am sure my hon. Friend will feel that this is a Committee which has some peculiar claims on our consideration. It is a Committee which will be formed of Gentlemen of great weight and ability, who have been carefully selected, and who possess every qualification necessary to enable them rightly and fully to discharge their duties; and it is a Committee which derives its title from a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne. In that Speech it was recommended to Parliament that an inquiry should be instituted “into the present modes of conducting Parliamentary and Municipal Elections,” and that we should consider “whether it may be possible to provide any further guarantees for their tranquillity, purity, and freedom.” The terms in which the Committee has been appointed follow precisely the language of the Speech from the Throne, and require the Committee to conduct their examination with the view of promoting, if necessary, further guarantees for tranquillity, purity, and freedom of election. I understand my hon. Friend, however, in this Instruction, to have before him an object which I conceive to be perfectly legitimate, that is to say, to make sure in the face of the House and of the country that the subject-matter which he covers by his Instruction will unquestionably form a part, and a very important part, of the investigation of that Committee. I think I may venture to assume that if my hon. Friend feels satisfied in that essential point he will not desire to lead the House somewhat out of its usual and more convenient path, as was well observed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth, in instructing the Committee with regard to what, if I may use the phrase, it is already of itself instructed. The Committee is to examine into the necessity or possibility of further guarantees for tranquillity, purity, and freedom of election. Is it possible to adopt words comprehensive in their character and not therefore narrowly or exclusively directed to secret voting, but which must, by a moral compulsion, if that should be necessary, lead the Committee to inquire into everything connected with the subject of voting? What are your great objects in regard to secret voting? They are these—first, to provide better guarantees against bribery; and therefore the Committee has to inquire whether it may not be possible to provide better guarantees for purity of election. Your other great object is to provide guarantees against intimidation; and therefore the Committee has to inquire into the means by which the freedom of election can be better secured. There cannot, I think, be the smallest doubt that this is the obvious duty of the Committee, and I would point out to the House that it is clearly right we should presume that duty will be performed. I do not by any means question the propriety of the rule which allows a Member to move an Instruction to a Select Committee, because it may often happen that when a Select Committee is appointed the precise province within which it is to act may not at the moment be distinctly understood, and it may be extremely desirable to remove all doubt upon that point. But I think that is not the case in the present instance. If I refer also to the speech in which my right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department (Mr. Bruce) moved for the appointment of the Committee, I think that had there been a lingering doubt upon this point that speech must have effectually removed it. My hon. Friend, therefore, has the fullest assurance that the very thing which he desires to do will be unquestionably done, but subject to this condition, that if we are to suppose that Committee to be free we must suppose it capable of forming an opinion on the other side; and if it were to form a judgment adverse to secret voting, I do not suppose that my hon. Friend would be very anxious that the same tribunal should investigate the matter with a view of discovering the best mode by which secret voting could be carried out. On the other hand should the Committee find—and I have no doubt my hon. Friend is sanguine upon that point—that secret voting is desirable, there cannot be a doubt that the very words “providing further guarantees” direct them not to a mere abstract discussion of what system may be the best on the whole, but to a careful consideration of the practical means whereby that system shall be carried into effect. I would venture to add one more consideration which appears to me to be of no inconsiderable weight. In the former evening, when this Committee was proposed, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy) expressed a hope that the Committee would enter into a real and impartial inquiry, and was not merely to be a cover for a foregone conclusion. That is, I fear, a reproach to which this Committee may in the end be subject. The time may come—and especially if the Committee gives the engagement which my hon. Friend desires and anticipates—when we may be open, unjustly but possibly, to the suspicion or imputation that this Committee was a Committee of intrigue—that it was devised for the purpose of covering and hiding the accomplishment of an object which we did not like openly and manfully to avow. I only mention that because I think it is a reason for our abstaining from a proceeding which might appear to give colour to such an imputation. My hon. Friend, I think, may be satisfied with the fair meaning of the reference to the Committee, together with the construction which the Government, as the Advisers of the Royal Speech, and as the Movers of the Committee, have put upon it. I do not, for a moment, question the wisdom of the course which has been taken by my hon. Friend in raising the discussion this evening with the view of bringing this great and important question under the notice of the public. But I am convinced that he will, if I may use the expression, exercise a wise discretion if he will take the advice he received in the course of the debate, not only from a friend, but from a veteran friend of secret voting—my right hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth (Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer)—and if he will not ask the House to enlarge the Committee by specific instructions, but will leave it to exercise its freedom in full confidence that that freedom will be rightly used.

MR. LEATHAM said, that after the full and satisfactory explanation given by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government he felt that he should best consult the convenience of the House by withdrawing his Motion.

Acts relating thereto read.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE rose to move in Committee of the Whole House—

“That the Taxes on Locomotion should be revised, reduced, and equalized, and that the Mileage Duty and Licences on Stage Carriages and Omnibuses, viz., one farthing per mile and £3 8s. annual Licence Duty to carry more than eight persons, and ten shillings annual Licence Duty to carry not more than eight persons, should be repealed: and that the Post Horses and Carriage Licences Duties be repealed, viz.:—Keeping 1 Horse or Carriage, £5 per annum; not exceeding 3 Horses or 2 Carriages, £10 per annum; not exceeding 4 Horses or 3 Carriages, £15 per annum; not exceeding 5 Horses or 4 Carriages, £20 per annum; not exceeding 6 Horses or 5 Carriages, £25 per annum; not exceeding 8 Horses or 6 Carriages, £30 per annum; not exceeding 12 Horses or 9 Carriages, £40 per annum; not exceeding 16 Horses or 12 Carriages, £50 per annum; not exceeding 20 Horses or 15 Carriages, £60 per annum; exceeding 15 Carriages, £70 per annum; exceeding 20 Horses, then for every additional number of 10 Horses, and for every additional number less than 10 over and above 20 or any other multiple of 10 Horses, the further additional Duty of £10 per annum. And that the Metropolitan Hackney Carriage Duty and Licences be repealed, viz.:—7 shillings per week, or 6 shillings per week if not used on Sunday: and a Licence Duty of £1 per annum on each Hackney Carriage: And that there should be substituted in lieu thereof the following annual Licence Duties under the Excise levied in the same manner as the present Licence Duties on Dogs, viz.:—Every person letting Horses or Carriages for hire, and every proprietor of any Stage Coach, Omnibus, or other Public Conveyance, and of every Hackney Carriage or other Vehicle plying for hire in the public streets or roads, the following Duties:—Upon every Horse, £1 per annum; upon every Vehicle drawn by one or more Horses, £1 per annum, unless such Horses or Vehicles are used wholly and solely for the purposes of trade or agriculture.”

The hon. Gentleman said, he was aware of the difficulty which a private Member must have in proposing a remission of taxation, for if he did so before the Financial Statement was made he was told that the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not yet know with certainty what taxes could be remitted; and if he did so afterwards he was told that the financial arrangements for the year could not be varied. In the one case he was too soon, in the other case too late, and it was difficult to hit the exact time for making such a proposal. The right hon. Gentleman was the fourth Chancellor of the Exchequer to whom he should have appealed for the remission of these taxes—a result which would be not only for the interests of the trade, but for the advantage of the public generally. In 1866 the First Lord of the Treasury stated that the whole subject of taxes on locomotion required to be reviewed, and the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) in 1867, and the right hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) in 1868, without denying that the question deserved the attention of Government, merely pleaded their inability to take the matter in hand, as the revenue was declining and the expenditure increasing. With regard to the stage coach duty and the duty on cabs and omnibuses, it might seem, at first sight, that they applied simply to the metropolis, but the fact was that every place throughout the country was affected by them. In 1844 Parliament compelled the railway companies to carry third-class passengers at 1d. a mile, but Parliament never provided the means for those third-class passengers to be carried to and from the railway stations, and the duties on stage coaches and flies remaining unaltered, the conveyance of the poorer classes from the railway stations to their towns and villages often cost as much as the fare for a long distance by the third class in a railway train. In 1864, before the reduction of the duty on stage carriages, the amount of mileage traversed by them increased by only 20,000 miles over that of the preceding year; but in 1865, after the duty had been reduced from 1d. to $\frac{1}{2}$ d. a mile, the mileage increased by 690,000 miles over the preceding year; in 1866, by 600,000 miles more; and in 1867, when the duty was further reduced to $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per mile, there was the immense increase of 1,179,000 miles, in addition to all the preceding. It appeared that after the reduction of the mileage duty to $\frac{1}{4}$ d., the sum paid for licences and mileage duty was still twice as great in proportion to profits as the amount of duty paid by railways. The London General Omnibus Company in 1864 paid £53,300, or $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on their earnings; while the railway companies paid £430,000, or $1\frac{3}{10}$ ths on their earnings. The next duty to which he would refer was the post horse duty. All cabs and vehicles throughout Great Britain, excepting London, were charged to that duty. In London there was a graduated scale of duty, the effect of which was that the smaller the trade the greater amount of duty was paid proportionally, because the duty diminished in proportion to the extent the trade and the number of vehicles kept. The hackney carriage duty was confined to the metropolis, and was the most oppressive of the duties levied on locomotion. The House would scarcely credit him when he stated that, while the amount of duty paid by the proprietor of fifty horses and carriages in Birmingham or any other country town was something like £170, in London it was £962 10s. If a small trader should set up a four-wheeled waggonette and drive it twice a week to a market town, or take four or six passengers to a railway station, he would have to take out a stage carriage licence and pay the mileage and post horse duties, and if he wanted to drive his wife and family a little way into the country he would have to pay on that one-horse carriage not less than £10 18s. He had received numerous letters from various parts of the country where persons keeping a one-horse conveyance for family use and letting it to a neighbouring tradesman had been surcharged and compelled to pay the assessed taxes and also the expenses of the appeal; and the Treasury, when applied to, answered that when the carriage was let out the customer paid the duty, and when it was used to drive the owner's family it was necessary that he should pay it. These taxes must fall most heavily on those who had only one or two carriages, and tended to prevent that locomotion throughout the country which was essential to the general comfort, health, and happiness of the people. They were not only oppressive in some districts, but perfectly prohibitory in others. He should suggest that there should be an uniform excise duty of 20s. on each horse, and of 20s. on each carriage, and that both the horse and the vehicle might be used in any way the proprietor thought proper. That would be a boon to the whole community. He had entered upon the question how these taxes were levied and collected. They formed five or six items of the account in the public revenue. He proposed to reduce, not only the expense of management, but the collection of these taxes. In 1866 the amount of taxes on these descriptions of vehicles amounted to £427,000; but after they had been reduced, in 1868, the amount was £200,000; and in 1869 it was £276,000; so that these taxes were in a very different position from that in which they stood formerly, and he objected that the system of collection and assessment should remain the same. The hackney carriage trade in London was the only one in which the charges of those engaged in it were fixed by law, and in which there was no competition. They were told on high authority, that if they had open competition dirty and rickety cabs would soon vanish from our street. That was the testimony of the Commissioners. In 1866 there were 7,160 cabs, but the number was now reduced to 5,300. Persons interested in this business had been crushed by the oppressive tax, and had not been able to turn their attention successfully to any other trade. When the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. G. Hardy) had published regulations, the fulfilment of which involved some little expenditure, which the proprietors of these cabs could not afford, they compelled him to withdraw the obnoxious provision because they could not afford the extra expenditure. He appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say whether it was creditable to the metropolis that the public carriages should be in the state in which they were at present? It must be admitted that the metropolis ought to be supplied with better public vehicles than it had at present, and the first thing to be done to secure this object should be to have this enormous charge of £19 5s. per annum for each vehicle reduced, while at the same time the charge was only 6d. per mile. Why should not London have conveyances equal to those possessed by Paris or Geneva? If they took one of the largest provincial towns, it would be found that in Birmingham a cab paid only £5 per annum to the public revenue. He trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not follow in the footsteps of his predecessors and plead for postponement until a more convenient season. No season was as convenient as the present. The eleventh Report of the Inland Revenue Commissioners, that for 1867, stated with reference to this matter—

“We can scarcely add anything to our statement in the tenth Report on the taxes on locomotion, except that we are disposed to doubt the expediency of any further alteration in the stage carriage and post horse duties short of such a measure as would allow to every man the free use of his horses and carriages unfettered by fiscal regulations.”

This described the object of his Motion; he wished the owners of horses and carriages to be allowed to use them or let them on hire without being subject to any fiscal regulation whatever. He accordingly moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee to take into consideration the taxes on locomotion.

MR. ALDERMAN J. C. LAWRENCE seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the said Acts.” — (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence.)

MR. M'LAREN urged the Chancellor of the Exchequer to equalize the rates if he could not reduce them. Simple justice required this, because at present the owners of a few horses and carriages were taxed more heavily than their wealthier competitors. He thought the scale proposed—namely, £1 for each horse, and £1 for each carriage—was a fair one. The owner of a single carriage paid £5, but the owner of nine paid £40; a still larger proprietor of twelve carriages paid the reduced tax of £50, and the owner of fifteen paid only £60, instead of £75, which would be payable at the rate of £5 each. The result was that the proprietor of thirty-five carriages paid only £2 each, and the proprietor of seventy paid but £1. The law, therefore, gave the larger trader an advantage over the small. The rule as regards horses was most extraordinary. Six horses could be kept at £3, and every horse above twenty could be kept for a duty of £1 a head. What would be thought of a law which relieved the owner of twenty ships from paying full dues for lights and docks while the poor shipowners paid full dues for their one or two ships? He had a constituent who had about 500 horses, and he only paid at the rate of £1 a head for all exceeding twenty, but his poorer neighbours, who had fewer than twenty, paid £3 15s., £4, £4 3s. 4d., for each horse, and so on—for the scale was a sort of a jump one. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, no doubt, might say he wanted £250,000 from those duties; but then let him lay it on honestly. Let there be an equality between the rich and poor. The present scale of duties enabled large proprietors to ruin small ones and obtain a monopoly. He called upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whatever might be the state of the finances, to do justice by equalizing the rates.

MR. CHARLEY took exception to the worthy Alderman's proposal to abolish the existing distinction between six-day and seven-day cabs, urging that the six-day cab movement had been most beneficial to cabmen, and had raised their social, moral, and intellectual condition, and that it had received an impulse from the difference of duty in favour of the six-day cab. It was only fair that the difference should be allowed, and he trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would continue it in any changes he might propose.

MR. MURPHY, as representing an important Irish constituency, called attention to the fact that in Cork the tax charged on each vehicle was £2 4s. 1d., but a man could keep thirty or forty vehicles for this one payment. What the car-proprietors in Cork had petitioned for was that each vehicle should be taxed, so that the same amount as now might, in the aggregate, be produced for the Exchequer.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, several of his constituents had requested him to support this Motion. They felt that the law dealt hardly with them in imposing an amount of duty on cabs from which carriages were exempt. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might say he needed the money the present duties produced, but necessity was the tyrant's plea; and why should we punish a useful class so much when the money might be saved in many ways?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think the worthy Alderman the Member for the City of London (Mr.

Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence

Alderman W. Lawrence) has well discharged his duty to his constituents by making himself so thoroughly master of the question, and bringing it before us in so tangible and clear a form. He must have taken great pains with the subject, for he seems to have made himself completely master of it. The hon. Member has been fortunate in his campaign in this matter; for although he has attacked three Chancellors of the Exchequer—he has vanquished them all. He may well exclaim with the poet—

“ Thus far with victory my arms are crowned ;
For tho' I have not fought, yet have I found
No foes to fight withal.”

He has only appeared in character, and every one of them has been prostrate before his lance. I am not an exception to the rule. I have not a word to say against his arguments, and therefore he may have me as a fourth captive to his bow and spear. Nor will I do as the worthy Alderman (Mr. Alderman Lusk) fancifully anticipates—trouble the House with any pleas about my miseries and necessities; these will come soon enough when I open my Budget. I frankly admit that these taxes press very heavily, and that they are relics of other times and other manners. The post horse duty seems to have outlived the post horse itself; and there is no doubt, whenever the time shall arrive when the Chancellor of the Exchequer shall again address himself to the delightful task of alleviating the burdens of taxation, no subject can be mentioned that will be better worthy his attention than this. I hope the worthy Alderman the Member for the City of London, and other Gentlemen who have addressed the House, will be satisfied with this general declaration. The subject shall have my most serious attention whenever that attention can be profitably and practically applied to it. I will say one word in reference to what was said by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Murphy); and I am much obliged to him for having mentioned Ireland, for it is a peculiarity of that country that it is exempted from assessed taxes, and amongst others from the tax on carriages; and no doubt when we come to consider the subject—listening to the exhortations of the hon. Members for Edinburgh and Finsbury (Mr. M'Laren and Mr. Lusk) to “ Be just and fear not” in this matter—we may take into consideration the propriety of equalizing these taxes in the two parts of the United Kingdom. I hope the worthy Alderman will not persevere with his Motion, which can answer no good purpose; but that he will be satisfied with having thrown a great deal of light on this question, and with having made suggestions as to the way of dealing with it which I do not doubt will be useful to any Chancellor of the Exchequer who may be fortunate enough to constitute himself a pupil of the hon. Member.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he readily accepted the very frank and candid statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as an earnest that the right hon. Gentleman might at some future period relieve the public from this taxation. The right hon. Gentleman had felt himself unable to meet the arguments in this case; and it was to be hoped that it might be reserved to him to carry out his views upon the subject in the most satisfactory manner.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

INCOME TAX—RESOLUTION.

MR. WHALLEY said, he rose to move the Resolution, of which he had given notice. He urged upon the House that the adoption of this Motion would not depend upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer having a surplus to deal with. This was really a serious question, and he trusted that he would have the serious attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was a subject which had entered into the hearts of the people as one involving a grievance of great magnitude. He had that day presented fifty Petitions, signed by between 20,000 and 30,000 members of the trading classes and others, complaining of the way in which trades were assessed to the income tax. Amongst the petitioners were about 200 county magistrates, and it was reasonable to assume that in their view it was to the interest of the land—the successful cultivation of which mainly depended on the prosperity of the trading classes—that the trading and professional classes should be relieved from the intolerable burthen of the income tax. It was only fair to say that a very large proportion of the traders who had signed these Petitions did not concur in the view he took on this subject. They said it was reasonable that they should pay a special tax as long as the income tax was imposed on land and fixed property. They were willing to pay for licenses for carrying on trade, or any other tax which it was not difficult to devise, but all of them said they would no longer submit to the unjust, inquisitorial, and most injurious system of assessing and levying the income tax. He hoped the House would recognize that sentiment by at once unconditionally repealing the income tax. The Government said to a tradesman—Fix your own value on your trade. He generally gave the benefit of a doubt to himself by putting the amount of his income at a very low figure. In nine cases out of ten it was not possible for a trader to state the amount of his profit for the next year, or for the next three years, with such accuracy that it would not be open to dispute. Well, he sent in his return to the Commissioners, who generally surcharged him upon that. Such had been the anomalies of the system, and such irritation and sense of indignity and insult had been produced by it, that to his own knowledge many most respectable persons had been driven out of trade; and the general demoralization of trade was not very indirectly to be traced to the wholesale demoralization which the Government spread broadcast throughout the country, when they called upon traders to sit in judgment upon their own case, and subjected them afterwards to the ordeal of the Commissioners, who sat in judgment upon their own surcharge. The only objection to the Chancellor of the Exchequer at once acceding to the Motion was that it would be hard upon the landed property of the country that they should have to bear an addition to the present income tax sufficient to make up the deficiency arising from the repeal of the income tax under Schedule D; but he suggested that if the Resolution were carried the hon. Member (Sir Massey Lopes) would be in even in a better position than he was now for transferring a portion of the local burdens upon land to Imperial taxation, to which the trader would contribute through the indirect taxes.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That it is expedient to include in the Financial arrangements of the Government for the ensuing year the unconditional repeal of the Income Tax on trade profits and personal property of all kinds; and that any deficiency be raised by an increased tax on land and fixed property.”—(Mr. Whalley.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER: I agree with the hon. Member for Peterborough in two things. First, I agree with him when he says this is a serious subject. Secondly, I agree with him that the question whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer has a surplus or a deficiency cannot in respect of this subject make the slightest difference in the world. On these two points I agree with him; but I have listened to the rest of his speech without being able to agree with him in anything whatever. The hon. Gentleman is certainly very fortunate in having created so high an opinion of his merits in the breasts of the 200 magistrates and others who have intrusted him with this message to the House of Commons, and who, although they do not agree with him, have selected him to plead their cause. I do not agree with him, and certainly I should not have selected him to plead my cause. But the question is very easily stated; it is this—that trade and commerce, in the opinion of the hon. Gentleman, ought to be encouraged by having the burdens imposed on their profits taken off and imposed on land—on realized property generally. I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman, if he wishes to encourage trade and commerce, whether the way to do that is to hold out to persons successful in these pursuits that when they have made a fortune that fortune shall be taxed, in order to lighten the burdens on all the rest of the community? He tells us that the object he has in view is to relieve those persons of intolerable burdens and mischief; and in the same breath he tells us they do not really pay this tax, but that it falls on the consumer. He tells us the great misery they suffer is that they have to assess themselves and be judges in their own case. I can quite understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer and those who represent the Government objecting that persons on whom the tax is imposed are from the necessity of the circumstances judges in their own case—and no doubt that is the great defect in this Schedule, and affords an argument against it; but why persons who are the judges in their own case, and who, the hon. Gentleman says, invariably give themselves the benefit of the doubt, should object to that favourable position I cannot tell. When the hon. Gentleman talks about grievance and oppression, and tells us in the same breath that enormous frauds are committed, and that a great deal is not paid which ought to be paid, does he not show us that the grievance and oppression carry with them their own alleviation? I really wish to be serious. I do not want to offend the hon. Gentleman, but really it is difficult to be serious when such propositions are brought before the House; and yet, at the same time, I know that, when approaching this subject, we tread on delicate ground, for there are a great many people who do feel, and have been induced to feel by a long series of agitations, that there is great injustice in this tax. That is not my opinion. I believe, with Adam Smith, that every man should be taxed according to his ability. His ability, as Smith goes on to say, is the revenue which he derives under the protection of the State. I believe that to be sound ground. At any rate, if it is not so, we must not think we can amend the income tax, but we must give it up altogether. The notion of income is one very difficult to seize. It is like "now." In a moment it flies from you while you stop. It is the notion of a man's annual revenue abstracted altogether from the idea of the sources whence it comes and the purposes for which it goes. That is the idea of an income; and the moment you begin to say you ought to pay more on this Schedule and less on that, or abolish, as the hon. Gentleman says, a Schedule altogether, you are not amending the income tax, but destroying it, and making, instead of it, an unfair and bungling property tax. Unless you look at income without reference to the sources whence it comes or whither it goes, it is impossible to maintain an income-tax by any argument. You cannot make any difference by looking at the destination of income; and whencesoever it comes, if it is raised under the protection of the Government, it ought to contribute to the Government. The real evil of the income tax, in my judgment, is not that it is levied in a partial manner on land, or realized property, or profits of trade, but that, from the necessity of the case, persons having such income as that included in Schedule D are judges in their own cause, and that this in many instances holds out a temptation to those persons to give too favourable an interpretation of the amount of their liability. But to say that there is an objection to income tax is only to say that this tax is a tax; for the ingenuity of the human mind never did and never will devise a tax to which there are not objections more than plausible, and which would be absolutely convincing and irresistible if taxation were not a necessity. I am quite sure it is not necessary for me to take up more of the time of the House in resisting the proposition of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. WHALLEY said, he fully admitted that he had not done justice to the cause that had been committed to him, and that he was an unskilful advocate; but he considered that the right hon. Gentleman was discourteous in his criticism of the gentlemen who had committed the question to him. The right hon. Gentleman had no business to be discourteous. He was young in his place. The right hon. Gentleman had exceeded all ordinary license. ["Oh, oh!"] He had not only been discourteous, but impertinent—["Order"]—in the observations he had made. He assured the House he was labouring under a very severe cold. It was very little importance to him what opinion the right hon. Gentleman might hold of him; but it was unfair of him to have spoken as he did of those gentlemen who had signed the Petition. Of this the right hon. Gentleman might rest assured that the matter would not rest where it was. The House must excuse him if he put them to the trouble of dividing. ["Withdraw."] His right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, he observed, wished him to withdraw his Motion. Well, at the request of his right hon. Friend he would withdraw it.

METROPOLITAN POOR ACT (1867) AMENDMENT BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. GOSCHEN, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Metropolitan Poor Act (1867), said, he had hoped to be able that evening to make a statement explaining the results of the Metropolitan Poor Law Act of 1867, but as such a statement would entail the necessity of laying a number of statistics before the House, he should scarcely be justified in entering upon the subject at that hour. He would therefore merely state that the object of the Bill was to amend and not to repeal any part of the Act of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gathorne Hardy). With the permission of the House, he should wish to be allowed to reserve a full statement of the details of the Bill until the second reading, which he hoped to be able to fix for the first Thursday after the Recess.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would give him notice if he intended to make any observation on what he had said or done with regard to the subject.

MR. GOSCHEN promised to comply with the right hon. Gentleman's request.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Metropolitan Poor Act (1867), ordered to be brought in by Mr. GOSCHEN, Mr. ARTHUR PEEL, and Mr. AYRTON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 53.]

PRINT WORKS REGULATION.

RESOLUTION.

MR. CHARLEY trusted that, as a new Member, and as the representative of the working man, he should not ask the indulgence of the House in vain while he drew attention to the subject of the employment of women and children in print works. Under the existing law male children above the age of eight years and under the age of thirteen, and girls above the age of thirteen and under the age of sixteen, and women above the age of sixteen, might be employed for sixteen hours in one day in print works. This arose from the peculiar definition given to the words "day" and "night" in the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 29, whereby the word "day" was defined as being from six in the morning until ten at night, and the word "night" as being from ten at night until six in the morning. Boys above the age of thirteen could be employed from day to day continuously, without any interval being allowed for either meals or sleep. The educational clauses of the Print Work Acts were very defective—so much so that he understood that the inspectors had given up the attempt to work them in despair. Under those clauses a child was only required to attend school for thirty days in the half-year, and those days were to be continuous, so that a child might be at work for five months in the half-year and only one month at school. Of course, such a system of education was practically useless. The working men proposed to assimilate the Print Works Act to the Factory Act, under which young persons, women and children, could only be employed from six in the morning until six at night in factories; and under the educational clause a child must be instructed for three hours every day in the year except Saturday, and if the child was employed for ten hours in any one day it was to attend school for five hours during the following day. Nothing could be more easy than to apply the principle of the Factory Acts to the print works. It was almost superfluous for him to endeavour to point out the evils arising from the present system adopted in print works. Attention had been drawn to them in 1855, in a Report signed by four factory inspectors. In that Report these inspectors said that the school attendance under the Print Works Act was only a farce and a mischievous delusion, and that there was nothing peculiar in the labour in print works that would prevent the provisions of the Factory Acts being applied to those establishments. That Report was presented to both Houses of Parliament fourteen years ago, but no action whatever had been taken upon it. In 1867 a joint Report was presented by two factory inspectors—Messrs. Redgrave and Baker—which contained a similar suggestion, and stated that the Print Works Act had caused great dissatisfaction in many localities. From the hours she was at work it was impossible for a woman, employed in the print works, to attend to her household duties, and she was obliged to get up at two or three in the morning in order to do her washing and mending; to look after her children was, of course, an impossibility. The consequence was that the children were brought up without education, and were put out to nurse—a practice which led to great infant mortality. Of course, the young men engaged in these works did not go to any mechanics' institution, because they would not pay their money in advance when they were subject to be called upon to work continuously night and day. Under these circumstances it was not surprising that they could neither spell nor do a small sum in arithmetic. There were, however, two honourable exceptions to this system in establishments where the provisions of the Factory Acts were adopted with the most satisfactory result. When the attention of the Select Committee, which was appointed in 1867, was drawn to these facts they suggested that a Royal Commission should be appointed to inquire into the question. A Royal Commission, however, was not appointed, but a gentleman named Wright was sent down two years ago to inquire into the matter, but he had not yet made his Report. This was not a party question. Some years ago no doubt it would have been. Many gentlemen then in the House, of advanced Liberal views, were opposed to factory legislation, on the ground that it violated the principles of political economy. Factory legislation was denounced by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, with all that eloquent vehemence of which he was so great a master. But the right hon. Gentleman had recently acknowledged that he then made a mistake, and that on that subject, at least, he was radically wrong. He was not aware that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had ever lifted up his voice against factory legislation, though the first vote he gave was a silent vote against it. Recently, however, he too, had changed his opinions, and a letter, written by the direction of the right hon. Gentleman, and bearing the date of the 25th of February, 1867, expressed his disposition to take a favourable view of the operation of the Factory Acts. No doubt it would involve a violation of the principles of political economy if the House were to interfere in contracts between man and man. Here, however, the case was different; the interference of legislation was sought on behalf of women and children, who, unlike men, were unable to protect themselves. Women and children, it must be remembered, were exposed, not merely to the cupidity of employers, but to the cupidity of those who ought to be their protectors—their fathers, brothers, and husbands—who frequently sought to live in dissipation upon the earnings of those whom they ought to shelter. He knew that this question was a large one, and that it extended not merely to print works but to the case of workshops and bleach works as well. His Motion, however, was confined at present to print works merely. He knew that the Secretary of State for the Home Department was anxious to do what he could in the matter, and he therefore asked him to give an assurance, if possible, that a measure for assimilating print works to factories would be introduced in the present Session. If the right hon. Gentleman were unable to give such an assurance, he would himself, —though but a new Member and occupying a very humble position—be happy to introduce a Bill, upon the understanding that every reasonable facility for its progress would be afforded. He hoped he should not be met with the objection that the Irish Church would engross the whole of the attention of Parliament this Session. The Reform Bill in 1867 and the Irish Church in 1868 prevented legislation in those years, but he hoped legislation in reference to the present works would not be further delayed. The Irish Church question admittedly was but a sentimental grievance, while the grievances he had mentioned affecting English women and children were a practical and most serious wrong.

MR. WHEELHOUSE seconded the Motion, and on the part of the constituency which he represented, forming one of the largest hives of industry in the country, endorsed the statements made by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Charley). His only question was whether the same measure might not only include print works, &c., in large towns, but dye and other works.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the hours of toil of the women and children employed in Printworks ought to be assimilated to the hours of toil of the women and children employed in factories."—(Mr. Charley.)

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON said, he thought the House was discussing the question rather prematurely, and he expressed an opinion that it would be better to wait until they had received the Report of the gentlemen appointed some time since to inquire into and report upon the subject. For several years he had been in constant communication with the working classes of the northern division of Cheshire, and he could testify that their feeling was entirely in favour of the operation of the Factory Act. He was informed that—under a pressure of business—the women and children in print works were worked sixteen hours a day. Now, that was a state of things which everyone would wish to see altered. The Factory Acts were found to work admirably, and the working men, who never before sent their children to school, expressed themselves satisfied with the compulsory attendance of their children at school. He thought it would be better to wait for the Report, and he hoped that when it was presented the House would be in a position to legislate this Session upon the question of long hours and education.

MR. BOUVERIE said, it was very natural that the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Charley), should bring forward a question in which his constituents was largely interested. At the same time it would be only prudent to wait for the Report of the Commission. Whether circumstances had changed since then he could not say, but the reason given at the time why print works were not placed on the same footing as ordinary cotton factories was that, owing to the nature of the business in them, there was at times immense pressure to fulfil foreign orders, requiring almost continuous work for several days together. It was then found that a Bill resembling the Factory Acts would cause such an interference with the ordinary course of the print works as to be intolerable. Whether the course of the trade had since been altered he could not undertake to say, but the matter was one of importance, and the hon. Member for Salford would do well to wait for the Report of the Commissioners. He did not see that the hon. Member would gain any advantage by the Resolution, because his proper course, if he thought the matter ripe for legislation, would be to bring in a Bill. It was, however, illogical and inconsistent to say, as he did by this Resolution, that an Act ought to be passed, and at the same time not to bring in a Bill. If the hon. Member induced the House to pass his Resolution he would be no nearer than before. The remedy was an Act of Parliament, if it could be passed without damage to the trade concerned, and he hoped that when the Report of the Commissioners was laid before Parliament it would appear that the change was both advisable and practicable.

MR. E. POTTER said, the question was before a Committee two years ago, when there was a disposition to go into the whole matter, but it was found that legislation at that time would be practically useless. In 1845 the first Print Works Act was passed, and the fact that fifteen years elapsed up to 1860 before legislation was again attempted, showed the difficulty of dealing with the question. He fully admitted that the existing law required amendment; but, as a magistrate, he had never met with a case of infringement in his own district. He believed that masters would be very glad if the Government would take up the question, all they wanted being a fair workable Act. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Charley) seemed to have no idea of the difficulty of legislating, but the fact was that every trade and every branch of it required to be treated by itself. The earnings of the persons engaged in print works were much larger than those of any other class of persons engaged in manufactures. It was a healthy occupation, and the average age was better than that of any other class of manufactures. While the earnings of the workpeople were very large it was gratifying to be able to state that they were not spent in dissipation, and there was no better or more respectable class of workmen. The Report of the Commissioners would require careful examination; but from what he knew of the gentlemen engaged in the inquiry, he did not think there would be any great difficulty in legislating satisfactorily on this subject.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the subject, so ably brought before the House by the hon. Member (Mr. Charley), was of great importance, and excited great interest in the manufacturing districts. The hon. Member for Salford must have derived great satisfaction and encouragement from the remarks of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Potter), which he hailed as a harbinger of the satisfactory settlement of the question, which had long agitated the minds of numbers. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) said that the nature of the print trade was such that the provisions of the Factory Acts could not be applied to it. He could not forget, however, that a similar argument had been used year after year when it was proposed to apply the Factory Acts to bleaching, dyeing, and analogous works. It used to be said that it would be impossible in that case to carry out the orders of foreign houses; but at last that superstition was discarded, and now the Act was applied both to bleaching and dyeing works, and it was found that there was no real objection to the application of the principle and many of the details of the Factory Acts to these excepted works. Having been Chairman of the Committee to which reference had been made, he could confirm the statement that there was no reluctance on their part to go on with the inquiry, but in their opinion the reference from the House precluded them from going into that subject. They, however, accepted the proposition of an hon. Member to recommend the appointment of a Commission. He regretted that the Report of the Commissioner had not been laid upon the table; but he hoped to hear that a Bill would be before long, upon his Report, brought forward by the Government, and that the principle of the Factory Acts would be adopted and further carried out in these trades, with due provision for the special circumstance of the case.

MR. ALGERNON EGERTON said, that the workpeople employed in print works took a deep interest in the subject. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) had truly stated that one difficulty in legislating on this subject arose from the peculiar state of the markets, which might render it necessary for these print works suddenly to turn out an increased quantity of work. The hon. Member for Carlisle had also correctly stated that the occupation was much healthier than that of persons engaged in other manufactures. Still, the House would see at once that the question was whether it was right that young children under fifteen and women should be allowed to work for a period so long as sixteen hours. He hoped the hon. Member for Salford would not press his Motion tonight, but that the Government would give a promise to legislate upon it.

MR. MUNDELLA agreed in the opinion that legislation was required. If the power to employ women and girls for sixteen hours were given, they might be sure that it would be exercised by some unscrupulous employers. As to what had been said about the pressure of foreign orders, that statement would apply not only to the print works, but to various other works. It appeared to him that the whole question of the Factory Acts required revision and assimilation.

MR. BRUCE said, that the Print Works Act was one of the earliest efforts of factory legislation, and it was defective and imperfect. As the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Manners) had stated, a Commission had been appointed by the late Government to inquire into the subject. He understood that the Report might be expected in a short time—soon enough to enable the Government to undertake legislation on the question. With respect to education and the limitation of the hours of labour, it would be necessary to introduce some change, and, he believed, there could be no doubt, especially after hearing the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. E. Potter) that alterations might be made without any injury to the manufacturers themselves, and with great advantage to those whom they employed. He could assure the House that the moment the Report was presented the Government would consider it, and no unnecessary delay should occur in proceeding to legislation. He hoped, under these circumstances, the hon. Gentleman would withdraw his Resolution.

MR. CHARLEY said, he was perfectly satisfied with the promise of the right hon. Gentleman that, upon receiving the Report of the Commissioners, the Government would take the question into their serious consideration and introduce a Bill.

IRELAND—CITY OF DUBLIN ELECTION. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY appealed to the hon. and gallant Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly) that, in consideration of the Attorney General for Ireland having moved for the production of the Report of the Judge who had tried the petition, he would postpone his Motion with respect to the City of Dublin election. It was most desirable that the action of that House should be in conformity with the decision of the Judge, and therefore it would be necessary that they should have an opportunity of seeing the Judge's Report.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. SULLIVAN) said, that as the matter affected a constituency so important as that of the City of Dublin, he thought it was but right the judgment of the learned Judge should be laid on the table before his hon. and gallant Friend's Motion was submitted to the House.

MR. O'REILLY said, that after what had fallen from the two right hon. Gentlemen he should postpone his Motion until the judgment was laid upon the table.

Motion postponed.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. SULLIVAN), in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend "The Salmon Fishery (Ireland) Act (1863)," and the Acts continuing the temporary provisions of the same, explained that, in 1863, an Act was passed of great moment to the salmon fisheries, and under it a Commission with extensive powers was constituted, and three Special Commissioners appointed under the Sign Manual, whose tenure of office was at the pleasure of the Crown. It was provided by that Act that the office of Commissioner should last for two years, and thenceforth until the end of the next Session of Parliament. By the 42nd section it was provided that on the determination of the office of the Special Commissioners all the powers and duties vested in them should be transferred to two permanent inspectors, to be appointed by and subject to the control of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. The office of the Special Commissioners was continued by several Acts of Parliament passed at various times, and ultimately, by an Act passed last Session, the office was prolonged till the 1st of August, 1869. In 1866, Captain Spratt and Mr. Lane were appointed Commissioners, and in 1867 Mr. Pattison was appointed third Commissioner. It appeared, however, from representations made to the Home Office, that certain differences had arisen between the three Commissioners as to the mode of working the Commission, inquiries which appeared to be absolutely unavoidable were made, and the conclusion arrived at by the Home Office was that the harmonious working of the Commission was impossible. In October, 1868, the Home Office intimated in distinct terms its intention that the Commission should cease and determine on the 1st of December last. When that day came the Home Office sent a communication to Dublin Castle that the Commission had terminated, but it appeared that no communication was made to the Commissioners themselves. On that day the Lord Lieutenant appointed Major Davis in their place as permanent inspector, and on the 4th Mr. Brady was appointed another. Soon afterwards the present Government came into Office, and Mr. Lane, one of the inspectors, wrote to the Government to say he was still a Commissioner holding his seat under the Royal Sign Manual, which had not been revoked, and that consequently the appointment of the permanent inspectors was illegal and invalid. The Home Office adopting the view that the Commission could not work harmoniously, revoked the appointment of the Commissioners by warrant under the Royal Sign Manual on the 30th of January, 1869. Having regard to the large jurisdiction vested in the inspectors, and the important rights which they had to decide, it was necessary to bring in a short Act of Parliament to solve the difficulties which existed, and enable the inspectors to be appointed under the Act of 1863, as if the office of the Commissioners had determined. It was most desirable that the measure should be passed as rapidly as possible. The right hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the learned Attorney General for Ireland had explained what took place with regard to the Fishery Commissioners to a great extent, but not quite accurately. While at the Home Office he received frequent complaints that the Special Commission, then consisting of two members (Captain Spratt and Mr. Lane) was at a dead lock, and that nothing could be done. He, accordingly, appointed a third Commissioner, as he believed admirably fitted for the position, in the hope that the Commission would be brought to an early termination, but, unfortunately — and he would not then say who was in fault — the same difficulties arose between the three Commissioners as had arisen between the two; the proceedings were protracted from month to month, and the Commission had cost the country £5,000 too much. After due inquiries, the late Government gave the Commissioners notice that their Commission would terminate on the 1st of December, 1868; and he regretted that the Royal Sign Manual was not then obtained to bring it then to a close. That omission, however, happened at a time when many circumstances were occurring, and when, as everybody knew, there was much business to be wound up. He was only sorry that he had not taken steps to terminate the Commission a year sooner, for such a course would have saved the country much money.

MR. DENT said, he wished to say a few words on behalf of a brother officer, Captain Spratt, who, he thought, might have been mentioned with more respect.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. I have not said a word against Captain Spratt.

MR. DENT said, he was aware of that; but still his name was mentioned in such a way as to pass over the fact that Captain Spratt's conduct was approved, as he understood, by the right hon. Gentleman himself. [Mr. HARDY made a gesture of assent.] Captain Spratt was a distinguished officer, and his name ought not to be mixed up with others, as if he were to blame equally with them.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE must say a word on behalf of Mr. Lane, whom he had always found most courteous and attentive to the duties of his office.

COLONEL WILSON - PATTEN suggested that it would be only fair towards all the parties concerned that the correspondence on the subject should be produced, when the House would see that the late Government were perfectly justified in endeavouring to put an end to the Commission. On looking over the proceedings of the Commission he was surprised at the way in which the public money had been wasted. He should support the Bill, because he thought it was absolutely necessary that the Commission should be put an end to.

MR. HILL remarked that the correspondence showed that Mr. Pattison, who was called in as umpire, had fulfilled his duties in an unexceptionable manner.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he thought it desirable that the correspondence should be laid on the table, and he understood its production would be moved for by his hon. Friend behind him.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend "The Salmon Fishery (Ireland) Act (1863)," and the Acts continuing the temporary provisions of the same, ordered to be brought in by MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND and MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 56.]

PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS—SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. BRUCE moved that the Select Committee on Parliamentary and Municipal Elections do consist of twenty-one Members.

MR. MORRISON said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would consent to add to the Committee a Gentleman in whom a large section of the community would repose confidence with regard to the question of throwing the expenses of elections on the rates. The hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), had introduced a Bill on the subject, which was exciting very great public interest, and he had only been defeated on the second reading by a small number of votes. It was also desirable, in his opinion, that there should be on the Committee a Member who supported the adoption of representation by minorities, and the scheme of personal representation which was rapidly gaining favour among thinking people, and especially among the working classes. On a future day, therefore, he should propose that the Committee should consist of twenty-two Members, and that the name of his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), should be added to the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee on Parliamentary and Municipal Elections to consist of Twenty-one Members:—The Marquess of HARTINGTON, Mr. GATHORNE HARDY, Mr. BRIGHT, Mr. HUNT, Sir GEORGE GREY, Mr. VILLIERS, Sir FREDERICK HEGGATE, Mr. BRAND, Mr. CROSS, Mr. WHITBREAD, Mr. RAIKES, Mr. LEATHAM, Mr. STAVELEY HILL, Mr. LOCKE, Mr. HENRY SMITH, The O'CONNOR DON, Mr. GRAVES, Mr. DALGLISH, Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, Mr. JAMES, and Mr. HOWES:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Seven to be the quorum.

had been indicted under the Common Law, and had all been convicted. If he was rightly informed, all the indictments that had been drawn under Government authority against persons taking part in party processions or illegal assemblies were, until a recent date, instituted at Common Law, and not under the Party Processions Act. He hoped, then, that the Government would give up this partial legislation, and would go back to the Common Law. He made no claim on the part of the Protestants or Orangemen of Ulster to exclusive loyalty; he believed there were other people in Ireland ready to rally round the Constitution and Throne of these realms. He had no desire to see the ascendancy of Protestants over Roman Catholics; he had no desire to see the members of one sect trample upon the members of another sect, or obtain privileges which were not conceded to the whole of their fellow-subjects. He only wished for fair play for the Protestants and Orangemen of Ulster. He only asked that fair play to them as well as to the Fenians should be included in the programme of justice to Ireland. He would beg to remind the House, in the eloquent words of Lord Macaulay, "That the path of justice is the path of wisdom." He asked the House and the Government to enter on the path of justice towards the Protestants of Ulster, and he would venture to say that they would find it the path of wisdom. He trusted that Ireland would soon cease to be the shuttlecock of parties. He hoped that the day was not far distant when people of all creeds would learn toleration. Let them put an end to injustice and wrong; let them aid in developing and protecting the industry and the enterprise of Ireland; let them legislate so as to protect the rights of labour as well as the rights of capital and property; let them respect the interests of the tenant-farmers and the artisans as well as of the employers and the landlords; let them give the people just laws fairly administered; and then he would venture to assure the House and the Government that Ireland would share in the welfare of the Empire, and rejoice in the glory of England. In conclusion he begged leave to move the second reading of the Bill.

the course he was taking might tend to promote the union of all classes of Irishmen. He was aware that the law which this Bill proposed to repeal was regarded with great aversion by his hon. Friend and those whom he represented. They complained that the Party Processions Act curtailed their liberty of action, that its provisions were never enforced except as against them, and that in its conception and by its operation it was intended to gratify Roman Catholics by the suppression of certain ceremonies to which a section of the Northern Protestants attached considerable importance. Although he was convinced that neither the framers of the Act, nor those who had prosecuted under it, were animated by those intentions, such motives were ascribed to them, and the belief was industriously kept alive in the North, producing an amount of irritation which did more than anything else to bring about those periodical manifestations which he on many grounds deplored. It was the duty of everyone to endeavour to dispel the illusion that class, or race, or creed furnished any ground upon which any man or body of men could claim special favour, and it was the duty of every one to propagate the doctrine that the State could recognize no distinctions incompatible with perfect religious equality. The interests of all Irishmen were inseparable, and it was the duty of all to obey the laws, and maintain their supremacy; and he was the best friend of his country who endeavoured to promote union by encouraging friendship amongst men of all classes and denominations. He could not give a greater proof of his desire to co-operate in that good work than by assisting the Member for Belfast in repealing this Act, which that hon. Gentleman and his friends believed to be of a partizan character. The main object of the Act was no doubt to prevent the recurrence of exhibitions which whenever they took place must necessarily wound the feelings of every Catholic. It might be said, "Do you, then, mean to give full scope to those who would insult and annoy your Catholic brethren?" His answer was that the law had failed to accomplish the aim proposed; that like all other penal laws it created and fostered a spirit of resistance to authority; and that, while partially removing from public view certain emblems much cherished

by some, it had given fresh vitality to feelings and passions which would only yield to influences far different from those that a penal law could bring to bear. Violent measures only aggravated the evil they were meant to repress, and penal laws were powerless when opposed to sentiment and feeling; they could not substitute amity for enmity of heart; and until a change of that nature could be brought about in the North of Ireland there would continue there these scenes of strife which were a disgrace to our boasted civilization. He consented to the repeal of this Act because he had faith in the impartiality of the Executive, in the resources of the Common Law, but above all in the disposition of his Catholic brethren to make every sacrifice for the sake of union; and he believed it would be impossible for the generous and impulsive minds of Protestants in Ulster long to remain insensible to forbearance springing from so noble a motive. At all events, he was convinced that it was the duty of the Catholics of Ireland to make an effort, even at some sacrifice of feeling, to close divisions and heal wounds which were an incalculable weakness to Ireland. If peace and concord followed they would have proved this patriotism, and if discord continued they would have shown that they had done their best to put an end to it. He regretted the manifestations which annually occurred in the North of Ireland on the occasion of certain anniversaries, not on account of the recollections which they suggested, but because they indicated an unwillingness on the part of Protestants to amalgamate with their fellow-countrymen. The struggle which took place at the Revolution might be said to have involved a two-fold issue — the foundation of the Protestant monarchy in these kingdoms and the establishment of Protestant ascendancy. The Catholics, in the first instance, yielding, no doubt, to necessity, accepted the two-fold result, but with the reservation that they would assert for themselves the exercise of the most sacred prerogatives of conscience. No one could contend that a Protestant monarchy necessarily implied Protestant ascendancy. The Catholics were ready to fight for a Protestant monarch, and they admitted the virtues in social life of their Orange fellow-countrymen, but the latter must not object to the Catholics claiming equality with them. All must admit that the Catholics had done their part; that the Protestants had no just ground of complaint against them, and that it was foolish and barbarous to perpetuate feuds by the annual revival of bitter strife and by the assertion of pretensions which were inadmissible because they were unjust. He would remind his hon. Friend that the vast majority of the Protestants of these kingdoms were quite as much against Protestant ascendancy as the Catholics. His hon. Friend had referred to processions in other parts of Ireland besides the North; but there was no analogy between them to warrant the inference he drew. It was only proper to consider whether the objects and intentions of the processionists were morally and legally legitimate. With regard to the O'Connell procession, to which his hon. Friend had alluded, that was intended to celebrate the partial emancipation of the Catholics from a position of political and social inferiority, and to inaugurate the erection of a statue in memory of one who was regarded as a benefactor of his race. There was not the slightest ground to suppose that it was meant to give offence to anyone. But if secret processions were held two or three times in the year, they would become a nuisance; and if they were formed in districts where they were likely to lead to disturbances it would be the duty of the Catholics to abandon them, no matter how good their object might be. No one knew better than his hon. Friend that it was impossible to show that the Catholics were actuated by any intentions inimical to their Protestant fellow-countrymen. If they wanted an extended franchise, and the ballot to enable them to exercise it freely, the Catholics were willing to help them to get both the one and the other; and if they desired security of tenure to enable them to live for ever on the soil of Ulster, they might count on the earnest support of the Catholics in the accomplishment of their wishes. They were both destined to dwell together in the same land, and it was their duty to unite together as the citizens of one common country. How could this be done? Certainly not by the annual recurrence of processions to remind them of the time when their ancestors were arrayed in hostile bands. He would, therefore, appeal to his hon. Friend to use his great influence to put an end to distinctions which must lead to disunion, and could not be productive of one single good result. In that appeal he was sure he would be supported by the majority of that House and by the people of England. The policy had been abandoned for ever which was embodied in the words "divide and govern," and henceforth justice, which knows no distinction of race, creed, or class, was to be the great principle of government.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. W. Johnston.)

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE said, that last year, at a late period of the Session, he gave notice of a Bill, similar in effect to the present one, on account of the strong feeling he entertained that immense injustice was practised on one particular party by the manner in which the Party Processions Act was carried out. He had been blamed for not proceeding with that Bill, but he could not proceed with a Bill without the support of either one side or the other. His own party said the great measure—the Reform Bill then before the House—must have the precedence of all legislation; and from the other side, with some few exceptions, he received no support. Since then there had been a General Election, and these reasons were all changed, and the measure was now taken up by both sides. Many friends of his thought this so important a measure, that it ought only to be proposed by the Government, and then only in case it could be proposed with perfect safety to the country. But it had always appeared to him that the Act had this peculiar disadvantage—it left a jury to say how far these processions were within the law, while, in almost every instance, it was most difficult to define what was the intention and object of the processionists. He therefore thought it better to trust a generous nation like the Irish, and leave the future to the ordinary law of the land. He hoped he would sooner or later see this Act disappear from the statute book. [Cheers.] He was delighted to hear such generous sentiments emanate from the other side of the House; he was only sorry he did not hear them oftener. But why were those on that side of the House again twitted with a desire for Protestant ascendancy? For himself he must say he never had any feeling of ascendancy; it was only because Protestants belonged to a religion which was not that of the great body of the people in Ireland, and because they lived under a Protestant Queen and a Protestant Church, that they were taunted with Protestant ascendancy. He hoped they would be able to put an end to those acrimonious debates which formerly only contributed to the amusement of the House, and if the Government thought they could take the responsibility on themselves of repealing the Party Processions Act, he was sure they would be supported by all the Members from Ulster and many others on that side of the House.

MR. SERJEANT DOWSE said, he must strenuously oppose the second reading of this Bill. If the Party Processions Act were repealed it certainly would lead to a breach of the public peace. He felt very strongly the arguments which had been urged by his hon. Friend the Member for Belfast (Mr. Johnson) and his hon. Friend the Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue); he also agreed in a great deal of what had been said by the hon. Baronet the Member for the county of Londonderry (Sir Frederick Heygate); but he did not think the House should consent to the second reading of this Bill, which had been proposed so fairly, so calmly, and so eloquently, by his hon. Friend. He believed the Common Law was not sufficient to put down party processions in Ireland, and there was great wisdom in the Act which had been passed for the purpose of curing the defects of the Common Law. The Legislature thought the jury, especially with the musical education they received in the North, would be able to tell what was the meaning of a party tune, and not being colour-blind, that they would be able to tell what was the meaning of a party emblem, and therefore all the jury had to do was to say whether there had been a procession of 100 or 200 persons playing a party tune and having a party emblem calculated to excite animosity. The law said that was an unlawful assembly. He spoke as a Protestant and as a Liberal; above all, he spoke as an Irishman. He wished to represent in that House the feeling of his Catholic as well as his Protestant fellow-countrymen—he was strongly of opinion that if this Act were repealed it would lead to something which every lover of his country would afterwards have to deplore. He would trust the Orangeman in many things. He believed they were a plucky and independent race, and he did not think they would allow themselves to be dragged along by an oligarchy. He thought the return of his hon. Friend the Member for Belfast a proof of their independence; but he did not want to put the Orangemen of Ireland on their mettle yet. He wanted to give them a little more time to complete their political education. He wanted to disestablish the Irish Church, and when that badge of ascendancy was removed under the first Statesman of the age, when that Magna Charta of Irish liberty was passed—he would say when they enjoyed religious and social equality in Ireland. The Orangemen would give up the party processions of the 12th of July rather than vex their neighbours, just as we had given up the celebration of the 18th of June rather than vex an Imperial neighbour. All the Catholics in the North of Ireland were not as well read in the history of the British Constitution as the hon. Member for Tralee, and, as regarded the Protestants, he thought it would be as well if they would let King William rest in his grave, and not bring him up every 12th of July. If this Bill were passed, it would lead to misconception, and the Orangemen of Ireland would feel that they were at liberty to do as they pleased on the 12th of July. Processions would take place, many of them, no doubt, would be peaceably conducted, but others would lead to bloodshed. He should vote against the second reading if it were pressed to a division.

COLONEL STUART KNOX regretted that the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Dowse) should have made his maiden speech for the purpose of crying down the Protestants of Ireland. Every true Protestant should rally round an institution which had more than once stood between the Crown and revolution. The Prime Minister was about to throw the Bible on the floor of the House—he was going to treat the Protestants of Ireland worse than Mrs. Star treated Miss Saurin, for, did she not leave her one tunic? He was proud to belong to that glorious Orange society which they should look to to protect them, not only from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), but from those who wished to destroy the Church in Ireland. He had not always approved of the conduct of the hon. Member for Belfast, because he considered it the duty of every Orangeman to obey the law, whether it were harsh or not; but the law should now be repealed, and Protestants be placed in the same position of equality as the right hon. Gentleman told them he was going to place other Irishmen. He trusted that the Government would not come forward and propose a Committee or a Commission or any other “dodge” to keep the Orangemen in suspense for some time longer.

CAPTAIN STACPOOLE moved that the debate be adjourned.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, he did not approve of the celebration of the Protestant anniversaries; but, on the other hand, he did not see why processions should be tolerated in the case of those who were not loyal to their country.

MR. MACARTHY DOWNING rose to Order. The hon. Gentleman had no right to speak on the Main Question.

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. Baronet was in Order.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, he wished to throw oil on the troubled waters. [Laughter.] Hon. gentlemen might laugh, but he despised such conduct. While in one part of the country loyal men who broke a law with regard to processions were convicted by juries and punished, in another, men, who had not the same loyalty, indulged in similar conduct with impunity. That was a state of things which ought not to continue. He hoped that he should see no more Orange processions in Ireland, for he altogether disapproved of them.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE thought the House would agree with him that the proposal to adjourn the debate was a reasonable one, because the discussion could not be concluded that night with satisfaction to either side of the House. It was the desire of the Government that the Bill should be thoroughly discussed, and it was his desire to take a proper, and, he hoped, an early opportunity, of making a full statement on the part of the Government, both of the information in their possession on this much disputed subject, and of their views as to what ought to be done. These were good reasons for adjourning the debate. He did not think the time passed that night had been wasted, because they had heard two remarkable speeches, considering not only their ability but the quarters from which they came. He referred to those of the Mover and the Seconder of the Motion. The speech of the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Johnston) was not only able, but moderate and large-minded, and it came from a Protestant of the Protestants and a Saxon of the Saxons. Its sentiments were echoed in the same spirit by a Member (The O'Donoghue) of another religion from the most opposite point in Ireland, both in geography and in religion. Whatever might become of this Motion, these things augured well for the future of Ireland. As they had spent an hour and a half to such excellent purpose, he thought the House would agree it was impossible to conclude the debate at such an hour.

MR. VANCE said, that if it had been stated to which day the debate was to be adjourned, perhaps the opponents of the Bill would be more forbearing. The House ought to know when the debate would be resumed.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was impossible for them to name a day when the debate should be resumed. The second reading of the Irish Church Bill was fixed for Thursday next, and consequently he could not now name a day with confidence. It was not desirable that the discussion should be long postponed, and he would give every facility for its being resumed on an early day.

LORD HILL-TREVOR said, it was extremely desirable that the discussion should not be postponed. The people of the North of Ireland were looking with intense interest to the result of the discussion.

MR. WHALLEY said, no conclusive reasons had been given for the adjournment of the debate. Half-past one o'clock was not a late hour to continue the debate.

MR. GLADSTONE called the attention of the House to the fact that the Lords had appointed a Committee to inquire into the Business of Parliament. He said this was of itself a sufficient reason for this House to appoint a Committee to confer with them. He would therefore move "That a Select Committee of Six Members be appointed to join with the Select Committee appointed by the House of Lords, as mentioned in their Lordships' Message of Monday, 15th March, to consider whether any facilities can be given for the Despatch of Business in Parliament, especially in regard to the relations of the two Houses."

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That a Select Committee of Six Members be appointed to join with the Select Committee appointed by the House of Lords, as mentioned in their Lordships' Message of Monday 15th March, to consider whether any facilities can be given for the Despatch of Business in Parliament, especially in regard to the relations of the two Houses:—Committee nominated:—Sir GEORGE GREY, Mr. DISRAELI, Mr. BOUVERIE, Mr. WALPOLE, Mr. DODSON, and Colonel WILSON-PATTEN:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Three to be the quorum.

Message to The Lords to acquaint them therewith.

TURNPIKE ROADS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. WHALLEY, Bill to enable parishes in England and Wales to provide for the maintenance of Turnpike Roads within their respective districts as Public Highways, and to discharge the debts due thereon by parochial assessment or voluntary commutation, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WHALLEY and Mr. BLAKE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 52.]

LAND TAX COMMISSIONERS' NAMES BILL.

On Motion of Mr. AYRTON, Bill to appoint additional Commissioners for executing the Acts for granting a Land Tax and other Rates and Taxes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. AYRTON and Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 54.]

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LANDS (IRELAND) SUPPLEMENTAL BILL.

On Motion of Mr. AYRTON, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order under "The Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Act, 1863," and the Acts amending the same, ordered to be brought in by Mr. AYRTON and Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 55.]

LORD NAPIER OF MAGDALA [SALARY]
BILL.

Resolution reported;

"That it is expedient to enable Lord Napier of Magdala to receive the full benefit of his Salary as Member of the Council for the Presidency of Bombay, or as holding any other office in India, notwithstanding his being in receipt of an Annuity granted to him under the Act thirty-one and thirty-two Victoria, chapter ninety-one."

Resolution agreed to:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. DODSON, Mr. GRANT DUFF, and Mr. STANSFELD.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 57.]

House adjourned at Two o'clock.

DUMFRIESSHIRE WRIT.

Resolution [15th March] reported from the Select Committee on Members holding Contracts (Sir Sydney Waterlow) read, as followeth:—

"That Sir Sydney Hedley Waterlow is disqualified, under the Statute 22 Geo. 3, c. 45, from sitting and voting as a Member of this House."

Resolution read a second time, and agreed to.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a New Writ for the electing of a Knight to serve in this present Parliament for the County of Dumfries, in the room of Sir Sydney Hedley Waterlow, who is incapable of sitting and voting as a Member of this House under the Statute 22 Geo. 3, c. 45.

COUNTY COURTS BILL. [BILL 9.]
(Mr. Norwood, Mr. Akroyd, Mr. Mundella.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. NORWOOD, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the object of the measure was to relieve manufacturers and wholesale dealers from the serious hardship to which they were subjected by a provision of the County Courts Amendment Act of 1867.

By the clause to which he referred, to recover a debt not exceeding £50, the plaintiff must bring his action within the district where the defendant resides, or carries on his business—a provision which operated very harshly. For instance, a manufacturer at Manchester or Birmingham might sell goods upon credit to a trader residing in a small town at a considerable distance, and if the debtor neglected to pay, the plaintiff had to go to the County Court of the district where the defendant lived and prove his debt, often at an expense—putting out of view the trouble and inconvenience—very nearly as great as the sum claimed. He proposed to meet the hardship of the case in this way—In the case simply of goods sold and delivered in the course of trade, and in no other, he proposed that the plaintiff might, upon filing an affidavit, institute his suit in the County Court of the district in which he resided. Though at the first blush there might appear to be a hardship to the debtor in compelling him to defend himself in the County Court of the plaintiff's district, there would be really none at all, because in nine cases out of ten there is no defence, and judgment goes by default. The practical result of the existing state of the law was that many wholesale houses refused to give credit on small accounts, because the expense and trouble of obtaining payment was almost worse than the loss itself. But to prevent the possibility of hardship to the debtor, he proposed to insert a clause to this effect—that on the defendant receiving from the County Court of the plaintiff notice of the plaint, he might go to his own County Court, and upon stating that he had a good defence, and paying into court a reasonable sum to cover probable costs of plaintiff and his witnesses, the action might be brought there. Several Chambers of Commerce, and among them those of Worcester and Wolverhampton, were in favour of the Bill, and the question having been brought before the Associated Chambers of Commerce they had passed an unanimous resolution that there ought to be an alteration of the law. The Incorporated Law Society of London had intimated their satisfaction with the measure, with the exception of some trifling details which they would have altered; they had even asked him to go further, and not to restrict its operation to the sale and delivery of goods, to which it was confined. But there was higher authority still in its favour. The committee of County Court Judges appointed by the Lord Chancellor to take into consideration all questions affecting County Courts had, through their secretary, sent a communication entirely approving his Bill, and making suggestions the more effectually to meet any cases of hardship. To show the necessity for a change in the law, he might mention that it appeared from a Return that in 1866, out of 872,437 complaints issued, there were only 8,874 decisions in favour of the defendants, and more than half the complaints were decided without trial at all. That fact would abundantly support his statement—that the great bulk of the actions to which he alluded were positively undefended. Another thing that he proposed to do was to give a summary jurisdiction with reference to cases of tradesmen's dishonoured acceptances below £10, for there was an immense number of them which ranged between £10 and £5. Now, it was in the interest of the small tradesmen themselves that reasonable facilities for the recovery of debt should be afforded, because they depended upon the credit given by the wholesale houses, and that would not be given freely where those houses possessed no proper protection. He anticipated active opposition to the Bill, but he besought the House to weigh sufficiently the interests of the commercial classes in a matter so widely affecting their interests.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Norwood.)

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID rose to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He thought the Bill open to the objection of being at once too extensive and too narrow—too extensive as comprising things which did not, and too narrow as not comprising things which did, fall within the mischief intended to be remedied. The case which the hon. Gentleman sought to make out was that of the inconvenience and damage caused by the present state of the law to wholesale traders in their dealings with the retail trade. But he (Sir Francis Goldsmid), had heard, over and over again, that the retail traders were subject to quite as much inconvenience from unpaid debts as the wholesale. Tailors, for instance, were obliged to charge their paying customers much more than they otherwise would, in order to recoup themselves for losses from customers to whom they gave credit, and who did not pay. But it was not suggested that retail traders would be benefited by the proposed enactment. On the other hand, he would show that this Bill would extend to persons as to whom the hon. Gentleman had made out no case, and whom he did not intend it to affect. The 2nd clause applied to actions for the price or value of goods sold and delivered to the defendant to be dealt with in the way of his trade, profession, or calling. If that clause were adopted, such cases as these might occur. An artist, for the colours to be used in the painting of his pictures, a schoolmaster for school requisites, a clergyman for the paper on which he might have written some excellent theology, might each be brought from one side of the kingdom to the other to defend an action—in a case, where, perhaps, an overcharge had occurred—simply because they made use of the things supplied in the way of their profession or calling. The hon. gentleman had assumed that in almost all instances the plaintiff was in the right, and he instanced the large number of cases which were undefended. But that was owing to the present state of the law, and was no reason for altering it, since if we gave facilities for bringing actions carelessly, they were sure to be brought. Now, if the House considered to which party the greater inconvenience would be occasioned by a cause being tried at a distance from his place of business, they would find that it would be to the retail trader, because the wholesale dealer had a number of travellers who were constantly going about, and it might be no great hardship to have one of them attend to prove the debt. It would be quite otherwise with the retail dealer, who might be called from one end of England to the other in order to defend the action. Then the 3rd clause was even worse, for it proposed to give the holder of a bill of exchange the right to sue in the district in which he carried on business. Every gentleman who, whether from being engaged in commerce or otherwise, had acquired any knowledge of bills of exchange must be aware that it was of their very essence to be transferable from holder to holder. Now, any man taking a bill of exchange either knew or might easily ascertain where the acceptor was, and therefore where the holder had to sue. But if this Bill passed the unfortunate acceptor never would have the slightest conception where he was to be sued, because the bill of exchange might at one moment be held in Northumberland, at another in the neighbourhood of Land's End. That would afford the greatest encouragement to unfair actions. Commercial men might, no doubt, be well aware where the shoe pinched; but, speaking as a lawyer, he ventured to say that they did not always know how to prevent its pinching. Believing that the object of the Bill was ill defined, and that its provisions were ill calculated to effect that object, he begged to move that the Bill be read the second time that day six months.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS, in seconding the Amendment, said there were several grounds which might fairly be put forward in opposition to that Bill. One of the most important of those grounds was that it was unwise and impolitic to legislate on this subject in the way of reforming one branch of our system of judicature when the whole of that system required, and would, he believed, shortly undergo a thorough reform. The present County Courts were established in 1846 to give cheap and speedy remedies for the recovery of small debts. For that purpose they proved successful; but from time to time a continual course of casual and piecemeal legislation had been adopted in regard to those courts, which had entirely altered their original character and objects. Their jurisdiction had been successively extended to Equity, Admiralty, and Bankruptcy cases, in addition to questions of Common Law; and, not only had the Judges of those courts to perform their multifarious duties without a Bar to assist them, but, to add to their difficulties, they had to administer all those various branches of the law subject to different courts of appeal, each governed by different, and sometimes conflicting, legal principles. Their decisions were liable to review in Equity cases by the Court of Chancery; in Admiralty cases by the Court of Admiralty; and in Common Law cases by the Common Law Courts. The result of that state of things did not redound to the credit of our system of judicature; and it arose from the fact that small Bills of that kind were allowed to pass through Parliament almost without attracting any attention, until, by degrees, the whole law of England was fundamentally altered and thrown into confusion, and the odium of it was cast upon the lawyers. That was a system which it was their duty to oppose. The lawyers and the commercial men should join together in carrying out the reform of our system of judicature. A Commission was now sitting on that subject, whose Report might be expected very shortly, and they might hope that, from its recommendations, a complete and sweeping reform of that description would follow. He thought that all the different superior courts should be consolidated into one supreme tribunal, with universal jurisdiction, and possessing absolute and complete power to distribute the different classes of business amongst different branches of such tribunal, and to construct the necessary machinery for doing complete justice in every instance. In addition to that, let them have one final appellate court for the whole Empire. And, lastly, he would have all these County Courts made into distinct courts, associated with the supreme court, to bring justice to every man's door throughout the country; and the limit of their jurisdiction might be fixed at £100, £200, or £500, as might be deemed expedient. He believed that no obstacle would be raised by the lawyers to the adoption of such a reform, the interests both of the lawyers and of the commercial men being the same in that matter. With regard to the Bill then before the House, its 3rd clause, in his opinion, involved a mischievous principle, and would cause great injustice to acceptors of bills, who might be sued without notice and even without presentation. He did not refer to trade bills, but to bills of other classes. There ought certainly to be a summary remedy afforded in reference to bills of exchange, but the mischief of the clause applied to those numerous cases where bills of exchange had been improperly obtained, and where either nothing at all was due, or only a portion of the amount named in them was so. In many cases it would happen that an acceptor sued in a remote part of the kingdom by a pretended bond fide holder for value would find it more to his advantage to submit to some amount of extortion than to travel to that place with witnesses to defend himself.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir Francis Goldsmid.)

MR. MACFIE was disposed to reserve his judgment upon that Bill until they had heard the Attorney General's opinion of it. The present occasion, however, was, he thought, a good one for the House to consider the question of whether the codification of the commercial law was not desirable. Very great inconvenience arose from the difference in the law north and south of the Tweed, and it was especially desirable to consider whether Scotland should not be brought within the range of the English law where the English law was the best, and England also brought within the range of the Scotch law where the Scotch law was best.

MR. MORLEY desired to endorse the opinion which had been expressed by the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood), that the class of cases proposed to be dealt with under this Bill was one which called for attention at the hands of the Legislature. The fact that only one in ten of the actions brought in the County Courts was defended established this. A man who purchased goods on a fixed term of credit, and failed to keep his engagement, was guilty of a breach of contract, and the plaintiff, in recovering the money, ought not to be put to any more trouble than was absolutely necessary. He would give the defendant every security for his costs, provided he could make good his defence, but the plaintiff ought to have every necessary facility for recovering the money which the defendant had failed to pay. Whether the present Bill met the evil complained of or not he would not pretend to say, but he certainly did think the state of things which now existed called for the attention of the learned Attorney General.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, if this were a Bill extending the jurisdiction

or altering the character of the County Courts, pending the inquiry to which reference had been made by the hon. and learned Member for Denbigh (Mr. Watkin Williams), he would have been prepared to vote against it. But the measure did not really partake of that character. It seemed to him to be only the proper and natural corollary of the Act of last Session, and to which indeed the objection now taken to the present Bill was more properly applicable. During the operation of the first Act, no matter where the debtor might reside, the plaintiff had the right of bringing his action in the superior courts for any debt exceeding £20, or for any sum where the cause of action did not wholly arise within the district where the defendant dwelt, and of bringing him from any part of England to defend himself. But the last Act had taken away this right, and the plaintiff was compelled to bring his action in the County Court of the district where the defendant dwelt, under pain of losing his costs if he recovered less than a certain sum. There were provisions in the Bill to guarantee the defendant against the hardship of being taken to a great distance in order to defend himself. The plaintiff was required to make affidavit of his debt, and also that it was a debt for goods sold and delivered. The defendant might give notice to the registrar of his district that he had a good defence, and then the plaintiff would be required to find security for the costs. With regard to loss from being taken away from his business, it must be assumed that the Judges would make proper compensation in cases where the defendant proved to be in the right. In the case of bills of exchange, he thought it would be unfair to persons who might give bills of exchange to transfer that jurisdiction wholesale—as might be done on the face of the Bill—to the County Courts; but, as he understood the hon. Member (Mr. Norwood), it was intended to give those courts jurisdiction only to such an amount as they already possessed, in the case of goods sold and delivered. Believing that the Bill would only bring into fair operation the Act of last Session, as a lawyer he was very happy to offer it his support.

MR. T. CHAMBERS said, there was a preliminary objection to the Bill proposed—namely, that its object was to apply a special remedy to a special grievance at a moment when the whole operations of our system of judicature were under the consideration of a special Commission whose Report was soon expected. It appeared to him, therefore, to be inexpedient to press, at such a time, alterations of so trifling a character as where a cause should be tried. The alleged grievance complained of was, after all, a very doubtful one; and if the proposed remedy were adopted, it was very questionable whether it would not have the effect of creating a much more serious and substantial grievance in respect to a large class of individuals who might be improperly sued upon claims against which they had a good defence. There was no doubt that the establishment of the County Courts had conferred great advantages upon the public generally; and even supposing that it was wrong to make the creditor follow his debtor, the remedy proposed by the hon. Member for Hull involved the introduction into the County Courts of a scale of costs which would go far towards frustrating the very object for which those tribunals were established—namely, the cheap and facile recovery of small debts. Any incidental advantage which might accrue from the adoption of Bills like the present would not compensate for the injury they might do to the most useful institutions ever set up in this country for administering justice. He therefore hoped that the measure would not be pressed.

MR. ST. AUBYN said, that according to the statement of the author of the Bill himself the measure was introduced in the interests of manufacturers and wholesale dealers and, besides that it certainly paid small regard to those of the smaller tradesmen, it entirely overlooked those of the working classes who might be grievously oppressed under its provisions. He hoped that the Bill would be withdrawn for the present, with a view to its provisions being rendered more fair and equal to all parties concerned.

MR. STAPLETON said, he doubted very much whether the Bill was viewed with favour by either the commercial community or the legal profession, and the only lawyer in the House who had yet spoken in favour of the Bill represented, in common with most of those who supported the measure, a commercial and manufacturing community.

One of the objections to the Bill was that it would enable a gang of swindlers to carry on their calling by spreading themselves over the country and suing the same parties at the same time in the County Courts in remote districts. He recollected a story in Yorkshire of a very ingenious tradesman belonging to that county, who carried on business as a saddler. When he found there was one saddle sold, as to the purchaser of which he was in doubt, his custom was at Christmas, when he made out his bills for his customers, to set down a saddle in every individual account, so that if he made out twenty-seven bills he charged twenty-seven saddles to his various customers. There were parties also who might do a most successful business by bringing suits on the speculation of getting the costs. He could not help believing that the real author of this Bill must be the ingenious tradesman he had mentioned. Instead of its being a hardship on a dealer to go a long distance in order to sue his debtor, the hardship was generally the other way, as the plaintiff was provided with an attorney who could very easily manage the matter for him. In his opinion the science of jurisprudence was less understood in England than in any other civilized country. For instance, a Bill was often allowed to be proceeded with although clause after clause was inserted which destroyed all the efficiency of the original measure. With respect to the question now under consideration, the best way to deal with it would be to retain the present rule as to the issuing of the plaint, but to allow the Judge to change the venue on good ground being shown for such a proceeding.

MR. HENLEY said, he was always unwilling to thrust in his oar among learned Gentlemen, because he knew the danger of so doing. He, however, ventured to ask the attention of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, because he knew that the hon. and learned Gentleman had strong opinions upon the question of imprisonment for debt; and he wished to ask him whether, under the provisions of this Bill, there might not be an extension of the system of imprisonment for debt? Now, imprisonment for debt under the County Courts Acts really meant penal imprisonment. It was not simple confinement at the will and pleasure of the Judge of the County Court when it was alleged that the defendant was able but unwilling to pay—under what he (Mr. Henley) always considered the miserable pretence of contempt of court—but an imprisonment of an absolutely penal character. In the original Act, he believed it was laid down that for every 1s. owed there might be one day's imprisonment; but the statutes on the subject had been since so altered and multiplied, that he could not pretend to say what the present law was. If the Government were disposed to assent to a large extension of the jurisdiction of those courts he hoped they would take into their consideration how far imprisonment for debt ought to exist in respect to poor people when it was almost entirely abolished in respect to all other classes. He confessed he always thought it unfair that this power of imprisonment, as it was now exercised by the County Court Judges, should exist; and he now ventured to suggest to the Law Officers of the Crown and the Home Secretary—if they were going to extend this jurisdiction—the necessity to which they might be exposed of providing much additional prison accommodation for the many more unfortunate persons that would be committed under the orders of the Judges.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he intended to take an intermediate course in reference to the Bill. He should ask his hon. Friend (Mr. Norwood), who had charge of this Bill, to postpone its further progress until, at all events, they had received the Report of the Judicature Commission who were now investigating the whole judicial system of the country. Their Report when complete would deal with the rearrangement of circuits, and other provisions for the more effectual administration of justice locally by the superior courts; and as the local administration of justice was a question to be dealt with as a whole, he thought he was entitled to ask his hon. Friend to postpone the consideration of this measure. Some of the objections that had been urged against the Bill were of a very serious character, and he confessed he looked with alarm upon the powers proposed to be given to the holders of bills of exchange. These powers were such as might be perverted so as to effect a great injustice upon parties who might be sued by an endorser, living hundreds of miles away, upon bills of exchange for which they had, perhaps, received little or no consideration. He concurred in the remarks made by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Marylebone (Mr. T. Chambers) that the County Courts worked on the whole extremely well, and that their institutions were among the most successful efforts of modern legislation. He therefore deprecated the practice of endeavouring every Session to tinker them by the introduction of some such measure as that before the House. Such efforts tended rather to despoil those courts of their many advantages than to improve them. He trusted under those circumstances, that the hon. Member would accede to the reasonable request of postponing his Bill. With respect to the appeal made to him by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Henley), he could assure him that he felt the full force of his observations. He (the Attorney General) had already succeeded in passing an Act limiting the power of imprisonment for debt exercised by the County Court Judges, and he believed that the Act had worked successfully, and that they had now fewer complaints upon that point than they had had previously to its passing. He was however aware that the evil still existed. It was a question, no doubt, of great difficulty; but he did not think that the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman in respect to it applied fairly to the Bill, inasmuch as its object was not to extend the jurisdiction of the County Courts—although one or other of its clauses might have such an effect. In a few days, it was his intention to bring in a Bill for the total abolition of imprisonment for debt, when he was sure the right hon. Gentleman would find that he had provided some safeguard against this particular jurisdiction of the County Court Judges.

MR. NORWOOD said, that after the appeal which had just been made to him by the hon. and learned Gentleman he would consent to the postponement of the Bill, reserving, however, to himself the power to proceed with it at a future time in case he should deem it expedient to do so.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday 12th May.

REVENUE OFFICERS BILL—[BILL 14.]

(Mr. Monk, Sir Harry Verney, Mr. Craufurd.)

MR. MONK, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said the Bill proposed to repeal portions of a statute of the 12 & 13 Will. III. and of two statutes of Anne, which prohibited the civil servants of the Crown from interfering in elections, under penalty of £100, of being deprived of their appointments, and being rendered incapable of holding any office of trust under the Crown. The measure was, in fact, merely the complement of the Revenue Officers' Disabilities Removal Act, which was passed last Session. That Act restored to the servants of the Crown in the Revenue Departments the right of voting at Parliamentary elections, but it did not give them the full rights of British citizens, for they were still precluded by the statutes referred to from some important privileges. The Bill consisted only of one clause, with a Schedule attached to it, but nevertheless it affected the rights of a large number of civil servants of the Crown, who earnestly desired, and had a right to demand, that they should be put on a footing of equality in respect to the franchise with their brethren in other departments of the Civil Service. With a partial and somewhat remarkable exception, to which he would presently refer, the revenue officers were precluded by the restrictive statutes enumerated in the Schedule to the Bill from the exercise of the rights and privileges of British subjects; they were unable to take any part at an election beyond simply recording their votes, and if they attended political meetings they must remain silent, and take no active part in the proceedings; they were likewise prohibited from proposing or seconding a candidate on the hustings, and from soliciting a vote for the candidate of their choice. Now, was it not an anomaly that a man should be allowed to record his vote while, at the same time, his mouth was so effectually closed that he dared not discuss the merits of the rival candidates even with his next-door neighbour? He believed that the enactments in question could not be allowed to remain in force now that Parliament had decided upon giving to revenue officers the right of voting. When he brought forward the Revenue

Officers' Disabilities Removal Bill, he restricted it within the narrowest possible limits; and he was ready to take upon himself his full share of blame for not having trusted implicitly to the spirit of fairness and generosity which animated the late Parliament; but he must remind the House that the supporters of that Bill had to contend not only with a Government which was opposed to them, but with the heads of two of the Departments which they were seeking to enfranchise. If he had embodied in that measure the provisions of the present Bill, the 36,000 revenue officers who were enfranchised last year, would, in all probability, not have been enabled to record their votes at the last election. He was, however, happy to say that during the last year a great change had come over the Commissioners, and some of those high functionaries who then opposed the proposition were now completely in favour of it. A friend of his, holding a high official position in the Civil Service, who not only opposed the Bill of last year, but furnished the text for the speech of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer in opposition to it, told him the other day that he heartily approved of this Bill, as a necessary corollary to the Franchise Act. He added that he had been obliged to decline to propose a candidate, now a Member of this House, through fear of the exceptional penalties to which his branch of the service was subject. According to the existing law, a revenue officer who proposed or seconded a candidate for a seat in that House rendered himself liable to be fined £100, and on conviction he would be deprived of his situation as a civil servant, and permanently incapacitated from holding any office of trust under the Crown. Now, the object of the present Bill was simply to repeal the sections of the Acts which imposed penalties of this nature. The 89th section of the 12 & 13 Will. III., c. 10, prohibited officers in the Customs from taking any part in elections, and inflicted the penalties which he had enumerated on all offenders. The 9 Anne, c. 11. sec. 45, inflicted similar penalties on officers in the Post Office, and in the tenth year of the same Queen another statute was passed affecting the collectors of certain taxes therein specified. He had grave doubts whether the 10 Anne, c. 18, prejudicially affected any officer in the Civil Service at the present day; but as it had been stated on high official authority that certain subjects of duty included in that Act still remained subjects of duty, and as all the provisions of that Act were continued in relation to duties, which were in the place of those thereby imposed by the 55 Geo. III., c. 184, sec. 8, he considered it desirable to include it in the repealing Schedule of this Bill. He came now to the third and last remaining Department. The officers in the Inland Revenue Department had been prohibited, under similar penalties, from taking part in elections, by virtue of the 5 & 6 William and Mary, c. 20, sec. 48, but that Act was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act of 1867. That repeal was owing, he believed, to the fact that a more recent statute—the 7 & 8 Geo. IV., c. 53, sec. 9, imposed a penalty of £500, instead of the smaller penalty of £100, imposed by the Act of William and Mary on officers of the Excise who interfered in elections. But this more severe penalty was repealed by the Revenue Officers Disabilities' Removal Act of last year, so that the revenue officers were, at the present moment, politically free, unless the penalties of the Act of Anne were revived by the Act of 55 Geo. III., c. 184, sec. 8, or by some other obsolete statute. To guard against the possibility of any of those officers being left under any disabilities after the passing of the present Bill, he should, when it went into Committee, move the clause of which he gave notice about a fortnight ago. It was to the effect that, after the passing of the Act no commissioner or person employed in collecting the revenues should be liable to any penalty by reason of his having endeavoured to persuade any elector to give, or to dissuade any elector from giving, his vote to any candidate for a seat in Parliament. This clause would enable the revenue officers not only to vote but to take part in elections in the same manner as any other people, and would complete the legislation of last year. It was needless for him to add that the revenue officers looked upon this disability as a grievance, if not as a positive stigma and disgrace. He was not aware that any sound arguments could be adduced against completing the measure. The revenue officers were a highly independent body of men, and by conferring on them the right of voting the House had introduced a valuable element into the electoral body. That element might indeed be Conservative, but it was Conservative in the best sense of the word; and he might remark in passing that most of the newly-enfranchised officers in one of the Departments at Gloucester voted against him at the late election—and he honoured them for their independence—yet no class of men were more interested in the stability of our institutions or less likely to encourage revolutionary measures. He was inclined to hope, until a day or two ago, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have come down to the House fortified by reports of a far more favourable description than those which were laid upon the table last year by his predecessor in Office, and that the right hon. Gentleman would have announced the determination of Her Majesty's Government not to refuse so trifling a boon as was now claimed on behalf of these hard-working and well-educated men in the Civil Service. But whatever might be the course which the right hon. Gentleman should think it his duty to pursue, he should ask the House to express its disapproval of the anomalous state of the law, which allowed one branch of the Civil Service to vote and speak and canvass at elections, while it restricted another branch to a silent vote. The hon. Member concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

SIR HARRY VERNEY, in seconding the Motion, said, that if, as had been formerly urged, there was a fear of any combination on the part of the revenue officers, the Government would be as well able to deal with it as they were now with a combination in the army. The privilege of taking part in elections ought, in his judgment, to be granted to these men, in the same manner as it was to Army and Navy and the other Departments of the Civil Service, and if they abused it they should be removed from the public service. He had great pleasure in seconding his hon. Friend's Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Monk.)

MR. PEASE said, that he had always entertained very strong opinions on this subject. Last year the Legislature thought fit to confer the right of voting on a great number of revenue officers;

but he always had had doubts on the propriety of enfranchising these men, on the ground that it was placing in the hands of the Crown political power, of which the House ought to be very jealous. The hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) mentioned that almost all the revenue officers in that city voted for the Conservative candidates. They did so likewise in one of the boroughs in the county which he (Mr. Pease) represented. But in his opinion it was not because they were Conservatives at heart, but because they had a feeling of hostility against Liberal Governments for having pursued a course with regard to the repeal and reduction of duties inimical to their interests. It appeared to him that this House had from all time most jealously guarded its privileges as against the power of the Crown, and in placing political power with those who were the servants of the Crown; and, however little that view might have anything practical in it at the present time, it behoved the House to guard well the safeguards and liberties of the House. In his opinion this was a Bill which, like that introduced a short time ago respecting the re-election of Ministers of the Crown, affected the privileges of the House of Commons. The First Lord of the Admiralty had informed the House a few evenings before that a great reduction had been made in the number of clerks in that Department, and how, he would ask, were the men who had been thus discharged likely to vote at the next election? Was it not natural to suppose that they would vote against the Government which had been the means of depriving them of their situations? Being very jealous of the privileges of that House, he believed it had gone far enough in the direction to which the Bill of the hon. Member for Gloucester tended, and holding that opinion he should, although he was well aware that there were many worthy men in the position of revenue officers, in whom great confidence could be placed, but who should not be allowed to take active part in elections, move that it be read again that day six months.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I rise to second that Motion. I would beg to remind the House that the exact question before us is not whether the persons to whom the Bill relates ought or ought not to have a vote.

That question was decided last year; and the question with which we have to deal to-day is whether they ought to be allowed to persuade voters to vote in a particular manner; whether, in other words, they should be permitted to be canvassers, proposers, and seconders, and in these capacities to take an active part in elections, like the rest of Her Majesty's subjects. This question turns on the duties which are performed by those whose capacity of political action we are now invited to enlarge. My hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) asks us why we withhold from officers in the Revenue Departments privileges which we give to clerks in the West End—to those, for instance, in the Home, the Colonial, and the Foreign Offices? The answer is, I think, very plain; we do so just because they are revenue officers. The clerks in the West End offices write letters all day; they are removed from the parties to whom those letters are written; they are not brought into personal contact with them, and exercise, as a general rule, no power over them whatsoever. The position of the officers in the Revenue Departments is entirely different. To them is entrusted the collection of a good deal more than £60,000,000 per annum; and how do they collect that amount? Not by sitting in a room in Downing Street and writing letters, but by going abroad among the people, mixing themselves up in some measure with their affairs, instituting into those affairs a most inquisitorial examination, counting the number of a man's servants, of his clerks, his horses and carriages, looking minutely into his income, making themselves acquainted with the correctness of the returns of the income which he sends in, with the progress of the manufacture in which he may happen to be engaged, imposing all sorts of disagreeable and annoying interferences on the course of his trade—in short, doing all those things which, except for the purpose of collecting the revenue, the law of England would not for a moment tolerate. In all this consists the difference between the position of the revenue officers and those other officers to whom my hon. Friend has referred. But lest the House may think that I am not competent to form a just opinion on a matter of such enormous importance, I will take the liberty of reading a few passages bearing upon it from the Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to the Treasury last year. They say—

“The real danger lies in an opposite direction. It is not the increase of the power of the Government in controlling elections which is to be apprehended, but the paralyzation of the Executive in administering the revenue laws firmly and impartially, and to use the words of our Oath of Office, ‘without fear, favour, or affection’ for the public good; and it is with a deep sense of this danger that, being responsible for the assessment and collection of duties amounting to £40,000,000 in the year, we seize the opportunity afforded by your Lordships’ reference to deprecate most earnestly the projected enfranchisement of those employed in the Department of Inland Revenue.”

“Our answer is because clerks in the War Office and officers in the army are not distributed over the kingdom with charge of distillers, brewers, maltsters, spirit dealers, tobaccoists, and other traders, to watch and control their operations, in the course of their manufactures or trades, as are officers of Excise; nor to ascertain the profits of every trader and professional man, and the number of servants, horses, and carriages kept by every individual, as are officers of taxes. . . . If an Excise officer so situated should find it his duty about the time of the election to procure a search warrant to ransack C. D.’s house, or to put his distillery under seizure, and bring an information against him for penalties, no one can doubt that he would subject himself to the greatest suspicion of using the power conferred on him as a revenue officer to serve a political party, and the mischief of such an imputation would be nearly the same, whether it were true or false. Again, it is often necessary that we should use the large powers confided to us in the interest of the public, in a mode necessarily placing an Excise trader at a disadvantage in competing with others, as by requiring a maltster, whom we know to be in pecuniary difficulties, to pay the duty upon each steeping of grain as soon as it is made into malt.”

Observe the minute interference. They suspect a man’s credit, and they require him to pay the duty upon each steeping of grain. But suppose the suspicion to be unfounded, and the man happened to be a political opponent of the revenue officer who acted upon that suspicion, how easy would it not be to make a charge against that officer of having sought to effect the man’s ruin? The Commissioners proceed as follows:—

“We must, of course, be guided very much by information from our local officers in such a case; and it is a difficult and delicate matter, even now, to make it manifest that we are acting with strict impartiality. If our officers were political partizans it would be perfectly impossible. The converse of such cases is equally to be apprehended. If a trader, subject to the Excise laws, or a manufacturer, liable to make returns of profits under Schedule D, came under the supervision of a revenue officer, known as an active supporter of the party to which the manufacturer or trader also belonged, what can be more certain than that rivals in trade of the opposite party would impute to favouritism, at the expense of the revenue, any immunity from charges or restrictions which they themselves might not enjoy.”

These are considerations which appear to me to possess the greatest possible practical weight. They come from persons who have a thorough knowledge of that about which they write; and, if the House will allow me, I will read one more paragraph from the Report. The Commissioners add—

“The power of removal to which we have just been referring is one of the most valuable parts of our disciplinary system. If an officer is believed to be on terms of too great intimacy with a trader under his survey; if he has fallen into the company of bad associates; if he appears to be deficient in the acuteness and energy requisite for dealing with some fraudulent trader; or if he has identified himself with any particular religious sect or parochial party, so as to be obnoxious to other sects and parties in the locality, his removal to another district is a ready and effectual check to the mischief which would otherwise ensue. But when the officer becomes a voter, when he is perhaps one of the managers for a political party in a small borough, what will not be our difficulty in sending him away, perhaps on the eve of an election, and what will not be the suspicions of party motives to which the Board, and the superior officers who recommend his removal, will be subjected.”

I am sorry to have been obliged to trouble the House with these extracts, but it is much better that they should have the opinions of men who speak with the advantage of longer practical experience than mine upon this subject. We must not forget what is at stake in this case. It is no sentimental matter. It involves the question of the collection of a revenue of over £60,000,000 a year; and the anticipations of the dangers which would be likely to arise if the change now proposed were carried into effect appear to me to be justified by the most ordinary principles of human nature. The result of that change must, I think, be that the control of the Department over its officers would be weakened by the fear of having it imputed to them that they were actuated by political motives, and that those officers will be supposed to be actuated by other motives than a desire to perform properly their duties in the collection of the revenue. The discipline of the machine will in consequence be imperilled. Disorder will ensue, and no one can fix the extent to which the revenue may suffer. An element of confusion will be introduced into an establishment which requires the most careful management and the most minute supervision, which has to be worked with a delicacy of which many persons little dream, and in which the slightest change in the ordinary rules, however necessary that change might be in the public interest, would be sure to be attributed to other motives than the wish to promote the efficiency of the Department. Such being the dangers against which we have to guard, how very slight is the advantage which this Bill proposes to confer on those upon whose behalf it is brought forward. The officers of the Inland Revenue have already power to record their votes at elections; what is now asked for is that they should be allowed to mix themselves up with the turmoil of election contests; and are we, for the sake of indulging a little vanity on their part, and giving them an opportunity of involving themselves in proceedings which most sensible men would be very glad to keep out of, to run such risks as those to which I have adverted? Let me suppose a man wished to be returned for a town in which the revenue officers took an active part in politics; he would naturally desire to conciliate them; they would be the best canvassers he could employ. See what mischiefs they might be able to do the trader, and how, owing to the influence which they would exert over him, they might render themselves the most potent possible agents in intimidation. For no species of intimidation goes so directly home to a man sometimes as that which arises from the knowledge that another is almost as well acquainted with his affairs as he is himself, and that he can, by making a report with respect to them, hamper him in the pursuit of his business. There are other considerations to be taken into account—such as the influence which a Government may, under certain circumstances, exercise over the officers of this Department; but putting that consideration aside, I would remind the House that, if it permits those officers to mix themselves up actively in political life, the neutral positions which they now occupy between the two parties in the State will be destroyed. One of the reasons why we are enabled to raise our present immense revenue, and to support the immense burdens which are placed upon the shoulders of the taxpayer, is that the Revenue Departments have—at all events ever since the time of Lord Liverpool—been free from any suspicion of political influence. You may, however, depend upon it that once you introduce into that branch of the public service the political element it will spread, and you will see realized in England that which is the greatest bane of America—an evil from which she is now manfully struggling to relieve herself, and as I sincerely hope with success. If you insist upon the right of these officers to transform themselves into active political partizans, you may rely upon it that a Government coming into Office will not tolerate in situations of great trust under it persons advocating violent political opinions—opposed, it may be, to its own—and it will come to pass, not, perhaps, at once, but by degrees, that we shall witness here that miserable state of things which prevails in America—the change of the civil servants of the country as one party or the other happens to hold the reins of Office. I would say, then, principiis obsta—do not advance the first step in such a career. You have now, I believe, as admirable an instrument as was ever placed in the hands of any Government for the performance of that peculiarly delicate service—the collection of the revenue. Let well alone. Do not, for the sake of a few vain persons who may seek to make themselves a little more important by meddling in business which will be just as well transacted without their interference, break in upon principles which have so long enabled us to bear such enormous burdens. America has boundless resources, and can afford to do almost anything without being ruined. We, with our limited area, are in a very different position, and I earnestly hope the House will not assent to a measure the dangers of whose operation may be so great, while the advantages which it seeks to confer are so infinitesimal.

MR. CLAY said, he should support the Bill. He thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer would agree with him that it was the interest of them all to make the voter aware of the sacred nature of the trust committed to him, so as to induce him to record an honest vote for the public good. Now, what was done with these men? We allowed them the privilege to vote, but forbade them at any public meeting to state the reasons for the vote which they were about to give, or to make any profession of the faith that was in them. Was that the way to bring home to them a knowledge of the sacred nature of the trust confided to them? The fact was that every argument which was used last year against giving these persons the franchise had been urged that day against allowing them publicly to express their opinions, and the whole question resolved itself into a distrust of their honesty. We did these men great injustice in distrusting them. He asserted with perfect sincerity that he had never found in his life a body of men more honest and less liable to be influenced by party feeling than the civil servants, and he did not believe that there was any class of men in the country more likely to make good and independent voters. It was apprehended by some that if this Bill were to pass, a pressure might be put upon Members of that House by civil servants. He had had more to do with these persons than probably any other Member of that House, and he could say that though pressure had been put upon him by many other classes of persons he had never experienced the slightest pressure from that quarter. Then it was objected that they had powers of combination. Did no one else combine? Not to speak of trades unions, the Lobby gave daily evidence of the best organized combinations of all interests. Publicans and Maine Liquor Law men, Sabbath observance advocates and those who would open places of amusement on the Sunday, all properly found strength in combination.

MR. LIDDELL said, he was one of those who voted last year in favour of giving the officers in question a right to exercise the franchise; but he, nevertheless, must admit that the tendency of the present Bill seemed to him to throw grave doubt on the wisdom of the decision at which they then arrived. Those who voted for the Bill of last Session felt that the continuing to withhold the power of voting from these men was perpetuating an injustice on them, considering the position they held in the country; but, the arguments which he had just heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer induced him to think that the House ought to pause before it proceeded any further in the same direction—for there was nothing in which the country was more deeply interested than in the preservation of the purity and high character of its public servants. The House, therefore, would, in his opinion, do well to reject a proposal which might have the effect of leading those to whom it related to mix themselves up with political agitation in a way that would be injurious to the best interests of the community.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that he had some acquaintance with the civil servants in the Customs Department, and felt bound to declare that he had not come into contact with a more straightforward or honest set of men, and he deprecated the idea that any danger to the public service would result from their admission to the exercise of the privileges which the Bill sought to confer. Prophecies of evil did not go for much with him, they had been made by those who were opposed to the repeal of the Corn Laws; while it was said last year, that if a measure granting household suffrage were passed a House of Commons would be elected which would be composed of persons who "feared not God neither regarded man." Well, those hon. Gentlemen who had been elected knew best whether that prophecy was or was not correct. He, for one, did not believe it had been realized, any more than would be the prophecies which they had listened to in the course of that discussion. He hoped, therefore, the House would not refuse its assent to a measure which was just in itself, and would enable the meritorious class of officers in our Revenue Department to enjoy those electoral privileges which other classes of the community possessed.

MR. AYRTON said, that when the subject was under the consideration of the House last Session he had opposed the measure then brought forward by his hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), because he anticipated that, while no advantage to the public interest would result from its operation, it might endanger the proper working of the Revenue Department. Now, he felt bound to state that, so far as his own personal experience had since gone in the borough which he had the honour to represent, it was not favourable to the legislation of which his hon. Friend was the author. He would not, however, enter into details with which that experience furnished him, beyond remarking that he happened, fortunately, to occupy a position in the borough which enabled him to defeat the proceedings to which he was alluding in a way which other hon. Members might not be able to do when engaged in a close contest. But the question before the House on the present occasion was not, whether Parliament had last year acted wisely or otherwise in dealing with the subject; although it might very well form matter for discussion whether the Bill of his hon. Friend as then passed embodied the deliberate opinion of the House of Commons, or owed its success to any of those accidental circumstances for the occurrence of which the last Parliament was quite peculiar in the history of the country. Be that as it might, what the House was now invited to do was to make a large stride in advance of the legislation of last Session. In replying to that invitation, hon. Members ought, he thought, to bear in mind that there was a fundamental distinction between officers in the Revenue and those in other Departments. The latter, though servants of the Crown, took part in elections as simple inhabitants of the particular district in which they happened to reside; but revenue officers would mix themselves up with such proceedings, bearing with them, as it were, the income of the nation to the extent of £70,000,000. ["No, no."] Hon. Members might cry "No," but there was no doubt that they could use the influence which their position gave them to a very large extent. He, however, should oppose the Bill before the House, not only on public grounds but in the interests of the best class of revenue officers themselves—that was to say of those men who were disposed to devote themselves to the discharge of the duties of their situation, and not to mix in politics with the view of recommending themselves to the notice or patronage of any party in that House. That was the sort of officer, who, in his opinion, ought to be supported. It was probable, he might add, that owing to the numerical proportions of the constituency in the metropolis, the officers there engaged in the collection of the revenue, might not be able to exercise a very great influence at elections; but there were other places beyond the metropolis where a man so situated might exercise very considerable influence; and how, he should like to know, would a Member in whose behalf such a man might have actively exerted himself, refuse to listen to a claim on him made by one of his best supporters? As matters at present stood, there was a very good regulation against the interference of Members of the House of Commons for the purpose of obtaining the promotion of an officer in the Inland Revenue Departments. He deemed it to be his duty, on accepting the Office which he had the honour to hold, to inquire into the subject, and he asked the Chief Commissioners of the Boards of Customs and Inland Revenue whether they rigidly adhered to that regulation? They assured him that they did. Now, he (Mr. Ayrton), would state to the House, that, if any Member of the House of Commons spoke to him on the subject of promotion for any officer in their Departments, he should place the regulation in the hands of that Member; and if, after that, he chose to mention the name of the person for whom advancement was sought, and the person was known to him, he should send the name to the Commissioners—not for his benefit, but that punishment might be inflicted on him in accordance with the rules laid down. He had been induced to make these remarks because the Chairman of the Board of Customs said that—

"Since his appointment he had received numerous applications from noblemen and gentlemen, soliciting the promotion of officers and clerks in the service, and it appeared that other members of the Board had frequently received similar applications."

[An hon. MEMBER: How long ago?] The Minute from which he was quoting was dated the 16th of January, 1847—there was no doubt that we had in those matters been improving of late, in consequence of the Minute, which proceeded as follows:—

"There can be no doubt that in most, if not in all of these cases, the applications have been made at the instance of the respective officers and clerks, in direct contravention of their instructions and the Board's 'General Orders' upon the subject. The Board are determined that the promotion in the Department shall be governed solely by good conduct, efficiency, and length of service, and that they will not allow their recommendations to the Treasury to be influenced in any degree by any applications or representations which may be made to them by persons unconnected with the Department; such applications are, therefore, not only irregular, and in violation of the recorded orders and regulations of the service, but useless for their object; they tend also to embarrass the discretion of the Board, inasmuch as in any case in which an officer would be entitled to promotion on his own merits, application made in his favour by influential persons affords ground for suspicion that the selection of the officer has been influenced in some degree by private considerations, and that without the exercise of such interest the claims of the officer would have been passed over, a suspicion which, however unjust and unfounded it may be, cannot fail to weaken in the minds of the officers of the Department that confidence in the justice and fair dealing of the Board which the Commissioners are most desirous to possess. The Commissioners will, at all times, be ready to receive and take into consideration representations from officers in the Department addressed to the Board officially; but they think it right to apprise the officers and clerks throughout the service once more, and in the most formal manner, that private applications from officers themselves, or from other persons in their behalf, addressed to individual members of the Board, are expressly interdicted, and that the same will not only have the effect of retarding the promotion of the parties, but subject them to the Board's severe displeasure."

That was the notice which had been issued by the Customs Department. A similar notice had been issued by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue; and he (Mr. Ayrton) would confidently appeal to hon. Members to say whether those rules could be maintained if such a change as that proposed by the Bill was effected, not only in the relations of revenue officers to that House, but in their relations to one another? The fact was that it would be impossible, under the altered circumstances, to preserve the necessary discipline in the Department. If its officers were permitted to take an active part in elections they would, as a matter of course, be recommended for promotion by those whom they supported, and those recommendations would be forced, not only on the heads of the Department, but on the Government, and as far as possible on that House. The offices in the large cities, where the pay was better, would be sought after, and perhaps obtained, by an officer in a small borough who was able to make himself of great importance at the elections there in promoting the success of a particular candidate. As things at present stood, we possessed a system under which the officers in our Revenue Department occupied a position of neutrality, and which might challenge comparison with the system of any other country; but if the Bill before the House were adopted there was great danger, as had been said by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that we should drift into that system which seemed to prevail in the United States. He had asked an American politician to give him an account of the working of the United States' constitution in that country; and the reply was that it resolved itself very much into a question of "in" and "out." When they entered on a political contest he said they cast about, and the "outs" having ascertained who were likely to obtain offices if they should be successful, got them to subscribe to a common fund. When that fund reached the necessary amount, they went to work as hard as they could on the election, and if they succeeded all the candidates for places got them according to the amount of their contributions. The "ins" contributed to a fund in the same way, and if they were victorious those who already had the places of course kept them. Did hon. Members think this a better state of things than existed in England? Surely it would be a deplorable change if the smallest shadow of such practices should prevail here. With that view it was of the utmost importance to keep our revenue officers entirely free from such participation in politics as was likely to disturb in any way the regular discharge of their duties. He hoped, therefore, that the House would not concur in this proposal, which would gratify the feelings of only a few of those affected by the Bill; while, in the end, it would be prejudicial to the great majority, even of the revenue officers themselves.

COLONEL SYKES said, he voted for the Bill of last year under the full belief that those officers would use their votes as honestly as other men; but the arguments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of the Treasury, if good for anything, showed that the revenue officers were not worthy of the electoral trust, and would abuse it; implying distrust, also, of their integrity in the discharge of their peculiar duties. Such arguments tended strongly to show the necessity for the Ballot, which, hap-

MR. BREWER thought there were questions of great moment involved in the Bill. He admitted that the revenue officers were generally men of high character, but, as servants of the Crown, their position was a peculiar one. They were intrusted with functions and duties of a very delicate character; and he thought that the very nature of their trust required that they should be subjected to some restraint. He should, therefore, support the Amendment, from no disregard for the claims of these gentlemen, but from a paramount regard for the interests of the community generally.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY thought that this question could not, in any way, be made a party question. It seemed to him that the objections taken by the opponents of the Bill were rather inconsistent with other portions of their speeches. They were loud, for instance, in their praises of the body of men for whose benefit the Bill was proposed, and declared that no persons could better deserve the confidence and esteem of their countrymen. But how were these praises to be reconciled with the argument also urged—that the virtue of these men was so feeble that they must not be placed in the way of temptation, and that it was absolutely necessary, in order to keep them pure, to deprive them of the ordinary privileges of Englishmen? The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the object of the measure was to enable the officers of the revenue to gratify their vanity, and enable them to distinguish themselves by speaking upon the hustings. He was surprised that, when persons sought to take part in public affairs and exercise the ordinary privileges of Englishmen, they should be told that they were seeking to gratify their vanity. That was not an argument which he expected to hear urged at this time of day and in that House. To listen to some of the speeches just made from the Treasury Bench one would have supposed them not to be arguments directed against the Bill of his hon. Friend, but in support of a proposal to repeal the Act of last Session; because if the arguments used on the Treasury Bench had any weight at all, they were not half so weighty against the present measure as against the Act of 1868. Not only, indeed, were they arguments which might have been urged against that Act, but every one of them had been urged against it, though urged in vain. It was true that the Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Ayrton) had introduced rather a new topic, because he had shown the House how easily and how extensively bribery and corruption might be carried on in a country in which the Ballot prevailed; but this was an argument more germane to the debate of last night than to the present discussion, though probably it was not an argument likely to have fallen from the Treasury Bench upon that occasion. That was the only new point which the hon. Gentleman suggested in his interesting account of the mode in which elections were managed on the other side of the Atlantic. Now, the House should remember that this Bill was not confined to the servants of one particular Department. It included the officers of the Post Office as well as officers of the Customs and the Inland Revenue; and he had not yet heard a suggestion that the officers of the Post Office were so intimately connected with the collection of the revenue that they would exercise any baneful influence upon those with whom they came into contact. The question belonged in no way to party—it was a question upon which different opinions might prevail on both sides of the House; but he confessed that some of the arguments just urged were not such as he had expected from those who had used them, and did not apply to officers of the Post Office, who were not in the least likely to exercise these privileges improperly. With respect to the apprehended danger of intrusting political power to an organized body, such as the civil servants of the Crown, who might organize opposition to the Government of the day, or support the Government, as the case might be, with a view to their own private interest, he was tempted to ask whether other organized bodies were unknown to the country and the House? Was there no such interest as the railway interest or the publican interest? Yet, he had never heard any proposal to deprive railway shareholders or publicans of any of their privileges as citizens lest they should organize themselves with a view to their private advantage. He could not, therefore, see on what possible ground a special body of men whose character and services hon. Members had vied with each other in eulogizing should be denied the privileges enjoyed by their neighbours from a fear, forsooth, they might exercise an undue influence on Members of Parliament and on the proceedings of this House. Upon these grounds, he should give his cordial support to the Bill.

MR. HENLEY said, he differed from the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, and thought the Government had come to a sound conclusion upon this subject. It was not a consideration whether the civil servants of the Crown were pure or not. He had always been of opinion that our public servants had done their duty with great fidelity and impartiality; but he was also of opinion that if they got mixed up in all the turmoil of party conflict—a result of which, if this Bill passed, there was great risk—though they would not necessarily become impure, they would not be free from suspicion. Now, suspicion in such a case was almost worse than actual impurity, because with the one you could grapple, but not with the other; and, considering the very delicate and difficult duties which those gentlemen had to discharge, it would be a great misfortune if anything arose which rendered them liable to suspicion of partiality, especially from political motives. He should support the Government, not because he thought that these gentlemen might not be as well fitted as anybody else for the exercise of political privileges, but because, if they exercised these privileges as the Bill proposed, they might be suspected of partiality in the discharge of their duties.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he would not go over the arguments which had been so well urged by other speakers in favour of the Bill, and in which he entirely concurred. He might indeed, observe, in support of those arguments, that in Scotland the question occupied a very peculiar position. He had several years since introduced into the Burgh Boundaries Act for Scotland a clause which enabled revenue officers to be placed on the electoral roll for municipal purposes. By that clause they obtained the right to vote, to canvass, and even to become candidates for municipal honours. Now, in Scotland the same electoral roll served both for municipal and for Parliamentary elections, and he thought this state of things brought out very prominently the absurdity and hardship of allowing a certain class of men to become citizens for one purpose and not for another of a similar nature. But his object in rising was to draw the attention of the House to a point in the Bill which, he thought, had been hitherto entirely overlooked in its discussion. The Preamble declared that it was expedient to solve certain doubts which had arisen owing to the legislation of last year. It had been supposed at first that by the Act of last Session, and by the Act for repealing certain statutes passed by the Statute Law Commission in 1867, an end had been put to all political disabilities of revenue officers. But doubts were suggested, arising from the existence of two editions of the statutes at large, in which the chapters were differently numbered, as to how far the penalties for canvassing or interfering actively in elections had been repealed. And in Scotland, at any rate, there arose a different practice in different counties, causing much confusion during the late General Election. Thus in Ayrshire, an Inland Revenue officer was allowed to act as the paid agent of one of the candidates; while in an adjoining county the Inland Revenue officers received notice of their liability to penalties if they canvassed, and they consequently abstained from all interference in politics beyond simply recording their votes. He thought that it was most undesirable to continue such a state of things, and therefore all doubts upon the subject should be cleared up by passing this Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am sure that my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Craufurd) would not wish the House to believe that we are discussing a question no broader in its scope than the removal of doubts as to the construction of an Act of Parliament. We are really engaged in discussing a most important principle; and as my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) does not seem to have been aware, when he moved his Bill of last year, to what it would lead in the present Session—he gave us no intimation then that we were to have a Bill of this nature this year—so I think he cannot now be aware what this measure, if adopted, would lead to next year. There is no doubt that by the Bill of last year the hon. Gentleman established an important change in the position of members of the Civil Service; but the question we are now dealing with touches the position of some of the most important members of the Civil Service. It has been well said by the hon. and learned Member for Southampton (Mr. Russell Gurney) that this is not a party question. Now, I know not whether the rumour to which I am about to refer be well founded, but I have heard it stated that members of the Civil Service, in preponderating numbers, voted at the last election for the party which is now in Opposition. I know not if this be true, nor do I greatly care to inquire, but it has been stated in the course of this debate that they did so, and it was intimated that they did so because they looked upon me as having been for a long series of years distinguished by too great rigour in the administration of the public finances. Now, if this be true, I must say that I do not think it is a source of strength but rather of weakness to the party opposite; because, if it has the effect of making us weak with this particular class, it must make us so much the more strong in the support of the nation at large. I say, if it be true that such an impression prevails, and upon that account the members of the Civil Service have a leaning to the party which is opposed to us, we can have no better title than this with which to place our cause before the country. Mind, I do not make the charge. ["Oh, oh!"] I say I know nothing as to the truth of the statement; but with great deference to the Gentleman opposite who sneers at what I am saying, I warn him and all who think with him—and though I do not expect him to believe me, the warning is a friendly one—against building their hopes of public strength and influence upon any foundation so narrow and unsound as the acquiring of the favour of particular classes by measures which are not for the general good. The House has a natural prepossession, and I own a just one, in favour of the removal of restraints upon the exercise of political rights. I respect the opinion of the hon. Gentleman who spoke last, and I respect the opinion of the hon. Member for Gloucester; nor will I stop to observe that, although, as has been said, the revenue officers at our ports may not interfere with the discretion of Members of Parliament, it happens by some strange coincidence that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gurney) represents an important port, with many revenue officers among his constituents, and that my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) and my hon. Friend the Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) are in the same predicament. When my hon. Friend (Mr. Norwood) says he has not found any great pressure put upon him from revenue officers I do not at all wonder at the statement, because I think in his case no such pressure was at all required. My hon. Friend (Sir Harry Verney) says that if danger is anticipated from the operation of this Bill we must rely upon the firmness of the Government. Now, I have not a bad opinion of the firmness of Governments, but the Executive Government is essentially and necessarily political in its character, and is it right that the Legislature, which ought to be jealous in the interest of the public, should say—"We will repeal restraints which now exist in the interest of the public, and rely, instead, upon the firmness of the Government to do"—what? Not to restrain the aberrations of civil servants who may be its opponents so much as the zeal of those who may be its friends. But then it is said—and this was the main assertion of my hon. Friends who support the Bill—that the whole argument against it rests upon an imputation of dishonesty as regards our civil servants; and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Russell Gurney) adds that there is a gross inconsistency between the language used, according praise and credit to the officers of the Civil Service, and the conduct pursued in withholding from them these privileges. Now, I impute no dishonesty to our civil servants. In a long series of years, during which I have been in communication with our civil servants, no one has heard a syllable of that kind fall from my lips. But I deny that an imputation of dishonesty is involved in particular cases by those restraints upon political liberty which are otherwise accorded to all. What is our law about contractors? We do not permit a contractor to sit in this House. Do we, therefore, mean that contractors are dishonest, or that they are less honest and upright than other men are? Certainly not; but we will not allow them to take a position where their honesty may be exposed to particular solicitation and trial. That, and no more than that, is what we exact with regard to our civil servants. But then, what is the position of Members of this House? Is no restraint imposed upon them? Why those rigid rules in the Revenue Department prohibiting and resenting the interference of any Member of Parliament with regard to the promotion of any person employed in that Department? Are not Members of Parliament in many respects persons well qualified to recommend for such promotions? My hon. Friend the Member for Hull (Mr. Clay) says he has perhaps had more intercourse with revenue officers than any other Gentleman in this House, and his recommendations, therefore, in this respect would be well founded and valuable. Nevertheless, if he were to send a recommendation to the Board of Customs or Inland Revenue, he will get an answer which would be more intelligible than polite. Am I to be told that on that account there is any imputation on the honesty of Members of this House? The reason is that the position of Members being one which exposes them to peculiar solicitation, they are liable unconsciously to come under a bias adverse to the interest of the public service, and therefore, we deny ourselves the advantage which might often be derived from their local knowledge and experience, and compel them to remain silent upon every question of promotion in the Revenue Departments. Can anything be more absurd, can anything be more anomalous than the system which my hon. Friend deliberately proposes to establish? I will suppose myself, for a moment, to be Member for Liverpool. As the Member for Liverpool, I should not be permitted to say a single syllable upon the subject of the fitness of any revenue servants there for promotion in the Customs or the Post Office; yet, at the same time, under the Bill of my hon. Friend, the Collector of Customs at Liverpool might have been the chairman of my election committee, and his verdict would be that which would decide every case in which recommendation for promotion might be made. Is such a relation desirable? Would a Bill which established it be a measure of reform or a measure of retrogression? Would it be a measure favourable to the interests either of the community or of the class? And if it were—as I think it would be—a measure of retrogression, would it not be the most dangerous of all retrogressions, inasmuch as it comes to us in the shape of a reform? Now, I am going to make a confession which I have seldom made, but I am now released from the charge of finance—and by-the-way, I cannot say what satisfaction and comfort I personally feel when I reflect that I have now made it over into other and abler hands—being thus released, and having the tie taken off my tongue, I beg the House to bear in mind what extraordinary duties the officers of our Revenue Departments are called on to perform. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Russell Gurney) cannot satisfy us by setting up the case of the Post Office, though if he will move for a Committee to institute a careful inquiry, with a view of seeing whether there are any persons to whom those restraints should not be applied, I do not know that I should resist such an investigation; but he proposed to sweep away the whole, and therefore I am bound to inquire what the particular nature of these duties is. We have to raise in this country a revenue of some £70,000,000 a year. That is about one-eighth or ninth part of the whole revenue of the country. If there is any Gentleman in this House who happens to have nine sovereigns in his pocket, though he may believe them to be his own, they really are not, for one of them will infallibly, on the average, find its way into the Public Exchequer. It is the duty of the revenue officers to draw out the ninth sovereign and put it into the Exchequer. The processes are many and various, and some of them are not devoid of danger to the liberty of the subject. I grant that there is no great difficulty or temptation when we collect the revenue by means of Queen's heads pasted upon the corners of letters; and if we could collect our whole revenue in that innocent form, the arguments against the Bill would be weaker than they are. But there is very little raised in that innocent form; and when we come to the greater branches of the revenue, the Excise and the income tax—painful as it may be to make the confession—and it is of no use to conceal it,—the hard necessities of the State and the heavy legacy which our ancestors left to us—along with other more desirable things—in the shape of a National Debt compel us to take much money from the subject by means which undoubtedly greatly invade and restrain the liberty of the subject. I do not believe that our ancestors who, ages ago, objected so strongly to the Excise, could ever have dreamt of the income tax; but when they objected to the Excise they were not so irrational—it was not without cause that the country was torn from end to end by the horrors of a system which appeared to be such an invasion of personal liberty. I hardly think that in our day the House is quite aware of the functions which have to be performed by revenue officers; and if Parliament were called upon to re-enact clause by clause the Excise Laws and Income Tax Acts of this country, I think the House would be shocked at the nature of the powers which the absolute necessities of the State render necessary. Now, the exercise of these powers is in the hands of men who, down to this time, we have carefully separated from the temptations and the passions of political strife. Not only so, but of all the administrative reforms in the present century, the best have been those which sought to abridge the influence of the Executive Government, its power over the patronage of the Civil Service, and that power of Parliament over the Civil Service. The name of Lord Liverpool ought to be honoured among us to this day, for he was the Minister who did away with the power of promotion—ininitely more powerful than the power of appointment, which had before his time been the scandal of the country and a fertile source of corruption. Patronage is a powerful instrument of Government; but why is patronage to be taken out of the hands of politicians sitting in this House and placed in the hands of another set of politicians sitting in the Customs or in Somerset House? We have tried by our public law to create a body of functionaries entirely exempt from these temptations; but the measure of my hon. Friend is a much further departure, and a more important and dangerous departure, from this principle, than any that we have hitherto recognized. It has been said that we do not restrain the permanent heads of Departments at the Treasury and elsewhere from taking part in elections. No, we do not—but they restrain themselves. Who ever heard of Mr. Hamilton, since he has been permanent Secretary of the Treasury, or Sir William Dunbar, since he has been Commissioner of Audit, or Mr. Anderson, or Mr. Arbuthnot, or Mr. Hammond, interfering in political strife or taking part in political meetings? Why not? Because they have chosen their career; and though there is no law applicable to them individually, they know there are Acts of Parliament which clearly declare the principle that men so engaged should avoid the snares of political partizanship. I think I have said enough, after what has been urged to the same effect by others, in deprecating the measure which my hon. Friend has proposed. I am quite satisfied that the picture drawn by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of the Treasury—of the extensive changes which such a measure might bring about in our political system—is not overcharged; and, without the slightest disrespect to the introducers of the measure or to the people of the United States, I think that if there is any one point on which we can draw a conclusion favourable to ourselves and unfavourable to them, it is that here we have striven to limit and reduce the influence of the Executive Government over patronage, and to separate entirely the popular branch of the Legislature from any direct connection with the exercise of patronage; while there we see a system which is the full-blown development of the idea of my hon. Friend, and the working of which no one can contemplate with satisfaction. I concede my full sympathy up to a certain point with those who are contending for the abolition of these restrictions; but the conditions of society and the hard necessities of the State must, I fear, continue to impose limits in the case of individuals upon the enjoyment even of political privileges. The case of these gentlemen is not an isolated one. A similar restriction has been adopted—perhaps with less strong reasons for it—in the case of the police, and I confidently believe that this House will not take the very questionable and dangerous step of passing the measure.

MR. MONK said, in reply, that he had already stated that it had been his intention, when going into Committee on the Bill of last year, to include in the repealing Schedule of that Bill the clauses which it was proposed to repeal by the present Bill; but he was opposed on that occasion both by the Members of the late Government and by his right hon. Friend the First Minister of the Crown. To have done so under those circumstances would probably have insured the rejection of that measure, which happily passed into law. All the arguments which had been used to-day were used last year, and, in fact, they were more applicable to the Bill of last year than to the present, which merely gave the civil servants freedom of action and freedom of speech. The revenue officers asked the House to repeal those obnoxious statutes, not with the desire of canvassing or taking an active part in elections, but because they considered it a grievance that they alone of the civil servants should be placed under exceptional disabilities and restrictions, which might have been necessary 170 years ago, but which he believed to be quite uncalled for at the present day.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE wished to say one word in explanation. He had no communication with the gentlemen to whom he referred; but he wished to know how they could prevent these gentlemen from holding their own opinions. In private they could do more in support of them than they could do by going to the poll and recording their votes. In their present position those persons were more dangerous than they would be if they were in the enjoyment of the privileges proposed to be conferred on them by the Bill.

LIBEL BILL [BILL 17.]—SECOND READING.

(Mr. Baines, Mr. Candlish, Mr. Morley.)

Order for Second Reading, read.

MR. BAINES, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, he had no cause to apprehend that the Motion would lead to a division, for the measure, when under the charge of the present Judge Advocate (Sir Colman O'Loughlen), had been agreed to by the House in the two previous Sessions, after having been carefully considered by a Select Committee comprising many of the most distinguished Members of the House. Its object was to obtain from Parliament a fair and reasonable protection for the public Press in the exercise of one of its most important duties—the publication of reports of the proceedings of public meetings. It was not intended to give the slightest impunity to defamation—in fact, it would give a greater protection against defamation than was afforded by the present law, and a cheaper remedy against defamatory aspersions. The great number of Petitions which had been presented in favour of the Bill showed that the persons connected with the periodical Press felt that they were now exposed to gross injustice. The present Law of Libel was very singular in regard to public meetings, for the individual who uttered a libel at a meeting, knowing that the public were present through the medium of the reporters, was not answerable for what he said; but the unfortunate proprietor of a newspaper—who was utterly incapable of knowing whether what was said was right or wrong, but whose reporter, in the discharge of a duty acknowledged to be most important, gave a report of the proceedings—was made responsible. That was a remnant of the barbarous Law of Libel which so long existed in this country, and which, after several protracted struggles, had in process of time become ameliorated. It was true that publishers were no longer liable to be placed in the pillory, nor exposed to the decision of a Judge unrestrained by the opinion of a jury on the character of the alleged libel, nor were they subjected to the injustice of not being allowed to plead the truth of the statement, and that the publication of it was for the public interest. But they were liable to an action for damages for defamation uttered by a person of whom they might know nothing. It was only recently that the right of newspapers to publish an account of the proceedings in courts of justice had been distinctly acknowledged, and it was not longer ago than four months that the law in regard to reporting the proceedings in Parliament was decided, he hoped finally, by the Court of Queen's Bench. In the case of an action brought by Mr. Rigby Wason against The Times for publishing the report of a debate in the other House of Parliament, founded on a petition containing the severest imputations on the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, the Lord Chief Justice, in his admirable judgment, on the 19th of November, 1868, made use of the following language:—

"It is now well established that faithful and fair reports of the proceedings of courts of justice, though the character of individuals may incidentally suffer, are privileged, and that for the publication of such reports, the publishers are neither criminally nor civilly responsible. The immunity thus afforded in respect of the proceedings of courts of justice, rests upon a two-fold ground. In the English Law of Libel, malice is said to be the gist of an action for defamation. 'The rule,' says Lord Campbell, in the case of Taylor v. Hawkins," "is, that if the occasion be such as repels the presumption of malice the communication is privileged, and the plaintiff must then, if he can, give the evidence of actual malice."

"It is thus," continues Chief Justice Cockburn, "that in the case of reports of proceedings in the courts of justice, though individuals may occasionally suffer from them, yet as they are published without any reference to the individual concerned, but solely to afford information to the public and for the benefit of society, the presumption of malice is rebutted, and such publications are held to be privileged. The other and broader principle on which this exception to the general Law of Libel is founded is that the advantage to the community from publicity being given to the proceedings of courts of justice is so great that the occasional inconvenience to individuals arising from it must yield to the general good."

Referring to the publication of Parliamentary proceedings, the Chief Justice observes—

"It may no doubt be said that while it may be necessary, as a matter of national interest, that the proceedings in Parliament should in general be made public, yet that debates in which the character of individuals is brought into question ought to be suppressed. But to this, in addition to the difficulty in which parties publishing Parliamentary reports would be placed, if this distinction were to be enforced, and every debate had to be critically scanned to see whether it contained defamatory matter, it may be further answered that there is, perhaps, no subject in which the public have a deeper interest than in all that relates to the conduct of the public servants of the State—no subject of Parliamentary discussion which more requires to be made known than an inquiry relating to it."

The House will observe—first, the condition laid down by the Chief Justice for exemption from prosecution—namely, that the publication should be without malice; secondly, the reason for privileging reports of proceedings in courts of justice and Parliament—namely, "the general good;" and, thirdly, his reply to the demand that the reports should be expurgated of all defamatory matter—namely, the difficulty of "critically scanning" the reports for that purpose. As for requiring the exclusion of everything of a defamatory nature from the reports of proceedings of public meetings, such an obligation would necessitate a critical scanning of their contents, which would be absolutely impossible on the part of a newspaper proprietor, who receives reports from various quarters just before his newspaper is about to be printed off in order to be despatched by the railway trains. Having had the honour of being connected with the public Press for many years, he knew that that could not be done; and, therefore, the Bill proposed that no newspaper proprietor should be liable to an action or prosecution for a true and fair report of the proceedings at a public meeting, unless he should refuse to publish a fair reply to the libel complained of. It also provided a statutory sanction for the decision of the Judges that no civil or criminal proceeding should be maintainable for the publication of a fair and true report of a debate in either House of Parliament. It might be said that a slander uttered at a meeting where, perhaps, only 100 persons were present, became known to thousands when published in a newspaper. He admitted that; but considering the advantage which resulted from publicity being given to the proceedings of public meetings in reference to political, municipal, and social questions, to the management of railway and joint-stock companies, to charitable and many other objects, he considered that any inconvenience which might occasionally affect individuals should be deemed as outweighed by the benefit received by the public. It must be borne in mind that to public meetings the country was greatly indebted for the extension of its liberties and for the promotion of beneficial objects of all kinds. If anything should be done unwittingly by a newspaper to damage an individual, the Bill gave him greater facilities than the existing law for obtaining immediate reparation. At present, if a person was defamed by a newspaper report, he brought an action against the newspaper proprietor at an expense to both parties perhaps of hundreds of pounds, and after the lapse of some months, during which his character remained under the imputation of which he complained, he might or might not get a verdict in his favour. The Bill proposed that the newspaper proprietor should be liable to be called on to insert without charge an explanation furnished by the person injured, and in as conspicuous a portion of the newspaper as the original defamatory matter. That was one way in which the party aggrieved might obtain a remedy. There was another mode in which he might obtain redress. He proposed that the author of any defamatory matter spoken at a public meeting at which, to his knowledge, the reporter of any newspaper was present, which newspaper might thereon publish a fair and true report of the proceedings of that meeting, might be called upon by the person defamed to publish in that newspaper, or in some other public journal, a suitable apology; and on his refusal might be proceeded against by action for libel. By that provision the author, and not the mere publisher, would be punished for his abuse. That was a common-sense way of doing justice to the party aggrieved. It was intended to exonerate the publisher on condition that he published a fair and faithful report without malice, and was ready to publish a retraction; and the speaker of defamatory matter was to be liable, unless he was willing to make the amende honorable when fairly called on to do so. Not a few newspaper proprietors had been subjected to the payment of £300, £400, and £500 for that of which they were morally as innocent as any Member now hearing him; and he hoped the House would feel it a duty to put an end to that state of the Law of Libel under which such injustice could be inflicted. He hoped there would be no objection to the second reading of the Bill. If objections were entertained to any particular clause, he should be happy to meet them in Committee. He only desired justice to all parties, and injury to none.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Baines.)

Mr. Baines

MR. NEWDEGATE observed that the thin and flagging appearance of the House shewed the strength of the organization by which the Bill was supported. Undoubtedly, as was proved by the Petitions which formerly and in the present Session had been presented, the Bill was supported by a very large number of members of the provincial Press. He thought he could show that this Bill would so extend the privileges of the Press beyond the protection afforded by the present law that it must lead to one of two results, perhaps to both—to a total exemption of newspaper proprietors from legal penalties upon the propagation of any amount of scandal, else, whilst granting what Lord Campbell thought an undue privilege to the Press, it must tend to the limitation of the freedom of speech. The hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) had cited the opinion of the Lord Justice in the case of "Wason v. The Times," yet there was a provision distinctly reserving the privileges of Parliament, in which the Press, after the decision in the case of Mr. Wason, clearly shared; and by a former decision it appeared that the House granted this privilege, that the publication of their reports and their debates came within the privileges of Parliament. He wished hon. Members to dismiss from their minds any impression which might have been caused by the citation of the opinion which had been given on that point, for there was a clause in the Bill distinctly reserving the privileges of Parliament. The present Law of Libel was drawn by Lord Campbell, who, in the commencement of his career, was a reporter in the Gallery of the House of Commons, and was therefore able to form a correct opinion upon the whole subject. That noble Lord swept away many of those means of oppression which existed prior to the passing of his Act; yet he proved that the public should expect every newspaper proprietor to exercise a discretion, not over the notes of the reporters that came in in different hands, and in a hurry, but over the proofs when printed from these notes, which was the only form in which reports were submitted to the editor or sub-editor. Thus all difficulties of reading the reports were removed by the practice of the newspaper offices. The present law proceeded upon the principle that a person who deliberately, and after seeing the proofs of a speech, should circulate libellous matter, ought to be held answerable for the publication of libellous matter he thus issued to the public. He hoped his hon. Friend opposite would think that he had put the point right; because at the present moment words spoken in the heat of debate by persons who, for want of practice, had no command over their expressions, were treated by law far more leniently, as mere scandal, than were words which were deliberately written, printed, corrected, and published. Yet this Bill would abolish this distinction and would subject the mere utterance of hasty words to the penalties of deliberate libel. He put it to the common sense of the House whether it was right to put the two cases upon exactly the same footing, and to award the same punishment? That, however, was not all. The Bill proposed that another principle should be adopted. It sought to enact, that unless a speaker could prove that he did not know that a reporter was present, then he should be liable for what the reporter might attribute to him. He would ask, was it intended that there should be a close and direct relationship between speakers and reporters? Were this to be the case, gentlemen would require to hire reporters whenever they wished to go to a public meeting, for otherwise he could not rebut, by equivalent testimony, the imputation which might be made by some reporter, who was unknown to him, that he had uttered libellous matter. If this were not done the effect of the Bill, if passed, would be, that although the reporter was not an agent of the speaker, and had really no connection with him, yet the latter would be liable for what the former attributed to him. The speaker, in fact, would be liable to be prosecuted for the act of a person who was not his agent, who was not acting on his behalf. Every unguarded speaker, at a public meeting, would, in short, be required to prove a negative. Words, for instance, might be attributed to him in a form and in a connection, in which he had not certainly used them; and he might be held responsible for words the meaning of which had been changed. How was he to prove a negative? Unless he had a reporter by his side who took down all that he said, he would, in fact, have no equivalent evidence to set up against that of the reporter who may have attributed to him certain expressions. The hon. Member for Leeds laid great stress upon the fact that the speaker would have the privilege of writing to a newspaper proprietor and saying—"You have attributed to me a meaning which I did not intend to convey, and made that a libel which was not one when I uttered it." But then it was to be remembered that the very first principle of the Bill exempted a newspaper proprietor from any necessity of exercising discretion with respect to the matter that he might publish. He was to publish the defamatory matter, if he chose to do so, and to be held free from prosecution on the strength of his attributing the libel to another person. This principle, however, was found to be too strong even by the promoters of the Bill. They strove to qualify it by declaring that newspaper proprietors should be obliged to publish apologies and retractations for unjust accusations which they might have inserted by way of report. This was good enough as far as it went, but let the House mark the qualifications which followed the means of escape for the speaker, "unless the explanation or retraction contained libellous matter." If it did, in the opinion of the editor, then he need not publish it. Thus the discretion of the editor was to be invoked at the second stage of the transaction, after the harm had been done, instead of requiring the exercise of the discretion of the editor in the first instance to prevent the publication of the scandal, supposing it to have been uttered in words by the speaker at some public meeting. This proviso, moreover, would be of little avail in protecting speakers from contortions and misrepresentations of their meaning, and the consequence would be that the freedom of public discussion would be very much curtailed and restricted. It should be remembered that the proprietors of newspapers have already a distinct privilege: they can plead that they publish reports of speeches not maliciously, but in the course of their business. The Bill, in fact, proposed to extend the privilege of a small section of the community at the expense of freedom of speech at present enjoyed by the public. The first thing which the Speaker of the House of Commons did upon the assembling of the new Parliament was to crave from the Throne freedom of speech; and, that being so, the House ought very jealously to guard a privilege of such value, and not to impair or renounce it merely for the sake of increasing the privileges of the Press. The conduct of debate, the free expression of opinion in public, was one of the chief means upon which they depended for preserving honesty among all classes of society; and if a blow were aimed at this freedom of speech the public morality would suffer. Public opinion would be to a great extent emasculated. He considered that this Bill was dangerous in its tendencies. They were told that the second reading should be agreed to because it was only sanctioning the principle pro forma, and that there would be plenty of time to discuss the provisions of the measure at a subsequent stage. This was an argument which he hoped would carefully be guarded against, as it was calculated to mislead. According to the practice and constitution of that House it was the custom to decide the principle of every measure upon the second reading: it was very desirable that this practice should be preserved, for there was a feeling growing up among the public that the House was somewhat departing from its old custom in this matter, and that the principle of measures was not sufficiently tested. This point was referred to in a pamphlet which he had recently seen, and which was entitled, The Democracy of Reason, or the Organization of the Press, just published by Simpkin and Marshall. The writer, after touching upon this point, proposed that the Press should be so organized that every subject could be canvassed by a central committee of the Press before being submitted to Parliament, that the whole initiation of legislation should be made over to a central committee of the Press as organized. [A laugh.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh; but let them read the pamphlet. The proposal was not carelessly made, but with an ability which was most striking; and, seeing that there was a feeling displayed among the members of the Press, that great questions were often not sufficiently considered, he asked the House to pause before—as it would by passing this Bill through its second reading—thus carelessly encouraging contemptuous reflections with respect to the capacity of Parliament, as now constituted, to conduct the great business of the nation. Neither the hon. Member for Leeds nor the right hon. Gentleman the Judge Advocate (Sir Colman O’Loghlen) were men of equal authority upon this question of libel as the late Lord Campbell—the author of the legal principle, which by this their Bill they sought to reverse; that principle being, that the responsibility of publishing any libellous report should rest with the person who published it. Upon this point he would quote the opinion of the present Attorney General (Sir Robert Collier), who, in a debate which arose in the autumnal Session, when the Judge Advocate had attempted to slip this Bill through the second reading on the same day that it was delivered to Members, said—

“If the Bill had been confined to the clauses which gave extended liberty to the Press, he should have endeavoured to expedite it. . . . But the Bill appeared to contain other provisions, which he deemed to be in the last degree objectionable. There was the provision tending to restrict freedom of discussion at public meetings. The third clause provided, for the first time, that a man should be liable for what he spoke at public meetings to the same extent as if the words were written. He (Sir Robert Collier) held not only that there was a difference made by the law of this country, but that there was a fundamental distinction between words spoken and words written. Words written were taken by the law to express the deliberate conviction of the writer; words spoken had a different force attributed to them. Allowance was made for expressions used in the heat of debate. Besides, some men had not sufficient command of language to express their opinions with perfect clearness; and it was well known that a constant conflict of testimony was going on as to what words had really been spoken on a particular question. For these, among other reasons, he thought the law had wisely protected the privilege of speech, so far as a man did not impute to his neighbour an indictable offence, or something calculated to be injurious to him or his business. As for speeches calculated to bring men into contempt or ridicule, he had heard such, not only out of the House, but in the House; and a high authority among them had said that invective and sarcasm were the ornaments of debate; yet the object of invective and sarcasm was to hold their adversaries up to ridicule and contempt. Without, however, entering on this matter, he might say that, because an essential part of the Bill tended to curtail the privilege of discussion in a manner injurious to the public interest, he thought it highly desirable that the principle of the Bill should be discussed in that House, and he advised the hon. and learned Baronet (Sir Colman O’Loghlen) to concur in the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire so far as not to press his Motion for the second reading.”—[3 Hansard, exc. 312. 313.]

The Solicitor General, who was present, had, in the following Session, that of 1868, also expressed himself strongly against some of the principles embodied in the Bill. He said it was very desirable that all that was true should be published, but not that which was untrue. They had heard some remarks about fair reports; but what was a fair report? Was it to be conceived that local newspapers could give a full report of every speech made at every meeting which took place? That was out of the question, and yet no report, which was not a full report, could be a fair report. A condensed summarized report was the work of the intellect of the reporter and of the editor, and not the production of the speaker. Isolated passages, when taken without their context, and put together, unless very carefully selected and arranged, might not convey the meaning of the speaker. The proprietors of newspapers were already invested with great privileges, and were possessed of great powers, but he thought it would be dangerous to exempt them from the responsibility to which they were at present liable, and to exempt them at the expense of the public speaker. For these reasons he should move that the Bill be read a second time upon that day six months.

MR. LIDDELL seconded the motion.

MR. T. CHAMBERS said, this was not simply a question of relieving a certain number of persons in the community from a supposed grievance, but one which in many vital points touched first principles in the most important department of constitutional law. It touched principles vital to the liberty of the subject and vital to the administration of the law. It bore, for instance, on the vital question of liberty of speech. That freedom was one of the most important privileges secured to the people by the Constitution of this country—one which lay at the very foundation of all our liberties; and it, therefore, became important to consider whether, if this Bill were passed, that privilege would not be seriously impaired. Under the law as it at present stood a person who spoke under the influence of excitement at a public meeting, and made use of epithets in the heat of the moment which he could not afterwards justify, could not be prosecuted for libel; but if the measure now proposed were agreed to he could be so prosecuted. Moreover, the Bill laid it down that a man could be held guilty and punished for an offence which the Bill itself said he had not committed, while the man who had committed the offence was to be held harmless and allowed to escape. That was a principle which ought not to be sanctioned. It touched too first principles connected with the administration of the law. No question had been discussed more fully than the Law of Libel; on none had the opinions of the judicial tribunals been more frequently delivered; but this Bill would upset them from the foundation. It was said a grievance existed which required such a remedy. But the grievance must be proved; it must be a serious one—one of which there was a loud and universal complaint—not a trifling affair, or one on a mere matter of procedure—before they could be called on to over-ride the principles of the Constitution and the law in order to apply such a remedy as was now proposed. The whole question was a novel one—it was proposed to give not liberty, but license. What was the grievance? The hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) had said that numerous Petitions had been presented in its favour. Well, he (Mr. Chambers) had referred to the Report of the Committee on Public Petitions, and he found twelve Petitions had been presented, with fifteen signatures. He did not call that a large matter or a loudly expressed grievance. It was, on the contrary, a ludicrously small one. The Preamble of this Bill was in these words—"Whereas it is expedient to amend the Law of Libel." But, looking to all that has been said in favour of the Bill, he must say that it was inexpedient so to amend the Law of Libel. He would contrast with this the Preamble of the Act 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96. The title of that Act was—"An Act for the better protection of Private Character, and for more effectually securing the liberty of the Press, and for better preventing abuse in exercising the said liberty, be it enacted," &c. Now, he (Mr. Chambers) would vote for any Bill to which such a Preamble could be honestly prefixed, and he would vote for the Bill of the hon. Member for Leeds if it would accomplish these objects more effectually than Lord Campbell's Act; but it was perfectly obvious that the hon. Member could not put such a Preamble to his Bill. In what position were newspaper proprietors and editors at present? In an action for libel it was competent for the defendant to plead that the libel was inserted in the newspaper without actual malice and without gross negligence. The plaintiff in such action must therefore prove, in order to recover, actual malice or gross negligence. Was not that protection enough, or was the newspaper proprietor to be protected though he might have published libellous matter with actual malice and gross negligence? What was the history of this matter as regarded the publication of newspapers and books? From the reign of Henry VIII. to that of William III. there was a censorship of the Press. William III. very properly removed the censorship; but were no securities provided against an abuse of the liberty of printing? On the contrary, the printer and proprietor of a newspaper had to register their names at Somerset House, and give securities in order to afford facility of redress to parties aggrieved by libellous matter. That was a guarantee to a certain extent that the newspaper would be properly conducted, and it operated as some protection to private persons. The hon. Member talked of the barbarous Law of Libel. He might as well speak of the barbarous Law of Murder. The Law of Libel was not of itself a barbarous law, for to assault a man's character was to do him as much wrong as to attack his person. It was quite true that up to a recent period there was a grievance in regard to the Law of Seditious Libel; but now the jury decided upon the facts, and with very great fairness between the Crown and the party charged. The Act of the 6 & 7 Vict. which put the law upon its present footing, was framed by a man who understood these matters as well as any one. The hon. Member (Mr. Baines) said that the Law of Libel was in a most unsettled and dangerous state, that nothing could be more scandalous, and that it was only three or four months ago that an action was brought against the publisher of a newspaper for publishing a debate in the House of Lords upon an important subject, and that the action failed, being held not maintainable under the circumstances. But did not his hon. Friend see that by citing this case he had cut the very ground from under his feet? It could not be said after that decision that there was any confusion on this point as to the Law of Libel, and the argument founded on this case was now of no force whatever. He thought the House ought long to consider before it passed a measure like the present. On reading the abstract of the 1st clause of this Bill, it must be seen that it would be utterly impossible for the House to pass it, because it enacted that—

"No proprietor of a newspaper shall be liable to an action or prosecution for a faithful report of the proceedings at a public meeting, and proof that it was such shall amount to a defence."

His hon. Friend said that nothing could be so important as the publication of these reports. But nothing could be so easy as to exaggerate their importance. Would the hon. Gentleman say that it was important the public should know how A. and B. abused each other at a meeting of a gas company in a small country town, and that their abuse should be carried into every corner of the country? It was important when a certain class of meetings was held, attended by a certain class of speakers, that the proceedings should be disseminated far and wide; but with regard to the great majority of public meetings such as he had alluded to it was a great waste of ink and paper ever to publish them at all. His hon. Friend by exaggerating the importance of these reports desired to prepare the mind of the House to form an undue estimate of the value of these provincial newspapers. He confessed he could not follow his hon. Friend at all in this matter. The hon. Member stipulated that it should be a full and faithful report; but the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) truly said there never was or could be a full and faithful report. But then his hon. Friend went further, and said with regard to any defamatory matter that all this virulence and abuse was the very part of a speech that ought not to be left out. He said that the public were interested in these investigations, in "sifting," as he called it, a man's character. No doubt, many provincial newspapers circulated a very much larger number of copies than they would otherwise do by inserting the scurrility spoken at public meetings. It made the report more racy and stimulating, especially if you happened to know the person whose character had been "sifted." If the publication of this matter were of so much importance as his hon. Friend alleged, he should go a step further and make the proprietor of the newspaper liable if he left out any of the virulence and abuse. The fact was the newspapers generally did leave it out. He was more familiar with the London than the provincial Press, but of the London Press it might be said they were not interested in the Bill, because they did leave out such matter. What his hon. Friend wished to obtain immunity for publishing was that part of a man's speech which the speaker generally regretted as soon as he had said it. That was the part which was now left out. When the editor came to it he described but did not report it, saying—"Here the speaker attacked So-and-so with much vehemence." All those who listened to the speech knew the speaker and the circumstances, and the slander, as slander, was harmless on that account; but if it went to every corner of the country where people knew neither the people nor the circumstances, the effect would be very different. The grievance lay in this—that a newspaper proprietor said he must get his newspaper out in time to print and circulate it, and that in order to enable him to do so he must do this injustice to the character of individuals. Getting the newspapers out in time was the first thing to be considered; but the publication of a newspaper was a business matter, and it could not be put as if it were the function of the Government or the action of a court of justice, or a debate in the Houses of Parliament. He agreed in the decision in the case of "Wason v. Walter;" but what analogy there was between that case and the cases put by the hon. Gentleman he could not see, because in the case of "Wason v. Walter" it was right that the publication of an important debate should not be suppressed when it turned, not incidentally upon the character of an individual, but when that character formed the whole subject of the debate. For these reasons he must give the Bill his strenuous opposition.

MR. SERJEANT DOWSE said, that when the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. T. Chambers) quoted the Act of Parliament he began to think he had left all his law behind him in Ireland. He discovered, however, that the hon. and learned Gentleman left out the particular passages he ought to have read. He omitted half the plea, leaving out the part of Hamlet altogether. If the arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman were no better than his law, his hon. Friend (Mr. Baines) would have little difficulty in carrying his Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman wished the House to believe that the defence to an action for libel was merely that the defendant had published the libel without malice and without gross negligence. Now, if that were the case, the pleas he would have drawn would nearly always have saved his clients because he could have shown that the subject-matter of the libel was inserted by inadvertence. The hon. and learned Gentleman had, however, left out the material part of the plea. The clause of Lord Campbell's Act said that in an action for libel contained in any public newspaper it should be competent for the defendant to plead "that the libel was inserted in such newspaper or other periodical without malice and without gross negligence, and that before the commencement of the action, or at the earliest opportunity afterwards, he inserted in such newspaper or other periodical selected by the plaintiff a full apology for the said libel;" and that on filing such plea such defendant should be at liberty to pay a sum of money into Court by way of amends. Why did the Common Serjeant of the City of London—who appeared to him to be a very uncommon Serjeant—make such an omission, and give him the trouble of getting up there to explain the matter? He had not the smallest intention of speaking in the debate, but he confessed he could not let such an opportunity slip. To the general principle of the Bill he gave his hearty concurrence. The distinction between libel and slander, which was well known to the law of England, had existed for centuries, but was based on no rational foundation whatever. It was not slander unless you imputed to a man misconduct in his trade or profession, the commission of an indictable offence, or that he was labouring under a contagious disease; but it was a libel to write or print of a man anything which was calculated to excite feelings of hatred, contempt, or ridicule against him. It appeared to him rather absurd that if a man said of another words which did not make him liable to an action for slander, a publisher should be liable to an action for libel for the same words if he put them in a newspaper. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) said there was no such thing as a full and fair report. Well, but if the reports were never full and fair, the newspapers would get no protection whatever, because if it were necessary to prove that the report was full and fair and it was not, the plea was got rid of. It was necessary to fix the responsibility somewhere. He, for one, was as obnoxious as anyone to the charge of speaking hastily at public meetings, and if the effect of this Bill would be to make persons more cautious in what they said against the character of others, it would be a very wise and beneficial measure. In England the law was such that if an action were brought against a man the plaintiff got no costs unless the damages amounted to 40s.; but in Ireland, till lately, if a plaintiff only got one halfpenny damages the defendant had to pay all the costs. He heard of a case in which the jury assessed the damages at a halfpenny, and the defendant taking a penny-piece from his pocket said to the plaintiff, "Give me change out of that—the value of your character." In this case the halfpenny damages carried £450 costs. He should support the second reading of the Bill.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, that the Law of Libel had its origin in a time when the art of printing was in its infancy, and public meetings were very rarely held. He supported the present Bill, not so much in the interests of the Press as that of the public. The Press had in fact become a medium for extending the area of public meetings. The great difficulty in the way of this Bill arose from the peculiar line drawn by our law between written and spoken slander. By the law of Scotland and France this distinction between written and oral slander was not recognized, and the House would do well to put the law of England on the same scientific footing as that of Scotland and France. Several Committees had inquired into the subject, and recommended this change.

Mr. Serjeant Dowse

In 1834 a Committee of that House examined an eminent French jurist, M. Dupin, who forcibly pointed out the absurdity of our distinction between written and spoken slander. In 1843 the House of Lords appointed a Committee, including Lords Campbell, Brougham, and other Law Lords, who recommended this alteration in the law affecting defamation of character. The public demanded early and full reports of the proceedings of all meetings of public interest, and it was impracticable for the Press, under the conditions of newspaper publication, to examine into the truth of the statements made at public meetings before they were published. Under existing circumstances, therefore, justice and convenience alike demanded that honest and correct reports of such proceedings should not subject the publishers to an action for defamation. He supported the second reading of the Bill.

MR. AYRTON said, he was sorry to interpose at this stage of the Bill, but hon. Members would see that it was quite impossible to take the sense of the House upon the Bill as it now stood for their consideration. It was one which involved a principle of very great importance, and he was sorry that the Bill had been brought on before Her Majesty's Government had had an opportunity of introducing a measure which they had in preparation, which would relieve the Press from the restrictions imposed in years gone by, and which were supposed in those times to be necessary. That measure, when it was laid upon the table, would be found to relieve the Press from every fetter, and to enable those who embarked in the publication of newspapers to carry on their occupation with the same freedom as in any other business. At the same time, while they gave the Press the most perfect freedom and permitted every one to establish a newspaper, it was necessary to consider most carefully whether, and in what way, they would alter the laws that now protected the public, so that any abuse which might arise from that perfect freedom might be corrected. It was desirable before the House pronounced an opinion on the present measure that the Government measure to which he had referred should be considered. Journalists had been treated almost from the commencement as if they were criminals, and were compelled to give security for large sums to meet any actions for libel. When the proprietors and conductors of newspapers were relieved from these oppressive conditions of former years, it would be necessary to consider what should be the law for the protection of individuals. The House would not be doing right to express an opinion upon a measure of such gravity and importance in the absence of the Attorney General, who ought to state his views on the subject. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Dowse) said, that under the Bill public meetings would be harmless, because everyone would control himself and would not indulge in so much freedom of speech. It was very easy for the hon. Member who had given such ample proof of his established reputation for eloquence to say that; but, so far as his experience went, the majority of the Members of that House did not possess the power of control which the hon. and learned Gentleman enjoyed, and were not capable of manifesting it as he had done—

And it being now a quarter before six,

RECENT MURDERS IN IRELAND.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, in asking, Whether Her Majesty's Government will communicate to Parliament any reports from constabulary officers, stipendiary magistrates, or other agents concerning the causes of the late murders perpetrated in parts of Ireland within the last twelve months? said, he was mainly induced to put the Question in consequence of an announcement which had been made in "another place," that the Government did not intend to introduce any measure relating to the land question in Ireland this Session. But he thought the social condition of Ireland at the present time was such that it ought not to be left unnoticed by the Executive or by Parliament. He would not detail the catalogue of crimes which had of late been committed in that country, for these were sufficiently notorious, and it was equally notorious that the perpetrators of them had not been brought to justice. Notwithstanding the improvement that had occurred in most parts of Ireland, this serious state of things existed in certain localities, and though he felt it presumptuous for a private Member of either House of Parliament to offer suggestions as to how the matter should be dealt with, he would venture to offer one which he believed to be worthy of consideration. He did not want any coercive legislation, nor did he desire a series of executions—for he should be content to “let bygones be bygones,” if security for life and property could be effected for the future; but he thought inquiries similar to those lately made at Sheffield might throw light on the causes of these crimes, so as to assist the Government and Parliament in taking action on the subject. In certain parts of the country the people were setting the law at defiance, and practically exercising rule by what they would, perhaps, call “Vigilance Committees,” the police being perfectly powerless. He should be among the last to apologize in any way for assassins, but, considering the limited extent of country in which this state of things prevailed, it was impossible not to feel that the condition of society and the customs and usages of all classes must be different in certain districts from those which obtained in the rest of the country. He thought, therefore, that the Lord Lieutenant should be empowered to issue a Commission of Inquiry whenever one of these outrages had been committed, in order to ascertain its cause and origin, and to bring the whole facts before the public. It had often, he was aware, been said that in Ireland there was no public opinion; the difference of feeling between classes and creeds being so great that, when a wrong was committed, the first inquiry of a person told of it would probably be whether the victim was a Roman Catholic or a Protestant, and his feeling would be more or less influenced by the answer to that question. It was obviously of the greatest importance to create a sound public opinion, which would be called into action on the conduct of individuals in cases where that conduct could not be restrained by law. Property, as was often said, had its duties as well as its rights; but the question was how those duties could be enforced; and that they had been neglected in certain parts and by certain persons was no reason for making laws which would affect the rights by which alone property in civilized communities could be held with security. With regard to Tipperary, which was the chief, though not the only, district that had lately been disgraced by these crimes, the late Mr. John Wilson Croker, as long ago as 1806 or 1807, published a remarkable and well-known pamphlet, in which he remarked on the absence of that healthy public opinion which prevailed in England, and he re-published it in 1822, during Lord Wellesley’s administration. He (the Marquess of Clanricarde) could mention particular families in which there had been assassinations in successive generations; and the fact that these outrages were mostly confined to certain localities was a proof that the social and proprietary condition of those localities was unsatisfactory. The Government should therefore institute inquiries in those districts; for though these crimes cast a stigma on the whole country and on the Government, it would be a mistake to suppose that good relations did not subsist between landlords and tenants in Ireland generally. In many cases there had indisputably been oppression and injustice, and indeed this had been more than once animadverted upon from the judicial bench, but these were no excuse for assassination. As to legislation, were the rights of property to be interfered with because there were persons who abused those rights? All over the world from the earliest times rich men had had the power to oppress poor men, and had been bad enough to exercise it; but this was no reason for taking away rights upon which prosperity, and even civilization must depend. The Government ought to show a determination to uphold the law, while ready to amend it in every reasonable way. He was sorry,

however, to say that language had of late been used respecting the land, not only in the "heedless rhetoric" of election speeches, but in pamphlets seriously and deliberately written, and which smelt a good deal of the midnight oil, which language had tended to give the Irish peasantry a notion that the land was to be divided among them. This absurd notion was seriously entertained, and transactions had actually been entered into upon it as the credible intention of Parliament. At the time of the Fenian disturbance it was well known that people in America were actually advancing money on estates in Ireland, which were to be divided if the Fenians succeeded, and were likely to be confiscated by Parliament, even if the Fenians did not succeed. A degree of ferment had been excited which was dangerous to the Empire, and the subject ought not to be allowed to rest without a declaration on the part of the Government that there should be no legislation except upon sound principles. Opinions had been expressed by persons in Office, and by influential men not in Office, that the property of non-resident or Protestant landlords might be arbitrarily dealt with by Parliament, and these opinions had been broached by people who professed the principles of Free Trade. Now was it likely that capitalists would purchase or advance money upon land in Ireland when such doctrines were put forth? It might, indeed, be said that the English people had too much good sense to pay any attention to such notions; but they produced a great effect on the minds of the Irish peasantry. The Government had introduced a measure respecting the Church which they justly believed would be very popular in Ireland—but what effect had this policy had upon agrarian outrages? Why, notwithstanding the large majority in the House of Commons last March in favour of disestablishment, and notwithstanding the visit of the Prince of Wales in the following month, which gave great joy to the whole country, in that very month a series of outrages was commenced by the murder of Mr. Fetherstonhaugh in Westmeath. Another soon followed, and there had since been three in Tipperary—making five murders or attempts to murder. It was clear, then, that the peasantry paid no attention to the great measure which was now in hand, but that, having heard there was to be a division of the land, they were making themselves rulers of the land in those localities where discontent existed. There could be no palliation for murder; but the cases in which tyranny and oppression had been exercised should be brought to light, in order that the public might know that they were isolated cases, and that the relations of landlord and tenant were not unsatisfactory throughout the island, although the statute law required amendment. He hoped the Government—although they might not now be able to give any positive assurance or make any explicit statement—would be able soon after Easter, whether they brought in a Bill this Session or not, to state their views as to the principles on which legislation should be based, and that they would also be able to give some information to the House as to the cause of these melancholy events. He would now put the Question of which he had given notice.

LORD DUFFERIN: Considering the numerous agrarian murders and other outrages of that description which have lately occurred in Ireland, I am not surprised that my noble Friend (the Marquess of Clanricarde) should have thought it his duty to draw your Lordships' attention to the topics which formed the substance of his speech. As I had occasion to remark in this House only a week or so since, everybody connected with Ireland must feel deeply humiliated by the accounts of transactions of this description which have come before the public, and I can well understand that they have engaged the anxious attention of my noble Friend. With regard to the information for which he has asked, it would be extremely inconvenient to supply it, and for this simple reason—that those Papers and Reports contain allusions to persons who are suspected, indeed, of being implicated in those crimes, but against whom no sufficient evidence has at present been adduced. The publication of their names would, therefore, be very undesirable. My noble Friend has displayed an anxiety—I must say a very natural anxiety—and one, no doubt, which is shared in by your Lordships—to know what measures are in contemplation by the Executive in Ireland for putting an end to these outrages and murders, and for vindicating the majesty of the law. On that head I trust I shall be able to make a most reassuring announcement. Her Majesty's Government—as well in this country as in Ireland—are deeply sensible that they are bound by every consideration to do all that in them lies to bring these offenders to justice, and to make everybody understand who is in any way engaged in conspiracies of this description, whether as principals or as associates, whether by abetting or concealing the delinquents, that no pains or expense will be spared in bringing to justice the wretched and cowardly ruffians who are the authors of these atrocities. With that view the Lord Lieutenant has made an arrangement that whenever any outrage of this kind is reported—whether it be a murder or an attempt to murder, whether an ordinary agrarian outrage, or whether the lives of peaceable citizens are threatened by letters or in any other way—a considerable police force shall immediately be sent down to the district to be quartered upon the locality and to be supported out of the rates contributed by the inhabitants under the Peace Preservation Act of Ireland. Experience has proved that this is a very effective remedy for the prevention and discouragement of such offences, and I can assure your Lordships that Her Majesty's Government in Ireland will not hesitate to put it in force whenever the circumstances seem to justify the application of so severe a remedy. As, however, I remarked on a former occasion, and as has been fully acknowledged by the noble Marquess, it must always be remembered that these horrible crimes have been almost entirely confined to particular counties. They have been localized there; and the county where the greater number of them have occurred has been long known as the very centre and hotbed of Ribbandism, having for years past been noted for offences of this description, while in the rest of Ireland crimes of such a nature are almost as unknown as in any part of England. I have further to state—and I must say it is with very great pain and regret I state it, but it is my duty to do so—that it is the opinion of Her Majesty's Irish Government that this sudden development of crime in that particular county is in a great measure, if not entirely, to be attributed to the

lax manner in which the law was applied to the punishment of an individual who placed himself within its clutches in that particular district. It is to that circumstance, as much as to any other that these crimes have been perpetrated in so fearless a manner. Be that, however, as it may I am happy to be able to assure your Lordships—if, indeed, any such assurance is necessary—that the Lord Lieutenant is fully sensible of the responsibility imposed upon him, and is perfectly determined to do everything in his power to bring these offenders to justice, and to make everybody understand that, however anxious the Government may be to inaugurate a policy of justice and conciliation towards Ireland—however anxious they may be to redress grievances, and, as far as circumstances may admit, to improve the laws which regulate the relation between landlord and tenant, they are, nevertheless, firmly determined to punish crime, to protect life and to make the legitimate rights of property respected. The most admirable administration of justice and the greatest energy on the part of the Executive must, however, prove ineffectual, unless a healthy public opinion seconds their endeavours. When we find that in the popular sentiment murderers are elevated into political martyrs, and that the butchery of a landlord, under the most atrocious and cowardly circumstances, is very often referred to by the Press in terms little short of complacent palliation; when the conscience of an uninstructed populace is blunted and their moral sense depraved, as is too often the case in Ireland by those to whom they look for guidance—that respect for human life which is the very foundation of human society becomes enfeebled, and the expedient of murder and assassination, which has been resorted to under the plea of patriotism or in the supposed defence of a tenant's natural rights, quickly becomes adopted, as seems to have been the case with respect to the unfortunate Mr. Anketell, whenever any vindictive spirit may fancy he has a grudge against a fellow-creature. It is not only to the Executive but to public opinion in Ireland that we must appeal; and I must say, as an Irishman, that if the educated classes of every party and of every religion, considering that the interests of all are engaged in producing such a result, will follow the admirable example set by his Eminence Cardinal Cullen, and the wise and patriotic counsels which he has lately promulgated, then, indeed, there will be a prospect of Ireland being at last free from that particular description of crime for which I am sorry to say she is the only country noted in Europe.

EARL GREY: The House is deeply indebted to my noble Friend (the Marquess of Clanricarde) for having brought under our consideration a subject than which there is none more deserving of serious attention. The increase of crime in Ireland is indeed most alarming. The want of security for life and property seems to be extending, and it is fatal to all hopes of improvement in that country. How can we expect a system of agriculture which is confessedly very backward to give place to a better, when neither tenants nor landlords are free to improve their property as it requires without bringing upon themselves a fearful death? How can we expect to find any enterprizes or manufactures to take root in a country—which, after all, has great natural advantages for such undertakings—when we find a great railway company, because it dismisses a servant for misconduct, liable to have one of its trusty and faithful servants barbarously murdered; and when, as I am told, that company had much difficulty in replacing some of those who have given up their situations in consequence of the alarm? How is it possible under such circumstances that improvements can be carried on? I heard with great satisfaction from my noble Friend (Lord Dufferin) that it is the determination of the Government, by a firm and vigorous administration of the law, to endeavour to check these offences and to grapple with that spirit of lawlessness which seems to prevail. I feel it my duty, however, to observe that I cannot but think it difficult to avoid connecting the present increase of crime in Ireland with imprudence both in language and in conduct on the part of Her Majesty's Government. We all know that persons holding very high situations have used strong language with reference to the oppression endured by the tenants in Ireland. They have declared the wrongs of the tenants to be so great as to require immediate and complete redress, and have encouraged the expectation that some great change in the law for their advantage would be proposed. I believe the Attorney General for Ireland went so far as to assure his constituents that this subject would be immediately and satisfactorily dealt with. And, unfortunately, the language that has been used has not only been very strong, but very vague. In all that has been said as to the oppression suffered by the tenants, very little reference, as far as I know, has been made to the great practical difficulties of this question—to the danger of rash and unwise legislation upon it—to the probability that by adopting some of the measures which have been recommended you would do infinitely more harm than good even to that class which desires such changes. I observe no reference to these things; but what I find is, that while, in vague and indefinite language, wrongs are dwelt upon and the redress of those wrongs promised, both the nature of that redress and the time at which it is to be expected have been left altogether in obscurity. All we know is that the land laws of Ireland are not to be dealt with in the present Session. Now, what was likely to be the consequence of such a mode of dealing with an excitable people such as the Irish, and in a very excited state of mind on this subject. We know for how many years disputes with regard to the land have prevailed in Ireland, what fierce passions have been aroused, and what deplorable results have followed. In this state of things what could be expected from the holding of such language by men whom they naturally respect and look up to? What could be the effect on the minds of the Irish peasantry when that language was coupled with the absence of any attempt whatever for the present to grapple with the question? Surely just what has happened—that the Irish people would be thrown back on their old plan of taking the matter into their own hands and enforcing their own code on landlords by the barbarous means they had formerly employed. These agrarian outrages, which we fondly hoped, a year or two ago, were gradually dying out and would soon cease, have, as is admitted, within a very short time become much more common. It appears to me that this is the natural consequence which might have been expected to follow from the conduct of the Government in at once stimulating by their language the eager desire of the Irish peasantry for some change in the law relating to the occupation of land, and refusing to explain what changes they contemplated. In my opinion this question of the tenure of land is of such pressing and urgent importance that it was the duty of the Government on acceding to Office to take the very earliest steps they could to endeavour to effect some settlement of the question. And they had every facility for doing so. This subject has been repeatedly discussed of late years. Bill after Bill has been brought before Parliament, there have been Committees of Inquiry in both Houses, and every information that can be wanted on the subject was in the possession of the Government. Why, then, did they not introduce a Bill at the commencement of the Session? If it be said that the attention of the other House was fully occupied, it might have been introduced in this House. What was absolutely necessary for the peace of Ireland was, that, without a moment's unnecessary delay, the people of Ireland should be made clearly to understand the views of the Government on the question, the nature of the redress they were to expect, and how soon they might hope to obtain it. If the Government had determined that a Bill upon the principle of what was called compulsory compensation to tenants should be introduced, they might have brought it in. I believe it to be impossible to pass such a Bill without creating more injustice than we can redress; but, at all events, let us know the extent of it, for at this moment the wildest notions are entertained on the subject. People talk of fixity of tenure and compulsory compensation for improvements. Now, fixity of tenure is only another name for confiscation; and I do not think there are many persons either in or out of this House, who believe that a system of confiscation would be for the ultimate benefit of any class in Ireland. With regard to compensation for improvements, we are inclined at first sight to admit the justice of compensating the tenant for improvements he has effected; but when we come to look into the question we see that very great difficulties have to be encountered. The problem may, indeed, be solved, but I venture to say that hitherto no changes in the law have been suggested which would not aggravate rather than diminish the evil. The advocates of tenant-right have been heard by Select Committees, and some of them have enunciated views so wild that few would support them; while even those who have been the most moderate in the changes they recommended have, hitherto at least, been unable to point out a practical mode of getting rid of the objections to which those changes are open. There are, I know, many persons who still believe the principle to be a sound one. For myself, I can only say I should be glad to see it worked out; but hitherto no practical means of doing it have been discovered. Now, with the expectations of the people so vague and undefined, while they are looking for so much more than can possibly be granted, is it wise to excite them by denunciations of the wrongs they suffer, and at the same time to abstain from tranquillizing their minds by pointing out the nature of the redress they are to obtain? Every year a settlement is delayed the more difficult that settlement will become, for the population will become more and more wedded to the extreme notions which many of them have adopted. I deeply regret, therefore, that the Government have not endeavoured to grapple with the subject. After the long consideration it has undergone, and all the materials being before them, it would not have required a great deal of time to determine whether or not they could adopt this principle of compulsory compensation. If they could not—if they had been inclined to proceed on the simple principle of correcting the faults of the existing law, and—while introducing no new principles of legislation, to remove the obstacles which now stand in the way of voluntary agreements between landlords and tenants—to provide means by which those agreements could be cheaply made and their performance promptly and cheaply enforced—if this principle had been adopted, the work was almost done to their hands; because during the last two Sessions, a Select Committee of this House devoted very great labour, patience, and assiduity to the consideration of a Bill that was introduced by my noble Friend the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde). That Bill was drawn with great ability by Mr.

Tighe Hamilton; it was most carefully considered by the Committee, with Mr. Hamilton's assistance; many Amendments were made in its provisions, and though in some points of detail I did not concur with the majority of the Committee, I heartily agreed in what I believe was the opinion of every Member of it—that the Bill as amended would have effected a great improvement in the existing law of landlord and tenant in Ireland. On this ground it was unanimously recommended by the Committee, of which three persons now holding seats in the Cabinet were members, as a measure which was fit to pass; and while we differed upon various matters, there were two points on which the Committee, as also the witnesses we examined, were unanimous. The first was, that the present law is calculated to produce misunderstandings between landlords and tenants, and to discourage the granting of leases, and is altogether nearly as bad as possible. We have heard it said, indeed, that the law of landlord and tenant is the same in Ireland as in England, and it is asked, "Why should it not work well in Ireland?" Now, there can be no greater mistake. The law in Ireland is practically not the same as in England, nor anything like it. By decisions of courts of law, and by various changes which have been made from time to time, the law, as regards small tenements in Ireland, has become so confused and so difficult to enforce that it is a disgrace to a civilized nation. As long ago as the time of Lord Devon's Commission, Mr. O'Connell—no mean authority upon the subject—condemned almost as strongly as I have now done the state of the law, and it has since undergone no material improvement. The other point on which the Committee and the witnesses agreed was that, even though it might be expedient hereafter to go further, the Bill, as amended by us, would effect an enormous improvement in the existing law—would do much to correct the evils now most complained of—would encourage the granting of leases, and would take away the most fruitful source of those misunderstandings which are the great cause of outrage and murder in Ireland. This was the opinion of every person whose opinion was given; and one gentleman, I remember, whom we examined, as one of the ablest ex-ponents of the doctrine of tenant-right—while he would not admit that the Bill went far enough—stated distinctly that it was a step in the right direction. I wish Her Majesty's Government had decided to bring this Bill before the House; but, as they have not done so, I still hope the noble Marquess will again submit it to your Lordships, and will throw the responsibility of rejecting it, if it is to be rejected, on Her Majesty's Government. But my Lords, I have already observed it is not merely the increase of agrarian outrages which causes anxiety as to the present state of Ireland. It was not an agrarian outrage we have been startled with at Mullingar; it was a crime of a new and more formidable character—not altogether new, perhaps, but I do not remember an instance of so great a crime having been perpetrated with a view of coercing a great company such as a railway company. Now with reference to that outrage, let me call your attention to a Return which has lately been laid upon the table of the other House of Parliament. It gives the names of forty-nine Fenian convicts, who had been sentenced to penal servitude—thirty-four of whom are in Australia, and the remainder were in convict prisons at home—whom Her Majesty's Government have determined to release from custody. It also states the sentences passed upon them, and what portion of those sentences remain unexpired. If you examine this Return, you will find the earliest of the sentences was passed in December, 1865, the latest in October, 1867, and the majority in the latter year. You perceive, therefore that those prisoners who were first sentenced have served less than three years and a half; the majority have served only about half that time, perhaps little more than a year-and-a-half. And what were the sentences? Three of the men were sentenced to death, but their capital punishment was afterwards commuted to penal servitude for life. Now, we are all aware that a sentence of death commuted to penal servitude for life implies guilt of the most aggravated kind. The other convicts were sentenced to various terms ranging from five to fifteen years. Now, my Lords, it is only five years ago that the Commissioners of Penal Servitude called the attention of the Government and of Parliament to the injurious effects which arise from the arbitrary exercise of the prerogative of pardon. They pointed out that uncertainty as to whether a sentence passed by a criminal court would be fully carried out had the effect of diminishing the efficiency of our penal system and impairing the power of the criminal law in maintaining the peace of society. They therefore recommended that while according to certain fixed rules, criminals should continue to have the power of earning the remission of a comparatively small portion of the sentences passed upon them, the remainder should be uniformly and inexorably carried into effect unless where special circumstances called for mercy. That was the substance of the rule laid down by the Commissioners, and, if I am not greatly mistaken, it met with the full approval of both Her Majesty's Government and of Parliament, for legislation has been founded upon the impression that that was to be the rule for the future. But, my Lords, if that rule was adopted in this manner, with the implied sanction of Parliament, I want to know why it has been set aside in this case? Or, if it has not been set aside, what are the special or exceptional circumstances which justify this indiscriminate exercise of the prerogative of pardon with respect to the Fenian convicts? Are these exceptional circumstances to be found in the character of the crimes committed? Do you remember what the Fenian conspiracy was, the alarm it created, the mischief it did? Do you remember that it was a deliberate plot to overturn the Government of the Queen in Ireland, and to establish an Irish Republic, and to shrink from the adoption of no means, however atrocious, for the purpose of accomplishing that end? Midnight assassination, to burn or blow up or otherwise procure the death of Her Majesty's faithful troops were the means contemplated for this purpose; and though such wholesale slaughter was not accomplished, it was not the will but the power of the conspirators which failed. Still several murders were committed, several persons were killed in the execution of their duty, or afterwards shot in revenge for having exerted themselves in maintaining the authority of the law; and the criminality of the conspirators culminated in that frightful and unexampled outrage committed at Clerkenwell. My Lords, can the crime of taking an active part in such a conspiracy as this be viewed with special indulgence? Was this a case in which you should deliberately set aside the rules laid down with the approval of Parliament for the administration of penal justice? I say, exactly the reverse. Clemency had already been carried as far as it could be, with due regard to the peace and safety of Her Majesty's subjects, when the Government—very properly dealing leniently with the conspirators—prosecuted but a few of them on capital charges, and inflicted capital punishment on none but those whose hands were actually imbrued with blood. I am told that political offences ought to be viewed with indulgence—that they do not imply moral guilt, and that they may, therefore, be safely treated with more indulgence than you would show to ordinary criminals. I utterly deny the truth of that principle. I admit that persons have sacrificed their lives on the scaffold in fruitless attempts to upset some extremely cruel and oppressive Government, who are generally and justly regarded as martyrs rather than as criminals; but, even with regard to bad Governments, it has been held by very high authority to be criminal to use violence in opposing them, unless there has been, not only extreme oppression, but unless there is also a reasonable prospect of success. The evils of civil war are so great and certain that it has been argued—and as I think rightly—that even against the worst Government no man is morally justified in using force except with a fair prospect of success. Be that as it may, I believe no man of ordinary sense denies it to be true that nothing but the extreme case of a most cruel and oppressive Government justifies an appeal to force. When you look at the misery which civil war entails, to resort to it, without extreme provocation, is in the highest degree blameable. When that dire extremity is resorted to merely to gratify men's excited passions, or to forward their own selfish objects, no guilt can be greater. Surely, then, on every point of view that Fenian conspiracy was totally without justification. It had not the remotest chance of success; and I am certain there is no one who could for a moment say the Government of this country in Ireland was one of those cruel and oppressive Governments which justified an attempt to overturn it by force. For the last half century at least there has been nothing cruel in the Imperial Government of Ireland. If bad laws still remain there, constitutional means are at the command of the people to procure redress. I say, therefore, that in every point of view this Fenian rebellion was one of the most wanton and most wicked that could possibly be conceived, and that those who took part in it are more morally guilty, as they are certainly more dangerous to society, than the thief or the burglar. If there was, as I think, nothing in the offence to justify the exceptional exercise of the power of pardon on the part of the Crown, it appears to me there was everything in the state of Ireland to determine the Government against it. Disregard of law is the great curse of that country; to establish the authority of the law and to show the peaceful subjects of the Queen that they have nothing to fear ought to be the paramount object of every man who aspires to the name of a Statesman. But, observe, this offence of Fenianism is closely allied to that other offence I have just described, and the Fenian brotherhood is first cousin to the Ribband brotherhood. Ribbandism and Fenianism are the same in principle; they are secret societies in opposition to the laws and the constituted authorities. I ask you, at a time when Ribbandism is rife, is it wise, is it prudent, to show lenity towards a still more wicked secret society? More than this, the spirit of Fenianism is not extinct in Ireland. You know that by the manner in which the discharged convicts have just been received; you know it by the speeches and declarations made in public by the chief officers of two of the largest and most wealthy cities in Ireland. Why those speeches were not made grounds of criminal indictment—why the speakers were not called upon to answer for their seditious language—I am totally at a loss to comprehend. And when this impunity given to those who had used such language was followed by the release of the Fenian convicts, what other interpretation could be put by the people of Ireland on the conduct of Her Majesty's Government except that it must have been caused by fear, and that Her Majesty's Government consider engaging in conspiracies of this sort a venial offence? This ill-judged clemency seems to me to be very dangerous, because it leads people to suppose that resort to violence is the best mode of obtaining changes of the law. Already a good deal of effect of this kind has been produced. I have heard it said, on good authority, that a belief is generally held that it is owing to Fenianism that the question of the Irish Church has been brought forward by those who, as members of a former Government, only two years before opposed the making of even a small change, as calculated to inflame existing differences in Ireland. I cannot be surprised that such should be the impression produced by the mode of dealing with the Church question; and I think it is very dangerous in the present state of the land question to encourage a similar belief with regard to that. It is equally dangerous to lead men to suppose that engaging in conspiracies against the Government is a venial offence. I say that nothing is more calculated to sap the foundations of government. My noble Friend who addressed the House immediately before me, in his reply to the noble Marquess, said he attributed a great part of the increased crime in the South of Ireland to the injudicious lenity which had been shown by those who had been entrusted with the administration of the law. In that I agree with my noble Friend. I say in that sentence he has pronounced the severest condemnation upon the release of these Fenian prisoners which it was possible to utter.

LORD DUFFERIN: I beg to explain. I did not use the word "lenity" as applied to a criminal, but spoke of "laxity" in the prosecution of an offence.

EARL GREY: I thank my noble Friend for the correction. "Laxity" describes the conduct of the Government much better than "lenity," so I will call it laxity; but I think the laxity condemned in the South of Ireland was more strongly displayed by the release of these Fenian prisoners. I have thought it right to express my opinion upon these points, because the policy of the Government in the administration of Ireland seems to me to be gradually drifting more and more in a direction which is fatal to all just authority and good government. It is not without great reluctance I have expressed opinions so unfavourable to the course taken by Her Majesty's Government; but I should have been ashamed of myself if I had allowed any personal feeling to interfere with me in performing what I believed to be my duty when I perceived a policy was being pursued which was calculated to endanger the safety of this great Empire.

EARL GRANVILLE: I have to ask your Lordships' permission to be somewhat irregular in continuing a debate when there is absolutely no question before the House. I have no personal complaint to make of my noble Friend (Earl Grey), because three days ago he told me that this evening he should speak on the subject of the release of the Fenians, and yesterday afternoon I got an additional message from him stating that he should allude to the speeches of Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Bright, and the Attorney General. That was rather a vague notice, because the noble Earl did not couple it with the slightest indication of what speeches or passages he meant to allude to; and, considering the part the noble Earl has taken in recommending that public notice should be given of all matters to be brought before your Lordships' House, if he intended to make a speech on the two subjects he has discussed, it would have been more fair to independent Peers if he had put a definite Notice on the Paper, instead of basing his speech on the Question put by the noble Marquess. I concur with every word that fell from the noble Earl respecting the late outrages in Ireland, and more especially with what he said on the very bad feature, that whereas they have hitherto been confined to landlords, in a recent instance an outrage has been committed against a person belonging to a different class and interest. I ventured to say the other day that Her Majesty's Government, notwithstanding their wish to behave with the utmost conciliation towards the people of Ireland, are equally determined to show firmness in dealing with these outrages; and so impressed was the Lord Lieutenant with the soundness of the policy of the Government in that respect, and with the necessity of acting promptly in the matter, that, to my very great satisfaction, without even communicating with the Home Government, he took upon himself to adopt those measures which the noble Lord by my side (Lord Dufferin) has described, and which received the praise of the noble Earl. Going into some detail with regard to the tenure of land, the noble Earl complains that the Government have abstained from bringing in a measure on that subject, and he coupled the complaint with a remark which was rather singular; for, speaking of the difficulties of the question, he said nothing had ever yet been proposed, or could be proposed, which would not aggravate instead of diminishing them. I believe, however, that the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns), when, on the first day of the Session he reviewed the measures recommended to the Legislature by the Government, did not complain that a Land Tenure Bill was not among them, but only reproached us with not dealing with the important question of education in that country. Perhaps the noble and learned Lord abstained from referring to the matter from the recollection that last year the Government to which he belonged announced that they had a measure ready, and even named an early day on which they would introduce it; but whether it arose from the fact that they had another great measure on the stocks or not I do not know, but certainly nothing was done. I think it is perfectly obvious—indeed it is an historical fact that whether rightly or wrongly, by the force of circumstances, or in consequence of anything left undone by Her Majesty's late Government I do not pretend to decide, the one great question submitted to all the constituencies throughout Ireland, as well as throughout Scotland and England, was the question of the Irish Church, and any one with the legislative and Parliamentary experience of the noble Earl must surely feel that, with a question of so much importance awaiting decision, it would be unfair to encumber it with a great number of other questions—questions, too, of a nature certain to excite considerable conflict of opinion, not only in the House of Commons, but throughout the country. I do not think that I need say any more to defend ourselves against that charge. My noble Friend, in the course of his speech, professed to quote certain words from a speech of the Attorney General for Ireland; but, unless the noble Earl possesses some special information on the subject, I should very much doubt whether the Attorney General ever promised that Mr. Gladstone would immediately introduce a measure which should give satisfaction to Ireland. I have also very carefully attended to the statements of my Colleagues with regard to the land question. One of my Colleagues, it is true, has propounded a voluntary plan on this subject; but both he and Mr. Gladstone have carefully guarded themselves against any proposal which is inconsistent with the sanctity of property and the principles by which its possession is protected. But my noble Friend (Earl Grey) has gone much further. He has attributed those outrages to the leniency lately shown by the Government with regard to the Fenians. Now, the information I have received goes to show that hitherto no connection has been traced between Ribbandism and Fenianism. No trace of it has been found in the numerous threatening letters forwarded for information to the Castle, not one of which has contained the slightest allusion to Fenianism. But my noble Friend objects to the release of certain prisoners connected with the Fenian conspiracy. My noble Friend stated very particularly that so far from there being no difference between the ordinary criminal offences and political offences, the latter offences were the more dangerous, and ought, therefore, to be attended with severer punishment. On that point, I am not prepared to say that he is not perfectly right. But, I believe that Her Majesty's Government must deal with these matters not purely in accordance with abstract principles, but that they must pay some consideration to the usages and preconceived opinions and feelings of the whole of the community. I will not refer to the opinions held in foreign countries; but what have been the opinions expressed by Statesmen in this country, during the last fifty years, with regard to transactions which have occurred in Rome, Naples, Poland, and formerly in Austria? The opinion is one that has been shared in by the whole community of this country. And what has been the legislative action in this matter? With regard to our extradition treaties it has always been the complaint made by Foreign Governments that the worst murderer, or the assassin of the deepest dye, could always remain in this country without danger if he could, by any means, show a connection between his crime and political feeling. And what has been done in this country? The liberation of convicted Chartists was the graceful accompaniment of a Royal marriage, and in 1848, Mr. Smith O'Brien and his confederates were all released before the expiration of their sentences. I was surprised to hear the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns) loudly cheer the statement of the noble Earl that Her Majesty's Government had released one who had been sentenced to death, but whose sentence had been commuted to penal servitude for life; for I find among those released by the late Government the name of Michael Hanley, sentenced to penal servitude for life; and, among others also released occurs the name of Patrick Doran, convicted of high treason, sentenced to death, but whose sentence was commuted to penal servitude for life, and who, I presume, was not released without previous consultation on the subject with the noble and learned Lord himself. Now, I will not challenge my noble Friend on the cross-Benches (Earl Grey) to contradict me, because I know no limit to his powers in that respect, but I would ask if it is possible to take a rebellion on a larger scale, more fatal to life, and more destructive to property, creating a more enormous amount of misery, than the great rebellion in the United States, which only closed the other day? And yet does anyone think that it is unprincipled, inexpedient, or unwise that the person who was principally responsible for that rebellion, Mr. Jefferson Davis, should be permitted to reside at London or Paris? I believe Shakespeare understood the feeling of the people of this country better than the noble Earl does, when he wrote—

“And earthly power doth then show likest God's

When mercy seasons justice.”

The late Government refused even to receive addresses on the subject. But Her Majesty's present Government thought that it would be better to act upon a principle which I trust they may be able to carry out—to unite conciliation with real firmness. The Irish Government made repeated scrutinies into every single case, and there were three classes of offenders whom from the first they determined not to release—the criminal, if I may so distinguish them, as against the purely political offenders—the class which comprised those who were known to be habitual conspirators, and those who, from their energy or talents as soldiers or men of letters might, if released, prove a source of danger in the present dormant state of Fenianism. Those who have been released are chiefly those whose health has suffered from confinement and bodily weakness—young men who may be characterized as enthusiasts and dupes—men with no moral or intellectual power, and whose release will not only be attended with perfect safety, but, so far from affording encouragement to Fenianism, will tend to prevent that growing sympathy for captives immured in this manner, the existence of which in Ireland cannot be a matter of doubt. I believe that the course we have adopted is one combining security and mercy; and I believe, moreover, that the results even at present have not been unsatisfactory. It is quite true that it may have given rise to some foolish speeches—to some absurd remarks. Something of this nature may reasonably be anticipated from a people naturally so excitable and impulsive as the Irish; but all these demonstrations, with, I believe, but one exception, have been purely in the nature of a hearty welcome given by his neighbours to the prisoner who has been restored to liberty. My noble Friend was justified in referring to the letter from the head of the religion of the great majority of the people of Ireland, not only emphatically condemning Fenianism and Ribbandism, but obviously going against some of the first feelings of the people to whom it was addressed by deprecating actions which, though committed with a charitable object, might be construed into showing favour and encouragement to Fenianism. The fact is the subscription has been successful only in Cork. At Belfast, there has been no collection; and the telegram states that the general failure of the subscription movement has been entirely owing to the action of the Roman Catholic clergy. I believe that the policy of punishing the leaders, but at the same time not showing vindictiveness against mere dupes and enthusiasts, is the only one by which we can put ourselves in a position to deal effectively with Fenianism, because I believe that by this policy we shall have the people of Ireland on our side of the contest.

LORD CAIRNS: My Lords, I cannot think that after the narratives which have appeared in the papers during the last week or two anyone can be surprised that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde) should have called your Lordships' attention to occurrences which we should all unite in deploring. I believe, however, that many Members of your Lordships' House—and myself among the number—supposed that a more fitting opportunity would have presented itself for a discussion such as that which has arisen this evening. At the beginning of the Session we were informed by Her Majesty's Government that it would not be necessary for them to come forward and ask for a renewal of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland. That announcement was most gratifying to us all; but I thought an opportunity would be taken by the Government, either here or "elsewhere," to lay before Parliament the information of which they were in possession, and which would explain to Parliament the altered circumstances of the country, which caused Her Majesty's Government to think exceptional legislation of that kind no longer necessary. I suppose the Government have not taken that course because the Act for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus was an expiring one; but, as no information of that kind has been laid before Parliament, I think it necessary that I should say a few words in reference to the state of Ireland, as well as we are able to judge of it from the information before the House. My Lords, I myself, among the narratives of crime one has read within the last ten days, can recollect four instances of different kinds of crime, showing how widely spread must be the lawlessness which pervades that part of the country in which these crimes have been committed. The first of these cases was the murder of Mr. Anketell. This was a case in which an employer of labour felt it his interest to employ one man rather than another, and ill-will engendered by that proceeding was the cause of the assassination. To that I will add that if it be true—and I sincerely hope it is not true, though it is stated to be so not anonymously, but on highly respectable authority—that on the Sunday before the commission of the murder the victim was denounced from the altar of a Roman Catholic chapel, that circumstance must increase the horror of the crime and our regret at the state of feeling prevailing in that part of the country. The second case is that of a bailiff of a Member of your Lordships' House who was fired at. One account states that he was fired at not for an offence given to some persons not in the part of the country where an attempt was made on his life, but in another place. In another account we are told that he was fired at in mistake for somebody else whom those who fired at him had intended to shoot. If this latter report be true, it must add to one's horror of the recklessness of criminals who do not even take the trouble of making sure of the identity of the person against whom they would discharge their deadly malice. The next case that occurs to me is that of a man who sent his children to a school where they were under the instruction of a denomination to which he himself did not belong. That man died and was buried; but his coffin was taken out of the grave, stones were placed in it, and it was sunk in a lake, where the remains of the deceased man were exposed. This gives us a deplorable idea of the ruthlessness of the feelings of those who could perpetrate such an outrage. Then there was the case of an occupier of land whose dwelling-house was fired into. The inmates escaped only because they happened to be in bed. And yet it is under such circumstances as these that a wholesale pardon of prisoners has taken place. In such a deplorable state of things, the only consolation we receive from my noble Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Lord Dufferin), as far as I can see, is that, in the first place, Her Majesty's Government must rely on public opinion in Ireland; that, in the next place, the Lord Lieutenant will send to any district in which such offences are committed additional police, and order the expenses of this additional force to be paid by that district; and that, in the third place, the law will be administered with firmness by the Government. Now, as to public opinion in Ireland, it is divided into two classes. There is the opinion of, I hope, a small minority of the people, but still of a section whom we cannot disregard. By these persons not only are the offences to which I am referring winked at, but the perpetrators are shielded. I think, therefore, we cannot rely on that phase of public opinion. The other public opinion in Ireland is that of the majority, who regard those offences with horror: but I want to know what assistance they can give to the Government in preventing offences which are winked at, and the perpetrators of which are shielded by the minority of whom I have just spoken? The Government of this country has always had to a large extent opinion in Ireland on its side. If, therefore, public opinion in Ireland has any power in the matter, it ought long ago to have prevented such outrages. As to the Lord Lieutenant sending police and having them charged on the district, I want to know what satisfaction it can be to the man who has been murdered, or to the wife and children whom he has left behind him, or to those who are suffering from the crime to have an army of police sent down from Dublin to be paid for by increased local taxation falling on the innocent and peaceful portion of the community? Again, we are told that the law will be applied by Her Majesty's Government with the utmost firmness—and as this is a very important point I will refer to it at greater length. I think it is most important to see what are the principles which Her Majesty's Government have pursued with reference to those who had been reached by the law, who after a great deal of trouble had been convicted and were undergoing the sentence of the law. The noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies says that the late Government discharged three criminals. [EARL GRANVILLE: Four, I think.] Well, say four. I have no personal knowledge of these cases; but I have no doubt that the late Government exercised a wise discretion in those instances. Indeed, I think if any one looks at the number of convicted persons then undergoing sentence—some eighty or ninety—and finds that only four were discharged, he will come to the conclusion that there must have been something peculiar and exceptional in those four cases which made the Government arrive at the conclusion that the clemency of the Crown should be exercised in their behalf. Do not let me be misunderstood. If the present Government were able to point to circumstances which showed a less degree of guilt on the part of certain individuals, so as to distinguish them from the bulk of the offenders, and which showed that they were either dupes or that they had been misled, that they were repentant for the offences they had committed, and that they had given promises of amendment and of future good behaviour, I should be the last man to desire to restrict the exercise of clemency on the part of the Government. But let us apply these principles to the action of the Government in this matter. In the first place we are told that the convicts have been released in consequence of the failure of their health. But it is impossible that the Government, since their accession to Office, can have heard from Australia that it is absolutely necessary that the convicts in that country must be immediately released on account of their health having given way. Then, can the Government say with regard to the forty-nine convicts who were released in Ireland that they were dupes, persons misled, and showing a disposition to abjure their offences? Can they say that the learned Judges who sentenced these persons were consulted and had advised the Government to release them, or that the convicts had given promises of amendment? I will tell your Lordships what I have read upon the subject in a newspaper which was put into my hands to-day. A person named Costello, who was No. 5 on the list of convicts, was sentenced to penal servitude for twelve years, having been, I believe, one of those who were engaged in the Jackmel affair; and no sooner is he released from prison than that person publishes in the newspaper to which I have referred a poetical composition of considerable literary merit—indeed, the production is so well-written that I should have thought he would have come under the literary class who were not to be released—headed “Don’t talk but fight,” and uttering sentiments which I should be sorry to read aloud in your Lordships’ House. No. 15, John Warren, was sentenced to fifteen years’ penal servitude; and from the same newspaper we learn that he was received with great triumph by his friends and acquaintances, and he also publishes a composition in which he inculcates upon the Irish people that the great means of regenerating the nation is the sabre. These productions are specimens of the feelings of two, at all events, of those who have been released in this country. What are the feelings of those who have been released in Australia one cannot, of course, yet know. But the matter does not rest there. I am happy to think that, whatever may be our political differences in this country, we are united in condemning the Fenian conspiracy. I give the noble Lords opposite credit for being as sincere in their abhorrence of the conspiracy as any on this side of the House. But, my Lords, we must not be content with merely holding opinions of our own; we must be careful that our opinions are not misunderstood by those in Ireland—we must be careful to ascertain what is likely to be the effect of these liberations on the minds of an ignorant and impulsive people. Now, forty-nine of these convicts have been discharged, and upon what occasion? The noble Earl (Earl Granville) alluded to the case of the Chartists, whom he said had been discharged after they had undergone a certain number of years’ imprisonment. But upon what occasion were those prisoners discharged? The noble Earl says upon the occasion of a Royal marriage. But the discharge of the Fenian convicts has been upon the occasion of a change of Government. Now, my Lords, I cannot help recollecting what occurred in 1859. At that time there was a conspiracy in Ireland, which to all intents and purposes was the germ and shadow of the Fenian conspiracy—I mean the Phoenix conspiracy. The Government of the day prosecuted certain persons against whom they believed they had good evidence of their complicity in that conspiracy. In a great many instances the juries differed and the prisoners were sent back to gaol to await a second trial, while the only person convicted was sentenced to penal servitude for seven years. But, my Lords, there was a change of Government, and what was the consequence? Not only were the prisoners who were awaiting their trial discharged, but the person convicted was pardoned. The Phoenix conspiracy to all appearance collapsed; but not many months elapsed before it was revived in the form of the Fenian conspiracy, and Stephens, the very man who played so prominent a part in the first conspiracy, proceeded to take an equally prominent position in the second. The Fenian conspiracy having come to a head, the then Government succeeded, with great difficulty and at enormous expense, in convicting several of those whose complicity was proved with a conspiracy which was endeavoured to be carried into effect by such means as stabbing policemen in the back, blowing up houses and barracks, and by the Clerkenwell outrage. It was all very well for the Government to say that they had not pardoned those whose hands were actually imbued in the blood of the victims; but I contend that of the whole of those who took an active part in this conspiracy it might be said that their hands were more or less imbued in blood. Well, some eighty or ninety convictions having been obtained, certain exceptional cases were taken into consideration by the late Government, who pardoned some three or four of the convicts. But a new Government comes into Office, they are perhaps besieged by applications from various municipal officers in Ireland, and the result is that the prisoners are released. What must be the impression produced among the ignorant and excitable Irish population by this act on the part of the Government? Why, they must say—"We have now got a Government which has some sympathy for us; they have done for us that which the late Government would not do; they have released the great bulk of the Fenian conspirators; and, therefore, we must suppose that after all they don't think that the Fenian conspiracy was such a bad thing." The opinion of the Irish people upon this matter becomes of great importance when viewed in connection with another subject to which attention has been drawn—namely, the land question. I have found no fault with the Government for not proceeding with an Irish Land Bill during the present Session; but I do find fault with the Attorney General, and particularly with the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the present Government, telling the Irish people that the land question is one which they may expect to be taken up next to that which is occupying the attention of Parliament at the present moment. These two Members of Her Majesty's Government have told the Irish people that the land question in Ireland is in an unsatisfactory condition; but they have told them nothing more. But that is exactly the opinion of those who are agitating in Ireland; they also believe that the present condition of the land question is unsatisfactory, and therefore they agree with the Prime Minister in that respect. The Fenian conspirators will naturally say—"The Government are engaged at the present in a crusade to strip the Church of its property"—as to the policy of such a course I express no opinion at this moment—"we are told to wait until that is over, and then the land question will be taken up, and just as it fares with the Church this year so will it fare with the land next year." The noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) has said that he has reason to believe that the clemency of the Government, which has been extended to this schedule of the Fenian offenders, has not been misplaced, and that the results of the clemency which has been shown are not unsatisfactory. I have already given your Lordships two cases in which it has been very seriously misplaced, and I have read to you the sentiments of the released convicts. I will now proceed to show your Lordships what are the feelings of other Irish persons, as exhibited in an Irish newspaper called the Weekly News, which was published in Dublin last Saturday—

"The list comprises forty-nine names, and includes many gallant young fellows whose demeanour in the hour of danger and in the dock won for them the ardent sympathy of the Irish race. The greater number of the men whose sufferings are thus abridged are still in far-off Australia; but among those for whom the gates of the English prisons have opened, and who have already been restored to their homes, our readers will be glad to find the names of Charles J. Hickham, the gentle and the true; of William O'Sullivan, the worthy son of a worthy father; and of James F. X. O'Brien, whose eloquent vindication of Irish patriotism in the dock will be remembered while fearlessness and public spirit are honoured in Ireland. Among the released prisoners in Australia we notice with pleasure the names of Michael Moore, the pipe-maker, than whom not one of the brave band acted with more dignity and manliness; of James Flood, one of the heroes of the Chester raid, and unquestionably as fine a specimen of an Irish 'rebel' as ever confronted an accuser; and many others, whose daring deeds are remembered, and whose parting words are cherished in every corner of the land."

These are the persons whom the noble Earl described as being poor, weak, suffering creatures, who were discharged because they were so inoffensive and in-firm, and because they could not do the least harm, even if they were so minded. The noble Earl complimented the Cardinal at the head of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland because he deprecated collections on behalf of Fenian convicts; but I find, at a meeting in Limerick, held for the collection of funds for the Fenian convicts, that Father Shanahan, the Roman Catholic curate of St. Michael's, made some remarks of a strikingly different character, which were received with great applause by his hearers. He says—

"I do not by any means profess to be a Fenian. [A Voice: It is a pity you are not.] [Cheers.] Father Shanahan: But if Fenianism means love for Ireland—[A Voice: It does.] Father Shanahan: If Fenianism means attachment to my native land, if it means 'Ireland for the Irish,' if it means that we are able to govern ourselves as a people, then I am a Fenian. [Loud and prolonged cheers.] [A Voice: Three cheers for self-government.] [Cheers.] Father Shanahan: That cheer finds an echo in my heart, and not in my heart alone, but in the heart of many priests in Ireland. [Renewed cheering.] There may be, to be sure—I do not for one moment intend to conceal the fact—a few priests out of the hundreds who minister to the Catholics of Ireland of opinion that for the general welfare and advancement of our land we should be connected with a powerful nation, and that we would not be able to govern ourselves if separated. [A Voice: We would.] Father Shanahan: There may be a few, but I do not believe the priests of Ireland as a body, are of that opinion. [Cheers.] I am, therefore, proud to stand up here to-night and proclaim that I am not of that opinion. [Cheers.] I sympathize deeply with those men who for the past three years have suffered in the dungeons of British rule a protracted martyrdom. [Cheers.] I sincerely rejoice that their sufferings are now about to be brought to an end. I rejoice sincerely, I repeat, I rejoice as much as any man in this room—and I believe there are honest and sympathetic hearts here to-night ["Hear, hear!"]—and you must all rejoice with me, that the sufferings of so many are now about to be brought to a close. [Cheers.] And though it may be that the great man who directs the helm of State may not be able to procure us full justice"— which means self-government, of course—

"still we must honour him as the first of Englishmen who has proclaimed that Ireland must be governed from an Irish point of view."

The Irish point of view being the view of the speaker. But that is not all. Father Shanahan was followed by a town councillor, and I pray you to mark what he says, because it will help to dispel the noble Earl's delusion that this release of prisoners had worked beneficially for the country. Mr. Lawrence Kelly said—

"I tell you at the outset I am a Fenian. [Cheers.] The Habeas Corpus Act has been restored, and I am not afraid of being taken in the morning, and I tell you, without any reservation, that I am a Fenian. [Cheers.] My father was a Fenian, and all our generations were Fenians. [Cheers.] I tell you every Irishman since the day the English invader put his foot on our shores, every Irishman who is not in the pay of the Government, is a Fenian."

Lord Cairns

This is rather opposed to the noble Earl, who propounded the doctrine, I believe, that Ribandism is the best antidote to Fenianism. Mr. Kelly adds—and I pray the noble Earl's attention—

"We are promised disestablishment, a land Bill, and all these measures calculated to conciliate the people, and whom are you to thank?"

I dare say the noble Earl imagines the response will be "the Government." Not at all. The Report continues—

"A Voice: The Fenians. [Cheers.] Mr. Kelly: The Fenians, unquestionably. I ask you now what concessions would the British Government have made, what would they have done for us but for these men, if it were not for the men in America? [A Voice: Three cheers for Grant.] [Cheers.] Mr. Kelly: I ask you for three cheers for General Grant. [Renewed cheering.] [Another Voice: Three cheers for Stephens.] [Grant cheering.]

That is the view of the people of Ireland. We are promised disestablishment and a satisfactory solution of the land question; we are promised all sorts of good things, and whom are we to thank for it? The Fenians. Moreover, the Government, having just come into Office, know they have the Fenians to thank for it, so they are going to release them all.

EARL GRANVILLE: Not all.

LORD CAIRNS: No, not all; but thirty-four of them. Well, when I was reading this speech by Mr. Kelly I could not help thinking I had heard the keynote of it before, and then came to my recollection an expression which fell from a greater man than Mr. Kelly—I mean the present Prime Minister. I recollected, when the Fenian conspiracy had reached its height, and when the convictions were being obtained against some of these men now released, the present Prime Minister stated his view with regard to the Fenian conspiracy; and what did he say? Although the language is more guarded, although the sentences are more rounded, his remarks seem to me exactly to tally with Mr. Kelly's. This is what Mr. Gladstone said—

EARL GRANVILLE: On what occasion?

LORD CAIRNS: About the time these convictions were being obtained, the winter before last, or thereabouts.

EARL GRANVILLE: In Parliament?

LORD CAIRNS: I think it was at a public meeting. He said—

"These painful and horrible manifestations may perhaps, in the merciful designs of Providence—without in the slightest degree acquitting the authors of responsibility—have been intended to invite this nation to greater search of its own heart and spirit and conscience with reference to the condition of Ireland and the legislation affecting that country."

["Hear!"] No doubt, noble Lords cheer, but I want to know what is the difference between the two statements beyond method and style. It is the Fenians we have to thank, says Mr. Kelly. Mr. Gladstone puts it in much more becoming guise; he says Fenianism invites you to search your hearts and consciences and see whether something cannot be done for Ireland; but it is the same thing—the promises for Ireland's good are all due to Fenians, and, as accession to power is also due to these promises, the Fenians ought to be liberated.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: We have certainly wandered a very long way from the subject brought before us by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde). One would have supposed that the speech of the noble Earl on the cross-Benches (Earl Grey) and the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns) were based on a formal Motion censuring Her Majesty's Government for having advised the pardon of these convicts. I should not have risen to address your Lordships had it not been for this characteristic of the debate, but would have left the matter to rest on the argument of my noble Friend (Earl Granville). I rise lest anyone should suppose that, considering the part which I took with respect to the Fenian conspiracy, I did not heartily approve the conduct of the Government in the matter under discussion. I, however, accept all the responsibility which should fall upon me by virtue of my position; indeed, I should, perhaps, accept a larger share of responsibility, because I naturally feel that my opinion with regard to the advice to be tendered to Her Majesty must have weighed with my Colleagues more than it would have done if I had not had some share in the recent government of Ireland. I hope no one in this House will charge me either with indifference or undue leniency during the time I administered the government of Ireland. I remember that a very different tone from this at first characterized the comments upon my proceedings, and, though noble Lords were willing—out of consideration, perhaps, for my inexperience—to allow that I might be justified in the view I took of the serious nature of that conspiracy, very high authorities in this House were disposed to question whether I had not exaggerated the importance of the Fenian rising, and whether I had not resolved to take more serious measures than the case warranted. I remember also, exceedingly well, on my return to this country, after resigning Office—when I ventured to warn the House of the very serious nature of the Fenian conspiracy—that I was thought rather to have exceeded the limits which a calm view of the case would have dictated. Not long after a change of Government occurred, and to my great satisfaction the noble Lord who succeeded to the Office of Chief Secretary (the Earl of Mayo), and who is now Governor General of India—and than whom no one was more competent, he being an Irishman, to form a correct estimate of the movement—went as far as I had done, and fully confirmed what I had said. I say, I never was disposed to treat the conspiracy as a matter about which we ought to be indifferent. We have been told in strong language that this act of clemency was connected, in point of time, rather unfortunately, with a change of Government. Let me remind you that on a former change of Government a measure was adopted, as it turned out unfortunately, upon insufficient grounds, which at that time led to a similar charge. In 1867 the Government of that day did not think it necessary to advise the renewal of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; and the Irish Attorney General, with some imprudence, boasted at his election that the newly-installed Government had not done so, seeking to obtain popularity by contrasting the policy of the Government with that of the preceding one. I should have been only too well pleased if his vaticinations had proved correct; but almost immediately afterwards there occurred the only open outbreak, and that Government was obliged to renew the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. I mention that, not as a conclusive argument, but as another coincidence. It was not the recent change of Government, but the fact that we were able to advise Parliament not to renew the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, which made it natural and proper for us to consider whether, as the country was about to return to the ordinary reign of law, it might not be possible to exercise clemency by releasing some of the Fenian convicts. My noble Friend (Earl Granville) has fully explained the manner in which the question was looked at. I never could consent to adopt—and it seems to me it would be utterly impossible to adopt, the principle laid down by the noble Earl on the cross-Benches (Earl Grey), and apply strictly and without remorse to political offenders the rules adopted with regard to ordinary criminals. The main consideration which ought to influence the Government in advising a general or a partial amnesty is this—Can political prisoners be released without endangering in any way the safety of the State? If safety no longer requires that they should be kept under punishment, I maintain that the time has arrived when an amnesty may be properly granted. This question has been argued as if we had released the principal conspirators; but twenty-two of the leaders, whom we consider it dangerous to set at large, still remain in prison. The cases were carefully examined by the Irish Government, and I believe the liberated prisoners are men who might be safely released without endangering the security of the country, or in any way encouraging these agrarian crimes. I need scarcely say I regard those crimes with the utmost abhorrence; but they constitute a continuous chapter in Irish history. The first of the recent outrages occurred some months ago, long before the present Government came into Office; the first symptom of the renewal of agrarianism, in an aggravated form, was the attack on Mr. Scully and his party. I do not for a moment connect the occurrence of these with the fact of the late Government being in Office. They are the consequences of rooted disease which successive Governments for the last fifty years have endeavoured in vain to eradicate. My noble Friend told us to put it down; the difficulty is to find out the way. I believe the powers which are given by the law to the Irish Government are the only powers which can be used with any effect; they are the powers of sending special police, who must be paid by the locality, so that the cost is a severe punishment. But any man who entertains the hope that these or any such measures will lead to the disappearance of the disease must know Ireland very little. These agrarian crimes, notwithstanding recent occurrences, have happily diminished of late years, and I firmly hope we shall see a still greater diminution of them; but to connect these crimes with the Fenian conspiracy and that with changes in the Government, and then to draw a general conclusion that the policy of Government is the cause of them, seems to me a complete non causa pro causa. Successive Governments have failed to carry Land Bills, and it seems to me it is infinitely better than exciting expectations to disappoint them, and for popularity's sake bringing forward measures which we know cannot be carried out, to confine ourselves to a policy which can be carried out.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE denied having said that it was the duty of the Government to put down these outrages; what he said was that the Government ought to take steps to discover the cause of them, and then they would find it easier to frame a Bill which would give satisfaction to the people.

LAW OF HYPOTHEC IN SCOTLAND.

QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND wished to know the terms of the Order of Reference, and whether there was any idea of assimilating the Law of Hypothec in Scotland to the Law of Distress in England; for although the two might be analogous they were not identical.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, the Order of Reference was confined to the Law of Hypothec in Scotland.

INCREASE OF THE EPISCOPATE BILL [H.L.]

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General, Whether the revision of the Statutes has been completed, or what part thereof, and when a Report will be submitted to the House; and when a Bill will be introduced for repealing obsolete and useless Statutes?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, in reply, that the revision of the statutes up to the 10th of George III. had been completed. The process of revising the statutes since that date had been going on for some time, and he believed it approached completion. He was unable to say that it would be completed during the present Session. But he might state that it was under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government to prepare and issue a revised edition of the statutes.

INDIA—RIFLES FOR.—QUESTION.

MR. DIXON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether an Order for Rifles has been received from the Indian authorities; and, if so, for how many; supposing such an Order to have been received, whether it is the intention of the War Office to allow the Rifles to be made at the Government Factory at Enfield or by the Gun Trade of the Country; and, if Guns made at Enfield for the Colonies and India are charged at the actual cost price, or whether a per centage is put on?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that it was intended to order 10,000 Sniders, and 1,200 arms of other classes for India, to be supplied from the gun factories of London and Birmingham.

NAVY—NAVAL CHAPLAINS.—QUESTION.

MR. EYKYN said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, in case the late Board of Admiralty came to the conclusion that the Chaplains of Her Majesty's Navy had a right to be placed on the same footing as those of the Army in regard to pay and position, the present Board intended to give effect to that conclusion?

MR. CHILDERS replied, that in 1867 the late Board of Admiralty received a letter from a chaplain, pointing out that that Board had done something for the benefit of the other civilian officers of the navy, but nothing for them; and as they had no representative at Whitehall they could not memorialise. This led to inquiries, from which it appeared that the chaplains who were not naval instructors, received less full pay than army chaplains, but more half-pay, except after twenty years' service. About half the chaplains were naval instructors, and then their pay, as well as their half-pay, was much more than that of army chaplains. The late Board, in April, 1868, proposed to the Treasury to adopt the army scale, mainly on the ground that difficulty was experienced in obtaining properly qualified chaplains. This proposal was repeated in May, 1868, but the Treasury did not adopt it. He was not aware that the late Board came to the conclusion that navy chaplains had a right to be placed on the same footing as army chaplains; and, indeed, he could not imagine how such a right could be established. He should give due weight to their opinion on the subject of the proper scale of paying this or any other class of officers; but he was bound to tell his hon. Friend that so far from finding a difficulty in securing chaplains on the present scale of pay, he had received a great number of applications for these appointments, which he was wholly unable to comply with.

INDIA—MILITARY APPOINTMENTS.

QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he will have any objection to lay upon the Table Copies of the Memoranda or other official Documents which specify and describe the respective rights and functions with regard to Military Appointments in India of the Governor General, the Governor in Council, the Commander or Commanders in Chief, and other authorities?

MR. GRANT DUFF said, in reply, that he knew of no such memoranda or other official documents as the hon. Gentleman had alluded to. The distribution of military appointments among the various authorities in India was regulated by custom and usage, which custom and usage had been expressly recognized by the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 105.

CASE OF WILLIAM BLATCHER.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN DAWSON-DAMER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether William Blatcher (the man alluded to by him as having died from injuries received on duty at the crossing where now stands the semaphore) was kept on full pay for eighteen months- and pensioned three weeks before he died, thus depriving his widow of the penny subscription of the force, amounting to over £30; whether, on the widow's application to the then Commissioner, Sir Richard Mayne, she was refused the usual allowance for widows and children on the ground that the man did not die in the service; and, whether the present Chief Commissioner would reconsider the case on behalf of the widow and four fatherless children?

MR. BRUCE: The circumstances, Sir, of this poor man's case are not exactly those which have been mentioned by the hon. and gallant Gentleman. Blatcher had been in the police force since 1847. In May, 1866, he was knocked down by a gentleman's carriage and received severe injuries, in consequence of which he remained on the sick list till August, 1867, when he was dismissed with a pension of £32 a year. In the following October he entered Guy's Hospital as a patient, and died there in the course of a few days. The surgeons certified that he died of disease of the liver, but they refused to say that his death was caused by the accident which had occurred about sixteen months before. Under these circumstances Sir Richard Mayne did not consider himself justified by the regulations of the force in recommending the widow to the Secretary of State as a person who was entitled to a pension.

Under those regulations the Secretary of State was empowered to grant a pension to the widow whenever a police officer died either immediately or ultimately, in consequence of injuries received while in the execution of his duty. As, however, a strong opinion existed among those who knew Blatcher that his death was accelerated by the accident, fresh inquiries shall be made on the subject, and if I am satisfied that such was the fact, I shall be happy to reconsider the case.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS AT THE SWINDON STATION.—QUESTION.

MR. CADOGAN said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether any Report has been received at the Board of Trade of two fatal accidents which have recently occurred at the Swindon Station to two servants of the Great Western Company while crossing the line; and, whether the Board of Trade have any power to compel Railway Companies to make such regulations as will enable their workmen, while on the Company's premises, and in the discharge of their duties, to cross the line in safety?

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, the Board of Trade have received no reports respecting the accidents referred to in the Question, and I may tell the hon. Gentleman that they have no power to compel railway companies to make such reports. The Acts of Parliament only compel railway companies to report accidents of a serious nature to the public using the lines, and do not refer to accidents to servants in their employ. I may state, however, that it is the intention of the Board of Trade to address a letter to the railway companies asking them to make returns of such accidents. From what we know of some of the companies, they, and probably indeed all of them, will have no indisposition whatever to make such returns, and, considering how many railway servants lose their lives in consequence of accidents, such information might in some cases be found useful.

SCOTLAND—PORTPATRICK HARBOUR. QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether any course in regard to the disposal of Portpatrick Harbour has been determined upon in consequence of the Commissioners of Supply in Wigtownshire having declined to accept the terms offered with respect to it by the Board?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, that in consequence of the local authorities not thinking it worth their while to take charge of the harbour, it became necessary for the Government to consider what should be done with it. Before they could arrive at any conclusion it would be necessary, however, to obtain the opinion of the Legal Advisers of the Government upon many important questions, and until that opinion had been received, no decision could be come to as to what would be done with the harbour.

MAURITIUS—REPORTED FAMINE.

QUESTION.

MR. R. FOWLER said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government are in possession of any recent intelligence concerning the apprehended occurrence of a famine in the Mauritius; and whether he can state what measures have been taken to prevent so great a calamity?

MR. MONSELL, in reply, said, he was happy to say, that, from the despatches received yesterday from the Mauritius, there was not the slightest reason to apprehend a famine. The monthly consumption of rice was about 75,000 bags. On the 17th of February there were 292,000 bags of rice in the island, and the cultivation was going on satisfactorily. The Governor stated that the arrears of wages on the 31st of December did not exceed the average, and if the colony was only spared the repetition of last year's calamity, there was every reason to believe that it would rapidly recover from its present state of depression.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. CHARLEY said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, If he has any objection to state the grounds on which it is proposed to abolish the jurisdiction of the Ordinary over Church of England Endowed Schools?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I beg to state that I propose to introduce into the Endowed Schools Bill a clause for repealing the law under which the Bishop of a diocese or an Ordinary has jurisdiction over schools and schoolmasters. The reason for so doing is that such jurisdiction is in reality obsolete, and it was thought there was no advantage in retaining as law an enactment which might be used for obstructive purposes. I shall be prepared to enter fully into the reasons for the proposed change when we come to the next stage of the Bill. If I do not explain those reasons now it is not owing to any want of deference to the hon. Gentleman opposite; but because, in regard to replies to Questions of this kind, it is not the custom of the House to expect or to encourage argumentative speeches.

IRELAND—MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will state for the information of the House, on what grounds he proposes to give to the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth the sum of £364,000, or fourteen years' purchase of their present annual payment, from the Consolidated Fund, whilst at the same time he proposes to give to the Protestant Clergy only about eight years' purchase of their present income?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I need not trouble the House or the hon. Baronet with the reasons for the proceeding which he supposes Her Majesty's Government to recommend, because in point of fact they do not recommend it. As far as regards the fourteen years' purchase of the grant to Maynooth, and of certain other grants, the hon. Baronet is perfectly accurate, but he is not accurate with regard to the eight years' purchase of the incomes of the clergy. He has evidently been led into error by taking the gross amount of the income of the Church, as I stated it to be, and multiplying it by eight, so as to make it about equal to the sum which I named for compensation to the clergy. But in the gross amount of the income of the Church much is included which either never comes to the clergy at all, or comes to them in money's worth and not in money—in the way of occupation of houses and land. The actual number of years' purchase so taken for the clergy and others who possess life interests varies in different cases. In the case of Bishops I think it is twelve years; in the case of parochial incumbents thirteen years; in the case of Presbyterian ministers fifteen years; and in the case of curates seventeen years. Therefore, the period of fourteen years which I have named lies somewhere in the mean between those points.

IRELAND—FENIANISM.—QUESTION.

COLONEL ANNESLEY said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is true that, on the 22d of February last, a man named Smith was arrested in the county of Cavan for having in his possession Fenian documents and resolutions regularly printed on green paper, and containing plans and schemes of the Fenian conspiracy, dated 1869; and, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to recommend the liberation of any more Fenian convicts?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: Sir, some such Fenian documents have been found upon a man in Cavan, but I am not able, at this moment, to state the exact nature of them. I have written to Dublin for the Papers, and if the hon. and gallant Gentleman will repeat his Question on Monday, I shall probably be prepared to give a full account of the matter. With respect to the last part of the hon. and gallant Member's Question, I have to state that it is not the intention to give any further advice to the Crown concerning the liberation of Fenian prisoners.

SPAIN—THE "MERMAID."—QUESTION.

MR. HEADLAM said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What has been the result of the proceedings with the authorities of Spain concerning the destruction of the ship "Mermaid?"

MR. OTWAY, in reply, said, he was glad to be able to inform his right hon. Friend that the proceedings in regard to the ship Mermaid were now terminated, and that the result was satisfactory. The labours of the Commission appointed to investigate the matter were interrupted by those occurrences in Spain with which the House were doubtless familiar, but when order was restored at Cadiz the Commission renewed their inquiry, which terminated on the 28th of February. The result was entirely in favour of the plaintiffs, who were to receive the sum of £3,866 10s. 11d., and it was stipulated between the British and Spanish Governments that that sum should become payable within ninety days from the 28th of February. The decision, he believed, was considered satisfactory by the plaintiffs themselves.

ARMY—THE WHITWORTH GUN.

QUESTION.

MR. T. HUGHES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether a costly series of experiments is about to be made with a Whitworth 9-inch gun; whether a new 9-inch gun is to be ordered of Mr. Whitworth, and, if so, at what price; and, if so, on what conditions as to delivery within a reasonable time; whether any field guns are about to be ordered of Mr. Whitworth which are to be made of a peculiarly costly material, but otherwise in accordance with the existing Woolwich system; and, whether such experiments and orders are proposed or recommended by any professional department of the War Office or Admiralty?

MR. CARDWELL: Perhaps, Sir, the House may be aware that Mr. Whitworth has invented a new mode of making what we believe to be a peculiarly valuable gun metal. In consequence we applied to Mr. Whitworth for the use of a small quantity of the material for making an experiment with it. Mr. Whitworth declined, however, to allow us the use of the raw material, and we consequently applied to him to know whether he was willing to make a gun of the size mentioned in my hon. Friend's Question. An offer on the subject was accordingly made to the Government by Mr. Whitworth, but it has not at present been accepted.

VALUATION OF PROPERTY BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, The reason of the delay in printing the Valuation of Property Bill; and, whether, by reason of that delay, he will consent to postpone its Second Reading to some more distant day than the 1st of April?

MR. GOSCHEN replied, that the delay in the printing the Valuation of Property Bill was occasioned by the great pressure of business in the Department. The Bill, however, would be in the hands of Members to morrow, and care would be taken that they should have ample opportunity of considering its provisions before the Second Reading was proposed.

IRELAND—FENIAN SPEECHES AT CORK.—QUESTION.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, he wished to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland, of which he had given him private notice, but if he were unable to answer it that evening he should have no objection to postpone it till a future occasion. He was anxious to know, Whether at a moment when the Government to which the right hon. Gentleman belonged proposed to destroy one of the bulwarks of the Nation, the Chief Secretary for Ireland would institute inquiries with reference to the following facts:—

“A meeting took place in Cork yesterday, the Mayor in the chair in his civic costume, and strong Fenian speeches were made by O'Mahony and other Fenians; Colonel Warren declared himself a believer in the sabre as a means of uplifting a down trodden nation, and exhorted the people to be united, and there was nothing they might not obtain.”

This was received with loud cheers; but I am bound to say that the Mayor is said to have stated that he did not approve of such language being used.—[“Order.”]

MR. SPEAKER, Is the hon. and gallant Member giving notice of a Question he intends to ask?

COLONEL STUART KNOX: I have just asked the Question.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: Sir, I gave my hon. and gallant Friend a private intimation that I knew nothing about this matter, but that I should be always ready to answer him whenever I had the smallest information about it, which is the only answer I can give him.

IRISH CHURCH BILL—[BILL 27.]

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. John Bright, Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Order for Second Reading, read.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise, Sir, to move the second reading of this Bill.

Motion made and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, when the right hon. Gentleman introduced the measure of which he has just now moved the second reading, he admitted that he was submitting to our consideration a gigantic issue, and he went on to say that a greater and more profound question had never been brought under the consideration of Parliament. Sir, I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman in his own appreciation of his measure, and I deduce from such an admission on the part of the First Minister of the Crown this conclusion—that if ever there were an instance which required on the part of this House its utmost judgment and deliberation, this is the case. I might add—not forgetting the peculiar character of many of the considerations involved in it—that it is one which also demands from both sides of the House much self-control and mutual forbearance. Now, Sir, it is more than 200 years since gigantic issues were decided on by the House of Commons. They were decided then with an earnestness of conviction not inferior to that which I am sure pervades this Assembly now; but, unfortunately, with a degree of passion and prejudice on both sides which turned out to be very detrimental to the country. The decision pronounced by the House of Commons at that time on gigantic issues was followed by a period of civil discord, not more distinguished for its long duration than for the costly sacrifices which both sides in the contest had to endure. That period of civil war was followed by one of violent tranquillity—if I may so style it—but one in which certainly the principles of civil and religious liberty did not flourish. At length the two parties, alike irritated and exhausted, terminated this great experimental chapter of our history with a passionate carelessness that recalled the old state of affairs without securing any of those objects for the attainment of which they had originally entered into the contest. Now, I cannot help feeling that what thus passed in the times of our predecessors may be profitable for us to remember; and that we may derive some instruction from it, and may resolve that, whatever may be the ultimate decision of Parliament on this gigantic issue, the country, which we fully represent, shall at least have the satisfaction of knowing that we have arrived at the conclusion to which we may come in the light of reason, in the healthy atmosphere of an instructed public opinion, with a deep sense of individual responsibility on the part of every Member in this House, and after the most vigilant and mature deliberation.

The right hon. Gentleman, in the measure which he has placed on the table of the House, proposes to accomplish two objects. The first is to sever the union between Church and State—which for the convenience of debate we call disestablishment. The second is to empower the State to seize the property of a corporation, which for the convenience of debate we call disendowment. Before I investigate the mode by which the right hon. Gentleman seeks to accomplish these objects, or speculate upon what I think will be the consequences if those objects are accomplished, I would ask the House to allow me for one or two moments to make a few general observations on the subject of disestablishment and disendowment. They are, to my mind, totally different matters, though they are frequently mixed up together, and the consequences of the one attributed to the other. In our debates last year—and, unfortunately, frequently upon the hustings—I observed the erroneous mode in which the consequences of disestablishment are attributed to disendowment, and in which the same process is followed vice versa. Now, it seems to me that it will tend to the satisfactory conduct of debate if there is some general understanding as to what we comprehend by those words; and if, on the whole, we can contrive in our discussion to attach the same meaning to the same expressions.

Now, Sir, with regard to disestablishment, I myself am much opposed to it, because I am in favour of what is called the union between Church and State. What I understand by the union of Church and State is an arrangement which renders the State religious by investing authority with the highest sanctions that can influence the sentiments and convictions, and consequently the conduct of the subject; while, on the other hand, that union renders the Church—using that epithet in its noblest and purest sense—political; that is to say, it blends civil authority with ecclesiastical influence; it defines and defends the rights of the laity, and prevents the Church from subsiding into a sacerdotal corporation. If you divest the State of this connection, it appears to me that you necessarily reduce both the quantity and the quality of its duties. The State will still be the protector of our persons and our property, and, no doubt, these are most important duties for the State to perform. But these are duties in a community which rather excite a spirit of criticism than a sentiment of enthusiasm and veneration. All, or most of the higher functions of Government—take education for example, the formation of the character of the people, and consequently the guidance of their future conduct—depart from the State, and become the appanage of religious societies, of the religious organizations of the country—you may call them the various Churches if you please—when they are established on what is called independent principles. Now, the first question which necessarily arises in this altered state of affairs is—are we quite certain that in making this severance between political and religious influence we may not be establishing in a country a power greater than the acknowledged Government itself? I know this is a philosophical age. I know there are many who consider that the religious influence is a waning influence, and that it is a mark of an enlightened Statesman to divest the exercise of authority, as much as possible, of any connection with religion. These are not my views. I do not believe that the influence of religion is a waning influence in public affairs. I have, for a considerable time, rather been of opinion that we are on the eve of a period when the influence of religion on public affairs may be predominant. It is very difficult in a popular Assembly, as we all know, to touch upon subjects in which religion is concerned, and thirty years ago or so, when questions connected with religion were first constantly cropping up—if I may use the expression—in this House, it was curious and interesting to observe how both sides mutually agreed that, as it was necessary to legislate on these questions, Parliament should confine its attention as much as possible to the mere technical details of the Bills before it, avoiding any unnecessary reference to religious sentiment or principles. All this, however, has entirely changed. The religious principle; its influence upon man; its material consequences in endowments, in ecclesiastical establishments, in sects and synods; how far it is necessary in the exercise of political power that it should, to a certain degree, be consecrated; and how far it is necessary for the enjoyment of religious liberty that the civil authority should exercise some control upon the religious organization of the country—these questions have now become not only political questions, but the greatest of political questions. It is impossible for us any longer to avoid that discussion. All we can do is to meet these questions fully and frankly, and, if possible, in a spirit of charity, and of good temper, placing upon any expressions used on either side a favourable and friendly construction. I can only say that, if I make any of those rhetorical mishaps which are necessarily incident to our free habit of discussion in this House, I am sure no Gentleman opposite, or on my side of the House will suppose for a moment that I wish to wound his feelings or offend his conscience.

When we have to decide whether we can dissociate the principle of religion from the State, it is well to remember that we are asked to relinquish an influence that is universal. We hear in these days a great deal of philosophy. Now, it is my happiness to be acquainted with eminent philosophers. They all agree in one thing. They will all tell you that, however brilliant may be the discoveries of physical science—however marvellous those demonstrations which attempt to penetrate the mysteries of the human mind—greatly as they have contributed to the comfort and convenience of man, or confirmed his consciousness of the nobility of his nature—yet all those great philosophers agree in one thing—that in their investigations there is an inevitable term where they meet the insoluble—where all the most transcendent powers of intellect dissipate and disappear. There commences the religious principle. It is universal, and it will assert its universal influence in the government of men.

Now, I put this case before the House. We are asked to commence a great change, for it is impossible to consider the effect of this measure merely with the limited, though important, bearing, which is on the face of it. The right hon. Gentleman has himself given a frank and fair warning to Parliament. He has told them he was going to call for their decision upon a gigantic issue. He has himself admitted that a greater or more profound question was never submitted to Parliament. When, therefore, we are called to the consideration of these circumstances, it is absolutely necessary that we should contemplate the possibility of our establishing a society in which there may be two powers, the political and the religious, and the religious may be the stronger. Now, I will take this case—Under ordinary circumstances, a Government performing those duties of police to which it will be limited when the system has perfectly developed the first step to which we are called upon to take to-night—such a Government under ordinary circumstances will be treated with decent respect. But a great public question, such as has before occurred in this country, and as must periodically occur in free and active communities—a great public question arises which touches the very fundamental principles of our domestic tranquillity, or even the existence of the Empire; but the Government of the country, and the religious organizations of the country, take different views and entertain different opinions upon that subject. In all probability the Government of the country will be right. A Government in its secret councils, is calm and impartial, is in possession of ample and accurate information—views every issue before it in reference to the interests of all classes, and takes, therefore, what is popularly called a comprehensive view. The religious organization of the country acts in quite a different manner. It is not calm; it is not impartial; it is sincere, it is fervid, it is enthusiastic. Its information is limited and prejudiced. It does not view the question of the day in reference to the interests of all classes. It looks upon the question of the day as something of so much importance—as something of such transcendent interest, not only for the earthly, but even for the future welfare of all Her Majesty's subjects—that it will allow no consideration to divert its mind and energy from the accomplishment of its object. It, therefore, necessarily takes what is commonly called a contracted view. But who can doubt what will be the result when, on a question which enlists and excites all the religious passions of the nation, the zeal of enthusiasm advocates one policy, and the calmness of philosophers and the experience of statesmen recommends another? The Government might be right, but the Government would not be able to enforce its policy, and the question might be decided in a way that might disturb a country or even destroy an empire. I know, Sir, it may be said that though there may be some truth in this view abstractedly considered, yet it does not apply to the country in which we live, because this is a country in which we enjoy religious freedom, and in which toleration is established; and because only a portion of Her Majesty's subjects are in communion with the national Church. I draw a very different conclusion to that which I have supposed—and I believe fairly supposed—as the objection made to the argument I am now offering. It is because there is an Established Church that we have achieved religious liberty and enjoy religious toleration; and without the union of the Church with the State I do not see what security there would be either for religious liberty or toleration. No error could be greater than to suppose that the advantage of the Established Church is limited to those who are in communion with it. Take the case of the Roman Catholic priest. He will refuse—and in doing so he is quite justified, and is, indeed, bound to do so—he will, I say, refuse the offices of the Church to any one not in communion with it. The same with the Dissenters. It is quite possible—it has happened, and might happen very frequently—that a Roman Catholic may be excommunicated by his Church, or a sectarian may be denounced and expelled by his congregation; but if that happens in this country, the individual in question who has been thus excommunicated, denounced, or expelled, is not a forlorn being. There is the Church, of which the Sovereign is the head, which does not acknowledge the principle of Dissent, and which dares not refuse to that individual those religious rites which are his privilege and consolation. I therefore hold that the connection between Church and State is really a guarantee for religious liberty and toleration; that it maintains, as it were, the standard of religious liberty and toleration just as much as we, by other means, sustain the standard of value. If you wish to break up a State, and destroy and disturb a country, you can never adopt a more effectual method for the purpose than by destroying, at the same time, the standards of value and of toleration.

Now, I would wish to make one or two observations on this question of disendowment. I consider that if the State seizes the property of a corporation, without alleging any cause, it is spoliation. But if the State alleges some penal cause for its violence, though it may be an unfounded, tyrannical, and oppressive one, then I understand the act of the State to be confiscation. I make that distinction between the two processes, and I think the House will find that there is something in it. I am not about to uphold the doctrine that there is no difference between corporate and private property. I acknowledge the difference fully and frankly. The State has relations with all property; but the relations of the State with private and with corporate property are of a different character. I would attempt to express them thus—The relations of the State to private property are the relations of a guardian. The relations of the State to corporate property are those of a trustee. The duty of a guardian to his ward is mainly to protect his ward. The duties of a trustee are of a more complicated character. Undoubtedly his first duty is to see that the intentions of the founder are fulfilled, as far as the varying circumstances of generations will permit. I will make the admission—for I wish to argue the case fairly—that unquestionably if he finds that the resources at his command are extravagantly beyond what are necessary for the object in view, or that the purpose of the trust is pernicious, it is his duty to consider by what means a re-distribution of those funds and of that property can be safely accomplished. But this I do lay down as a principle which I will maintain against all comers—that under no circumstances whatever ought a trustee to appropriate to himself property of which he is the fiduciary. If that were to be permitted there would be no security whatever for property of any description. A Minister of State might throw his eye upon a wealthy corporation, and say—"I will confiscate this property, and apply it to the partial discharge of the National Debt or the entire discharge of the floating debt." Or he might say—"Taxation is never very popular; the taxation of the country which I rule is, on the whole, founded on just principles; but there are great murmurs not only against taxes but also rates; I will confiscate the property of this corporation, and I shall consequently be enabled sensibly to relieve the country, and thus, of course, obtain a great increase of power and popularity." But if that course were pursued, I am certain that the tenure of no property would be safe, and the credit of the country must collapse.

Having made these observations with respect to private and corporate property, I would now ask permission to state the grounds why I am, on the whole, entirely opposed to confiscating the property of corporations; why I view it alike with dislike and suspicion. The reason, Sir, is that, in the first place, whatever may have been the origin of corporate property—whether the gift of the nation, which was rarely the case, or the donation of individuals, as was generally its source—one thing is clear, that it is from its use and purpose, essentially popular property—the property of the nation, though not of the State. The second reason why I dislike all confiscation of corporate property is that I find that no great act of confiscation was ever carried into effect without injurious consequences to the State in which it took place. Either—generally speaking—it has led to civil war or established, what in the long run is worse, a chronic disaffection for ages among the subjects of the Crown. But if there be any corporate property the confiscation of which I most dislike, it is Church property, and for these reasons—Church property is to a certain degree, an intellectual tenure; in a greater degree, a moral and spiritual tenure. It is the fluctuating patrimony of the great body of the people. It is, I will not say the only, but—even with our most developed civilization—it is the easiest method by which the sons of the middle and even of the working classes can become landed proprietors, and what is more, can become resident landed proprietors, and fulfil all the elevating duties incident to the position. But there is another reason why I am greatly opposed to the confiscation of Church property, and that is because I invariably observe that when Church property is confiscated, it is always given to the landed proprietors. Sir, I hope that in this House I shall not be accused of being opposed to the interests of those connected with the land of this country. I look upon landed tenure of this country as, on the whole, one of the most beneficial and most successful institutions that has been created out of the feudal system. It is a tenure that, by dispersing over the soil a number of residents deeply interested in it, has secured local government, which is the best safeguard of political liberty; and, on the other hand, it is a tenure which, while it has attained for us these great social and political advantages, has been consistent with making the soil of this country, on the whole, the most productive in the world—that is to say, not only in the Old World but in the New World you cannot find a tract of land of equal size with that of the United Kingdom which is so generally and so uniformly productive. Therefore, I think I am justified in saying that it is a tenure which, both on account of its social and political advantages, and the great material consequences it has secured to the country, may be truly described as one of the most advantageous. I have not the slightest objection myself to the landed proprietors of the country increasing their wealth and increasing their power, so long as they do it by legitimate means—by the improvement of their estates, or in the fulfilment of those duties which the Constitution of their country generously, but wisely, has assigned to them. Sir, we know very well that the landed interest of this country will have their position examined and challenged as every institution and class in this age will be; yet I believe that, for the reasons I have indicated, they will give a triumphant answer, and issue from that scrutiny with the approbation and sympathy of the great body of their countrymen. But I am sure of this, they cannot, especially in this age, and in the circumstances under which we live, take a more short-sighted course to increase their property and their influence than to have any hand in sacrilegious spoliation.

Now, Sir, having made these remarks on disestablishment and disendowment, I would ask the House to examine the mode in which the right hon. Gentleman intends to put this process into practice in Ireland; and to consider, the while, what may be the probable consequence of the course which he recommends. The Government of Ireland is not a strong Government; its sanctions are less valid than those of the Government of England. It has not the historic basis which the English Government has. It has not the tradition which the English Government rests upon. It does not depend upon that vast accumulation of manners and customs which in England are really more powerful than laws and statutes. The Government of Ireland is only comparatively strong from its connection with England; and the reason the Government of Ireland is a weak Government is, that a considerable portion of the inhabitants of Ireland are disorderly and discontented. Now, I will not go at this part of my observations into an investigation of the causes, alleged or real, of Irish discontent. They are like Martial's Epigrams, some are just, some unjust, some are well founded, some fantastical, some are true, some false. But no one will deny that discontent exists; and I think no man will deny this also—I am speaking to both sides of the House, with candour to all parties—no one will deny that among the causes—I do not say the only or the chief, or anything of the kind—but I say all will agree that among the causes of Irish discontent is this, that a powerful clergy, exercising their influence over numerous congregations, have no connection with the State. Well, Sir, what is the policy of the right hon. Gentleman? "Ireland is discontented—one of the causes of its discontent is that a Church is not connected with the State; I will regenerate the country, and I will have three Churches not connected with the State."

Mr. Disraeli

What must be the consequence of such a policy?

There is another point to which I would draw attention. Whatever be the sanguine expectations of hon. Gentlemen opposite as to the consequences of this measure if we pass it, I think they will agree that of itself it is not sufficient to terminate discontent in Ireland. There are other measures of equal importance, or even much greater importance, that are already mentioned in political circles of authority. Even the Prime Minister has not only acknowledged that the question of the land of Ireland is one of immense importance that must be attended to, but he has, I believe, pledged himself to take it in hand; at any rate, some of his Colleagues, before they were his Colleagues, have left in memorable and burning sentences what they consider the best plan for at least the partial remedy of this deep-rooted grievance of Ireland. I am, therefore, right in saying that when this measure is passed, if it do pass, we must still be prepared to encounter Irish discontent. That is a conclusion in which all sides agree. Well, now, Sir, have we a better chance of encountering Irish discontent when three Churches are disconnected with the State than when we have only one? How will it probably work? There will be great discontent in Ireland; and, whenever there is great discontent in Ireland, the Church that is not connected with the State always supplies a body of learned, disciplined, and eloquent men who are the exponents of that discontent. Well, you will then have discontent in Ireland, and you will have three bodies of learned, organized, and eloquent men who will only be doing their duty to their congregations by being the exponents of this great disaffection. It is not a wild assumption on my part, if I were to suppose that with the cause of the next great Irish discontent the land may be in some degree connected; and what will be the necessary and natural feelings of the three Churches on the land question? Sir, I do not, as some do—I do not myself contemplate the immediate cessation of all dogmatic differences between the three Churches. I am in hopes that year after year any asperity of this kind arising from such a source may be softened; but I think I may venture to say this — that there will be one dogma in which the three Churches will entirely agree; which will be as unanimously adopted as any that may be sanctioned by any impending ecumenical council; and that dogma will be this—that the clergy of the three Churches, whether they were disendowed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth or in the reign of Queen Victoria, have all been equally ill-treated. And where there is this general discontent upon the land question, they will naturally say—"We entirely agree with the feeling of the nation; the land question is a question that must be settled." They will say—"The people have lost the great estate which belonged to the Church as their trustees, and where it is neither the clergy who were disendowed in the reign of Elizabeth, nor the clergy disendowed in the reign of Queen Victoria, will be able to tell you." Therefore, I have not the slightest doubt myself that the general discontent prevailing, from the City of the Tribes to the capital of the linen manufacture, will find learned, earnest, and eloquent exponents of the wrongs of the country, without any reference to differences in religious creed. The land question will assume many forms with one purpose. The multiplied demand will be irresistible unless we meet it with an alternative, and what that alternative is I will notice subsequently. Such, Sir, in my mind, are the probable—I will not say immediate—consequences; but consequences that will occur in the early experience of many men who sit in this House of the policy of disestablishment in Ireland, as it is advised by the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister. And, Sir, such are the prospects which disestablishment affords us of rendering a people contented and a Government strong.

Well now, Sir, disestablishment offering a prospect of so ambiguous and unpromising a character, let us see how the right hon. Gentleman intends to act in regard to disendowment. The right hon. Gentleman proposes to deprive the Protestant Church in Ireland of its property. The natural question that immediately arises is—Why? Does anybody claim the property? Nobody claims it. Does the right hon. Gentleman believe that any other Church would use the property with more advantage? Certainly not, for he does not propose to give it to any other Church. Is the tenure of the property of the Church unsatisfactory and feeble? Quite the reverse. It is the strongest tenure in the country, and it does not merely depend on the Act of Settlement, as the estates of most gentlemen do, because it has a prescription of three centuries. One is naturally and necessarily anxious to know, under these circumstances—when no one asks for the property, when the right hon. Gentleman does not pretend that any other Church would carry out the intentions of the founders better than the Protestant Church, and when he does not deny that the tenure of the Protestant Church is a complete and powerful tenure—why he deprives it of its property? That, I submit, is a natural question to ask, and it is one on which we ought to have a satisfactory answer. So far as I could collect from the right hon. Gentleman's speech, to which I listened with unbroken interest and attention, the reason why he deprives the Protestant Church in Ireland of its property is, that the feelings of the Roman Catholics in Ireland are hurt by the Protestants having endowments, although the Roman Catholic Church wishes to depend on voluntary contributions, and although they are clearly of opinion that, because the Protestant Church is endowed, is the reason why the Protestant Church in Ireland is a comparative failure. I must say that this is the most extraordinary reason that has ever yet been adduced by a Minister for a great act of confiscation, and it becomes the House well and narrowly to consider it. It is an entirely new principle to take away the property of one corporation, because there is another body—to which he does not propose to give it—jealous of that corporation having the property. This, let me remind the House, is not only a new principle, but a new principle which may be applied to all kinds of property, and for this reason, because it has no peculiar reference to corporate property. It does not touch any of the attributes of corporate property, whether good or evil. The right hon. Gentleman, as the representative of the State—the great trustee in this matter—confesses that the property of the Protestant Church in Ireland is not greater than its needs. He professes that the provisions for the management of that property are not only good, but excellent and admirable. The right hon. Gentleman does not, for a moment, pretend that he has any other body in his eye that can carry out the intention of the original founder or donor better than the body whose property he is going to confiscate. It is not in his character as a fiduciary, or with reference to corporate property particularly, that this rule is laid down. It is a new principle that may be applied to private property to-morrow. It is the principle of forfeiture without a pretext. So far I ought indeed to correct myself. It is a new principle since we have had a settled Constitution, and since we came to live under the laws of progressive civilization. Otherwise it is an old principle enough, because it is the principle of tyranny and oppression in the darkest ages. But now see in what inscrutable mischief we may be landed if this principle is sanctioned. It cannot be confined to corporate property, because it has no affinity to corporate property. Apply it to private property. We are so used now to plundering churches that the moment a corporation is known to be in possession of a large property an hon. Member gives notice of his intention to bring the subject before the House. The fact is that our eyes are shut to the enormity of the circumstances when they are tested by objects with which we are daily familiar. Therefore, let us try this principle, which is an open principle, and not peculiar to corporations and apply it to private property.

I will ask the attention of the House to this part of the subject. In Ireland there are many estates—many large and many rich estates, and they belong, most of them, to Irish gentlemen. There are also many Irish gentlemen in Ireland, amiable and accomplished men, the most agreeable companions in the world, who have not large estates, and some of whom have no estates at all. After the announcement by the right hon. Gentleman of this startling principle of sheer forfeiture without the application to the property of any other machinery to carry out the intentions of the founders—after the proclamation by the right hon. Gentleman of this astounding principle

—what will be the natural course of an Irish gentleman in the position I have described? [A laugh.] His argument would be this—it is a very serious matter for hon. Members, and it is only by proceeding in this way that you can test the validity of the principle—his argument would be this—The Irish gentlemen in the unfortunate position which just now excited the laughter of the House, would attend upon the Minister and say this—“We find ourselves in an anomalous position. Our breeding is not inferior to that of our habitual companions; our education is the same; our pursuits are similar; we meet in the same hunting field; we drink the same claret; we stand opposite to each other in the same dance; and our feelings are hurt by some of our companions having estates of £6,000, or £8,000, or £10,000 a year, with broad acres and extensive woods. We know well the spirit of the age, that the sentiment of selfishness is not to be tolerated. We do not ask for the estates of our more fortunate companions. All we ask is that you will take their estates away from them and establish, as one of the great principles of Irish regeneration, social equality; and let all Irish gentlemen, like the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, live upon voluntary contributions.” And yet this is the great principle which I am told, several hon. Gentlemen opposite have pledged themselves to support, and that without even being acquainted with it. I do not wish to press the case; I believe the parallel to be a sound one, and I am sure that great changes in the relations of property must follow from the success of the right hon. Gentleman’s propositions. Still it may be said there is a distinction between corporate and private property, and therefore you press the case too much in the instance you have given. I do not think so. I have well considered the principle which the right hon. Gentleman has brought forward. I believe it is not peculiar to corporate property, and that gentlemen who have private property will do well to consider whether it does not touch their case. But I am willing to apply it to corporate property. I speak in the capital of an ancient nation, remarkable above all the nations of the world for its rich endowments. Charity in its most gracious, most learned, and most humane form, has established institutions in this country to soften the asperities of existence. There are three great hospitals alone in this city endowed with estates which would permit them to rank with some of the wealthiest of our peers. Their united revenues alone considerably exceed £100,000. The House knows well these great establishments — St. Bartholomew's, St. Thomas's, and Guy's. But there are other hospitals in the country, where the physicians are not less celebrated, the surgeons not less skilful, the staff not less devoted, and which give all their energies, thought, learning, and life to mitigate the sufferings of humanity. Well, I say, would it not, according to the new views and the new principle, be as painful as the existence of an Endowed Protestant Church is to the Roman Catholic hierarchy in Ireland, for these eminent physicians and surgeons and their devoted staff to feel that their greatest efforts were often unable to accomplish all that they desired, and that their position as a voluntary body sometimes entailed upon them humiliation? Why should not the Minister come forward in a like spirit with that which now seems to inspire his policy, and concede to these gentlemen that the painful anomaly should be terminated, and that St. George's Hospital, Middlesex Hospital, University College Hospital, and, perhaps, Westminster Hospital, all depending upon voluntary contributions, should be placed on a footing of equality with those great institutions which, by their endowments, imparted to those connected with them a factitious importance in the profession, by the process of depriving these latter of their estates? Well, there might, no doubt, a good deal be said in favour of that view. The Minister would have £120,000 a year to dispose of, and he could in the handsomest manner give it to the farmers of England towards the reduction of the county rates. And I ask you seriously, if you are to adopt these principles for Ireland, is it possible that you should not apply them also to England? As I proceed with my comments on this Bill we shall have some further opportunity of considering this question. There still are English Members with some influence in this House, and I hope they will consider on both sides of the House the position in which they will be placed with reference to this question. They are asked to make ducks and drakes of millions in Ireland, to assist persons who have only to meet the same duties and difficulties experienced in this country.

And now let us see how the right hon. Gentleman proposes to apply the power which you are going to concede to him of depriving the Church of Ireland of its property, and that on no plea whatever. Now, it is a very curious part of the measure to which I am about to call attention. Disendowment in itself, is not a complicated transaction. If a Government is strong, if a Prince has the power, it is remarkable with what facility he can disendow his subjects of all their possessions; and so a Minister, if he has a majority in Parliament, may disendow any corporation to-morrow. But when you have disendowed, if you have any regard not merely for principles of law, but also for the principles of a high policy, you offer some scheme in return by which the original intentions of the endowers may be fulfilled. In performing an office of that kind the difficulties of a Minister would not be great. For instance, there is the disendowment of the Episcopal Church of Scotland, which is often referred to in discussions and in speeches having reference to the policy of the right hon. Gentleman. There the course was very simple. The Government of that day determined to take away the property from the Episcopal Church of Scotland, and to give it to another body. A very short Act of Parliament did the business—it will be found among the Scotch Acts and is, probably, in the Library. By this it was declared that the property hitherto enjoyed by the Episcopal body, its manse, and churches, and tithes, should in future belong to, and that the duties should be performed by, the Presbyterian body, and the Act created a roving Commission to carry that piece of legislation into effect. In those days no great difficulty was experienced in such a transfer. But that is not the position of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman, stepping out of his duties as the great fiduciary of the State, has made up his mind to confiscate the property of the Irish Protestant Church, but he has not made up his mind to give that property to any other body that could fulfil the intention of the original foundation. And therefore this has occurred to the measure of the right hon. Gentleman—one of the most remarkable results ever brought about by a Minister. Coming forward entirely to plunder the Irish Protestant Church, he finds that the only way in which he can accomplish his purpose is to ask the Irish Protestant Church to co-operate with him. This is the most notable part of this extraordinary measure. If the Irish Protestant Church does not co-operate with the right hon. Gentleman to carry out his policy he will be placed in a most difficult position. By his Bill he has confiscated the whole property of the Church; he will have on his hands some morning 1,500 churches, an immense number of glebe houses, property without end, and a very complicated trust to fulfil. Plainly, therefore, the Irish Protestant Church, if his plan is to succeed, must co-operate with him in carrying into effect all the details of his policy. I do not deny that the right hon. Gentleman may have a purpose so patriotic that it might so strike the Irish Protestant Church that it was desirable for them to sympathize with his appeal and say—"The blow, no doubt, is very great; but still, if it be as you say, absolutely necessary for the tranquillity of the country, for the advancement of good government, and for the general welfare of Her Majesty and her dominions that we should bear this legislation we will endeavour to do so." I can conceive a Minister making such an appeal, and I can conceive a great body answering in such a spirit, because I give Ministers and corporate bodies credit—which some people do not—for patriotic and enlightened feeling. But a Minister appealing to such a body, under such circumstances, would at least make the appeal in a most conciliatory manner, and would frame his propositions in a way calculated to soothe their feelings, and, as far as circumstances would admit, to respect their interests.

Now, how does the right hon. Gentleman act, and what are the terms which he offers to the Irish Protestant Church to induce them to co-operate with him to consummate his confiscation? As inducements, he makes them four propositions. The first is that the vested interests of every individual shall be respected. Well, I say that goes for nothing. There is no combination of circumstances under which at this moment any Prime Minister, in this country, proposing a confiscation of property—could hope to carry this without at the same time accompanying it with security for vested interests. You would outrage the feelings of Parliament and the conscience of the country by adopting any any other course. Respect for vested interests are the common-places of confiscation. I therefore pass them by. We come to the next proposition. The right hon. Gentleman offers the Church of Ireland, by a means to which I shall afterwards refer, and which I need not dwell upon now—he offers to those whom he is about to plunder—the possession of their churches on the condition that they undertake to keep them in repair. At least I understood from the right hon. Gentleman that such was the case. There is a variance sometimes between the Bill and the right hon. Gentleman's statement, as often occurs in these matters, and some confusion may therefore arise in attributing to the Bill what was in his speech. But I believe I am correct in saying that, according to the speech, they are to have possession of the churches.

MR. GLADSTONE: On a declaration of their intention to keep them in repair.

MR. DISRAELI: Yes, but what is a declaration of intention? I really do not know. It may be a deed sealed, signed, and delivered, and may involve engagements of the highest character and consequences. However, I do not want to split words with the right hon. Gentleman. There is no doubt about this—the Irish Church are offered the possession of their churches on condition of making a declaration of their intention to maintain them. But is that any great concession? By this policy the right hon. Gentleman will find himself one fine morning in possession of 1,500 churches at least. Somebody must keep them in repair. Even the Liberation Society would not tolerate that the churches should be allowed to tumble down. "You must keep the fabrics in order," they would say, "or you must raze them to the ground. We must not allow such a scandal through Christendom as that one of the kingdoms of Her Majesty is covered with sacred edifices tumbling to pieces, and that the aspect of regenerated Ireland is that of a general ruin." I say, then, that the right hon. Gentleman who will have these 1,500 churches to keep up, ought to be, as a prudent man, very glad if he can find any persons who would take a certain quantity off his hands. I can hardly believe that among his inducements to the Irish Church to co-operate with him in accomplishing its total confiscation the offer of their churches is—I will not use a coarse word—an inducement of a paramount character. And therefore I think we can hardly look upon it as a consideration valid enough to secure this extraordinary aid and union. There is a third offer; and here, again, there is a greater difference between the statement and the Bill. I am sincerely anxious not to misrepresent anything, and I shall state what I believe to be the true proposal. The Irish Church, or those who will represent it, are, as I understand, to retain the glebe houses, provided they discharge the debt upon them, which is so great as to make these houses unmarketable. Well, that proposition does not appear to me to be invested with those glowing colours which ought to induce the Archbishops, Bishops, deans, and clergy of Ireland to co-operate with the right hon. Gentleman in what I shall show you is a scheme of entire and complete confiscation. Then there is a fourth proposition, respecting which, it appears to me, that there is a very considerable misconception, and that is the appointment of a Commission for the benefit of those gentlemen who are possessed of vested interests. The object of that Commission, we are told, is to enable the clergy to capitalize their vested interests, which will then become the trust property of a certain body, to which I shall afterwards have to advert. It is estimated that the interests thus capitalized would be certainly not less than £6,000,000—some say it would be much more; but that includes two small items which, strictly speaking, are not vested interests, and, therefore, I will not dwell upon them. But I suppose there is no doubt that the capitalization of those vested interests, if all the incumbents would agree to capitalize them, would produce a sum of £6,000,000, and a great many people are under the impression that the Irish Protestant Church would thus be left with an endowment of £6,000,000. Sir, that is a great misconception. I do not mean to say it is a misconception of the right hon. Gentleman; far from that. It is a misconception which people who do not trouble themselves with details, and are captivated with fine statements, lightly run away with. But the fact is, it is a delusion. Now, in the first place, is it the interest of the incumbents to capitalize their vested interests? These vested interests will be secure, if anything can be secure in these days of spoliation. They will be secure by the engagements of the Government, and they ought to be paid with the punctuality and the precision of the dividends. Why, therefore, should the person who possesses and enjoys a vested interest come and exchange it for a security of less value?—for the security of an unknown body cannot be equal to the security of the Government. But there is another reason why I doubt whether the possessors of vested interests will be apt to capitalize them, because, even if they considered the security of this new body were equal to that of the Government, or, from an esprit de corps, were willing to accept an inferior security, must they not feel that they have no security whatever that these £6,000,000 put into the hands of this unknown body may not be confiscated? No one can suppose, after such a rude shock to public credit and to national feeling, as the confiscation of any corporation in Ireland must produce, no one can suppose that the 2,200 incumbents and Bishops would come, and at once make a new fund, which, after all, is tainted by having originated from the old confiscated fund, and which, in a moment of political passion, may be considered to have retained all its odious characteristics, and therefore to be worthy of confiscation. Having, therefore, given some reasons why incumbents will not capitalize their vested interests, I want it to be clearly understood that, even if their vested interests are capitalized, no permanent endowment can grow from that capitalization. That appears to me to be perfectly clear. It is a point of the utmost importance, and I mention it now in order that it may be well discussed in Committee. I do not see how any permanent endowment can accrue. As the body to which I shall have afterwards to refer is in the position of an insurance company—if it gain on one life it may lose on another; but on the average there are 2,000 clergymen, and when all the lives have terminated, and all the vested interests come to an end, it will be found that the debtor and creditor account will be pretty nearly balanced. Therefore, I cannot believe that those who are possessed of vested interests will take advantage of this proposition, and if they do I want to impress on the House—for there are many hon. Gentlemen on the Liberal side who do not wish for confiscation—I want to impress on the House that no permanent endowment can accrue from the scheme. That is the main conclusion which ought to be borne in mind, and which, I trust, will be borne in mind in this debate.

Now, Sir, I have shown the House that the right hon. Gentleman is in an extraordinary position, and it will require all his genius to get him out of it. He comes forward as a great confiscator, and then he finds that he cannot accomplish the act of spoliation without the cordial co-operation of those whom he is going to rob. It did require the fervent spirit of the First Minister of the Crown to have devised such a scheme; and, whatever the result, I think its ingenuity is really an honour to the British Parliament. I have shown that, having devised the scheme, he has offered four inducements to the Irish Protestant Church to co-operate with him, and I have also shown that the four inducements are utterly futile. For the sake of time, I will not recapitulate what they are, because I am quite sure they must be in the mind and memory of every hon. Member. Well, but is there anything else in the Bill which might justify the Irish Church, however disappointed, to this act of supernatural patriotism? The manner in which the Roman Catholic Church is treated in this Bill as regards the College of Maynooth—is that an inducement to the Irish Protestant Church to co-operate in its own spoliation?

Now, in making any comments upon

Maynooth I am anxious not to be misunderstood. If this measure is to be carried, or any measure of the kind, I cannot consider the case of Maynooth with any prejudices arising from the objects for which the endowment was made. I only view the case of Maynooth as I view that of any person disturbed and distressed by a Bill of this kind. If the safety of the State does require measures of this kind, I say that the interests you deal with should be dealt with justly, and in the highest sense liberally. That is the principle I would lay down, and I could make no exception of course of Maynooth. Therefore, if I make any comments as to the arrangements proposed with regard to Maynooth, it is not because Maynooth is concerned that I make them, but because there is exceptional treatment in this as in other instances, and because it does not appear to me that equal justice is meted out. I will not touch upon the point upon which an hon. Baronet (Sir George Jenkinson) addressed a Question to the right hon. Gentleman this evening. I think the hon. Baronet was quite entitled to put that Question, because I know that men of the highest authority think that part of the scheme founded on principles of the most ambiguous nature. I willingly accept the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, although it was an explanation which, as far as justice was concerned, was not altogether satisfactory. But I do not dwell upon that. I apprehend that, when we come to consider this question, the life interests, whether Roman Catholic or Protestant, ought to be estimated and appraised on the same principles. But, Sir, in the arrangement with respect to Maynooth—and that arrangement is one of those which are to induce the Irish Protestant Church to co-operate with Ministers—there are circumstances which appear to me to be of an invidious character. Now, we shall assume for a moment that the same number of years are taken in calculating vested interests, both Protestant and Roman Catholic. But in the case of Maynooth the vested interests, on no pretence whatever, could be estimated at fourteen or even seven years' purchase. You have applied to all the students of the College, so far as I can understand the scheme of the Government, the same principles which, according to the version given by the right hon. Gentleman this evening, are applied to those who enjoy vested interests in the Protestant Church. Now, Sir, that is not just. The position of a student or scholar at Maynooth is not analogous in any degree to that of an incumbent in the Irish Church. The right hon. Gentleman talked of the vested interests of the Professors. No one grudges the vested interests of the Professors. They are entitled to the full and liberal appreciation of their vested interests; but we have the best evidence of what the amount of the vested interests of the Professors is. I was in the House when Sir Robert Peel brought forward the Maynooth Endowment, and I remember the particular impression that was made on the House as he proceeded, but not in detail, to propose the amount of salaries to be given to the chief officers of Maynooth. For reasons which are obvious he said that he should propose for that purpose an endowment of £6,000 a year. Now, therefore, we know that the vested interests of the Professors, on which the right hon. Gentleman enlarged, must be calculated on the basis of an endowment of £6,000 a year, and with those figures I confess I never could arrive at the results to which the right hon. Gentleman has come. Now, Sir, are there any other reasons with regard to Maynooth which should also make the Irish Protestant Church refrain from accepting the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman? I think that such reasons may be found in the source from which the right hon. Gentleman has acknowledged, not only in his speech, but in his Bill, that the compensation for the College of Maynooth is to be derived. This appears to me to be a subject of great seriousness, and one on which the right hon. Gentleman owes an explanation to the House. If there was anything which we understood from the debates of last Session, and from the speeches of last autumn—if there was anything which was more clearly understood than another from the fervid declarations made on the impassioned hustings of Lancashire, it was this, that although the Protestant Church of Ireland was to be plundered, none of its property was to be given to the ministers of any other religion, and none of its property was to be applied to

Imperial purposes. These were the reiterated pledges given to the country; and upon the understanding of those and of similar declarations, no doubt, the vote of the country was taken. Well, Sir, are those pledges redeemed by the measure before us? Is that double engagement of the Prime Minister fulfilled? I put it to the candour of both sides of the House. I have referred to the debates of the last Session of Parliament, and to the declarations made from the hustings of Lancashire last autumn; but, Sir, I need not have revived any painful memories, I might have appealed to the Preamble of the right hon. Gentleman's own Bill. In the Preamble it is said that it is expedient to do several things—that the Irish Church should cease to be established by law, that the proceeds of the property of the said Church, after satisfying all just and equitable claims, should be held and applied for the advantage of the Irish people, but not for the maintenance of any Church, or of the clergy of any other communion, nor for "the teaching of religion." Why, Sir, that is the Preamble of the Bill. One would have supposed that the arrangement was made after the Bill had been drawn, and that by some inadvertence—nobody attends to a Preamble—the original Preamble was allowed to remain. It must be the Preamble of the first Cabinet Council—it cannot be that of the last. But how stands the case as regards the fulfilment of the pledges that all the property of the Irish Protestant Church should be devoted to Irish, and not to Imperial purposes? Maynooth is supported at this moment by the Exchequer of the Empire. The Regium Donum is supplied from Downing Street. But now they are both to be supplied by the confiscation of property which, whether it be Roman Catholic or Protestant property originally—I do not now go into questions of that kind—both Roman Catholic and Protestant must agree with me is Irish property, and to that amount the Imperial Exchequer is to be relieved, in the face of pledges which all must acknowledge were repeatedly and solemnly given, and under which no such result could have been contemplated.

Now, let us see what may be the general result on the state of the Pro-

testant Church when this measure is carried to completion; because, however unnatural, however impossible it may seem that the Church of Ireland should co-operate with the right hon. Gentleman, we cannot discuss the merits of this measure unless, as we proceed with it, we assume that the Church will, however unwillingly, co-operate with him. Assuming then, that they will co-operate with him—assuming that his plan is carried, let us glance at what in a few years will be the position of the Protestant Church in Ireland. And I put this before hon. Gentlemen on either side of the House convinced that, in respect to a great measure of this kind, they must be impressed with the wisdom of acting with generosity as well as justice. Now, it is quite on the cards—it is not only possible, but highly probable—that in a certain number of years, probably in the ten years which the right hon. Gentleman fixes upon, the Irish Protestant Church will not have a shilling of property; while they will see, on the other hand, a richly endowed Roman Catholic clergy and a very comfortable Presbyterian body, and both provided for out of their own property! Well, is it desirable that such results, not of severe justice, but I say of unnecessary injustice, should be accomplished by Parliament? It is very true that it is said there is the sum of £500,000 which will go to the Irish Church in satisfaction of the private endowments created since 1660. I do not touch now on what I thought the highly unsatisfactory part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, fixing on the year 1660; for, in criticizing this measure, with the great indulgence of the House, I must, of course, omit many points. But the interest on that £500,000—which is by no means clear to me will be £500,000, though I will take it as £500,000—the interest of that sum would not keep in repair the churches of which we have heard so much. If they are to undertake the repair of those churches, there must be a fund for the purpose, and £16,000 or £17,000 a year would be absorbed in that way. Well, what else have they got? What is most extraordinary, the right hon. Gentleman has absolutely proposed that £20,000 a year for ten years, or £200,000 in all, should be given to the body of Church Commissioners in Dublin who are to manage this great transaction. Why, will not the New Church Body have as large a task to fulfil, which will probably cost them £10,000 a year, or it may be £20,000?—for if they do their work completely, it can hardly be less expensive than that of the Church Commissioners. There must be funds to create and organize that new ecclesiastical world to which the right hon. Gentleman looks as the means of accomplishing his purpose.

So much for the general result upon the condition of the Irish Protestant Church; but I wish now to place before the House the general result of the whole scheme of confiscation. And what is it? It is the old story. Assuming—which I will do for the sake of argument—that the good sense and good temper of the House will modify all the arrangements about Maynooth, will take care that justice, ample justice, shall be done to that institution, but at the same time no injustice done to the Protestant Church, and that the engagements of the Ministry shall be completely fulfilled in that respect—assuming that to be the case, what do I see in this Bill? Why, that the whole property of the Church of Ireland, generally speaking, will go to the landlords. Well, the landlords of Ireland have had a slice of that property before. For thirty years they have had £100,000 a year. They have probably had £3,000,000 of that property, and what good has it done them? Is the state of Ireland more tranquil and serene, or have they better preserved the institutions to which they were devoted, because they for a moment accepted any share of that plunder? Why, we all know that nothing of the kind has followed. And what is it that is now proposed? Why, a scheme which, when we come to investigate it, clearly shows that the whole of the tithe rent-charge is to be absorbed in the land. The right hon. Gentleman says that every landowner may buy up the tithe rent-charge on his land, when his tithe rent-charge will be instantly absorbed in his land; and then if the landowner will not buy the tithe rent-charge the right hon. Gentleman makes out a compulsory account by which the landowner shall seem to buy it. But the result is that the whole of the tithe rent-charge will be immediately absorbed in the land, and that there will be a complicated system of pecuniary transactions extending over a period of forty-five years. Five-and-forty years' engagements of Irish landlords! And that, too, in a country which confiscates Church property—in a country where there is a land question looming in the future. Do you not think that the landlords will want justice done to the land? Do you not think they will come forward and say—"Well, if the land question must be settled, we will take a part in its settlement?" Depend upon it when the great rising occurs—when the great demand to which I have referred is made, and expounded by the eloquence and learning of the clergy of the three Churches—the Irish landlords will wonderfully sympathize with that new Act of Settlement. And when that demand is made, the right hon. Gentleman will have either to accede to it, or he must take refuge in the alternative, which I will in a moment mention. Well, the tithe rent-charge is to be absorbed in the land, with engagements spreading over forty-five years. There have been engagements with the English Exchequer for shorter terms which were never fulfilled. And what is to be done with the surplus? The surplus is given to the maintenance of pauper lunatics and other purposes of that kind. Well, but there are pauper lunatics in other countries besides Ireland. I have been looking into the number of pauper lunatics in Ireland and in England; and although we are told, as a Cabinet secret, that there are idiots peculiar to Ireland, I do not find that the number of pauper lunatics in Ireland is greater, relatively to the amount of population, than in England, or that in Ireland they cost more in proportion than they do here. English county Members generally are able to speak on this point. In my own county of Buckingham we have built within a very few years a lunatic asylum upon a costly scale. We did it in deference to the commands of an Act of Parliament, and it has added considerably to our rates. It may have been a necessary and proper expenditure, but it was a very costly one. We have not yet fulfilled all our engagements in respect to it, and this has been one of those subjects which have occasioned considerable dissatisfaction among the great body of the population. No doubt the object is a proper one; but how can you justify yourself to your constituents who are grumbling about the county rates, especially supposing that you should have to pay £3,000 next quarter sessions, if they say, "We understand that the Prime Minister, who affects to be the friend of the land, so far as Ireland is concerned, is going to have pauper lunatics paid for out of the Church funds? Now, if the Irish Church is to be confiscated, and the funds applied in this way, why should not our pauper lunatics have the same sort of support?" Sir, whatever is given for the maintenance of pauper lunatics or any object of that kind, will go, or at least the great bulk of it will go, to the proprietors of the soil, whatever hocus pocus we may be told to the contrary. I entirely disapprove of that.

There is another subject to which at this hour I shall only very briefly advert. I will now assume that, notwithstanding the apparent impossibility of the Irish Church being induced to co-operate with the right hon. Gentleman, notwithstanding the unjust, and, as I think, preposterous arrangement which, if they did co-operate with him, they would assist in accomplishing—I will for the moment assume that this body will so co-operate with him, and will endeavour to carry out the purposes of this Bill; and therefore it is necessary to consider how the New Church Body is to be created. Consider the possibility of the thing. There are 700,000 Protestants scattered over Ireland. Sometimes they form a tolerably adequate portion of the population, but often a very sparse one. Although alarmed and aggrieved and smarting under what they consider intolerable injuries, and many of them under the influence of great fear, they are suddenly called upon by the Prime Minister of the country to accomplish that which would require all his ingenuity and all his statesmanlike power to achieve—namely, to create a new ecclesiastical power independent of the State which shall accomplish all those offices which the Church in union with the State, and with its admirable temper when assisted by the State, has found it extremely difficult to fulfil and agree about. And this is to be done in the course of a few months. The clergy and the laity—the plundered and perplexed clergy and laity—are to do that which would require constant Cabinet Councils, and even years of mature and experienced deliberation. Who are the clergy and laity of Ireland? How are you to call the voices of these 700,000 scattered people? We are often told about the case of the disendowment of the Church in Canada—an absurd instance to bring forward, as there is no analogy between the two cases. In Canada, indeed, you did say that the clergy and laity were to come to some decision on these important points, but then you defined the laity. In your Act you said that the laity should be represented, and you stated by what franchise the laity were to be elected. But nothing of the kind is proposed to be done now. No single step is taken to assist these men if they were willing to overcome the immense difficulties and obstacles which they must inevitably encounter. What is to be the result if they do not do that which no human being under such circumstances can do? Why the State is to seize upon the whole property of the Church thus violating the first duty of a trustee, and shaking confidence in the tenure of property of every kind in the country. The State is to take the whole property of the Church to itself, and to do what it likes with it, defying law and justice, and treating the claims of the Protestants of Ireland with the utmost contumely and contempt.

Now, Sir, this is to be the remedial policy for Ireland. You have been disturbed and distracted by a clergy not connected with the State, and therefore you are now to have three sets of clergy not connected with the State. You have complained over and over again that one of the great evils of Ireland was the want of a variety of classes. But here is an Act which destroys a class. You have told us, night after night, that the curse of Ireland was the want of resident proprietors, but here is legislation to do away with a great number of resident proprietors. The curse of Ireland, as every one knows, is its poverty, and here is an Act to confiscate property!

Sir, I said there was an alternative. When I ventured to express to the House the probable consequences of this scheme of the right hon. Gentleman, I stated to the House that they must contemplate the possibility of great and continued discontent in Ireland—that that discontent would be connected with the question of the tenure of land—that the clergy disendowed according to their own statements at different periods, but both of them agreeing that they had been disendowed, would become the natural and powerful mouthpieces of this general discontent; and that you would have to yield to the demands which the whole nation through its most powerful organs would advance, and with which demands I venture to say the Irish landlords would unite. Their claim would be for restoration. All classes would call upon you to restore the popular estate which you have confiscated, and, whatever difference of opinion might still subsist between different Churches all Churches would agree that Irish property was national property. I say, then, that you would have to consent to that restoration unless you took refuge in an alternative. I think the alternative would be this. I think you might resist what was called a restoration of their rights, and which would probably bring about a scene of universal tumult. Instead of complying with this demand you would say to them—"There shall be religious equality between the two countries. You disendowed clergy shall not have ground to complain of being treated differently from any clergy, and we will apply to the Church in England the same principles which we have applied to the Church in Ireland." That conclusion appears to me to be inevitable. I have no doubt that there are some Gentlemen who hear me who would not regret such a consummation. I am perfectly aware that there are Gentlemen sitting in this House who approve such a policy, and that they have in the country a party which likewise approves such a policy. But I do not approve such a policy, and I am sure, whatever may be the majority those Gentlemen have in this House, they will not grudge me the right of asserting the propriety of my opinion. Sir, I believe that that result will be inevitable. Indeed, it may be inferred from the language of the Prime Minister that he himself, though he may not now approve, still contemplates it. Now, I cannot believe that the disendowment of the Church of England could occur without very great disturbance. I am convinced that it might lead to consequences which those who have not given a very long consideration to the subject may think impossible or remote. I believe that these consequences would be near at hand. England cannot afford revolutions. England has had her revolutions. It is indeed because she had revolutions about 200 years ago, before other nations had their revolutions, that she gained her great start in wealth and empire. Now, Sir, what have we obtained by those revolutions? A period of nearly 200 years of great serenity and the secured stability of the State. I attribute these happy characteristics of our history to this circumstance, that in this interval we did solve two of the finest and profoundest political problems. We accomplished complete personal and, in time, complete political liberty, and combined them with order. We achieved complete religious liberty, and we united it with a national faith. These two immense exploits have won for this country regulated freedom and temperate religion, and these blessings we have I am bound to say, secured mainly by the action—sometimes the unconscious action—but entirely by the action of the two great political parties in the State. I have often, when I have had to consider the history of what are called “Whigs” and “Tories,” been surprised that, after great national vicissitudes, and notwithstanding the enormous blunders and mistakes which confessedly both have made, and the occasional violence, not to say faction, of their conduct which our annals record, these two great parties should always re-appear. That fact proves that there must be something very deep in their roots, and that they must have touched the heart of the people. Speaking now, not as a partizan, I believe the Tory party, however it may at times have erred, has always been the friend of local government, and that the instinct of the nation made it feel that on local government political freedom depended. It has been the glorious privilege of the great Whig party to achieve religious liberty, because, by as wise an instinct, they felt that religious liberty must be based on the connection between civil authority and ecclesiastical influence. These have secured to us the advantages we enjoy. In this age we seem to have forgotten by what heroic efforts the great blessings of regulated freedom and temperate religion have been secured, and how much they have tended to the greatness and the glory of our common country. Custom has made this a strong and tradition has made it a wise nation. There are now highflying statesmen who make war on tradition and scorn custom. I, for one, will not take upon myself the responsibility of their courses. I have expressed fully, but freely, as our political life permits, my view of the policy of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. I believe the Bill he has introduced for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church in Ireland to be a dangerous measure, and, what is more, a great mistake; and I leave its consideration with confidence to the prudence and patriotism of Parliament.

MR. W. H. GREGORY said, that no one who had listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman could fail to have perceived that, to use the words of the Bishop of Down and Connor, quoted in The Times that morning, “the verdict of the country had cast its shadow over the path,” and that continued resistance to the measure before them could have no other effect than to broaden and lengthen that shadow. There were many in the House who remembered the speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman some twenty years ago, in which he denounced the Irish Establishment as one of the main grievances of Ireland. He had since characterized that speech as “heedless rhetoric;” but those who heard it would contrast the vigour and earnestness and conviction, when the right hon. Gentleman was before his time, with the laboured triviality of his present speech, when he knew well he was lagging behind the age. If he judged the right hon. Gentleman aright he would prefer that the verdict of posterity as to his sagacity as a statesman should be based on the “heedless rhetoric” of twenty-five years ago, rather than on the solemn convictions he had delivered that evening. Now, before joining issue with the right hon. Gentleman on other points, he (Mr. Gregory) was glad that there seemed one topic of agreement between them. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the irritation of all three Churches in Ireland which would be caused by this measure. He hinted that he would be in favour of doing something to gratify all three Churches, and he would have been right in doing so. He (Mr. Gregory) was ready to admit that if he had full power of dealing with this Church question as he thought best, he would have dealt with it in a broader and simpler manner than the present plan. He had the same feeling about these ecclesiastical endowments which was entertained by Mr. O'Connell. He considered they should be strictly applied to the uses for which they were originally intended—namely, religious purposes. He did not go so far as to say that he had conscientious objections, or that he would raise the cry of sacrilege if they were applied to objects of general utility; but he was of opinion that, so far as Ireland was concerned, more satisfaction and less irritation would have arisen had these revenues been devoted to purposes strictly religious. In fact, he would have reversed the Preamble of the present Bill, and enacted "that the property of the Church of Ireland and the proceeds thereof should be held and applied for the maintenance of the different Churches and their ministry and for the teaching of religion." He should have done this by capitalizing the property of the Established Church and dividing it between each denomination strictly according to the ratio of numbers, leaving each to deal with their own share precisely as they pleased, but with this one provision—that a glebe house and a certain number of acres should be procured for the use of clergymen of every denomination wherever a congregation of a certain size existed. There was hardly a parish in Ireland which such a course would not have cheered and gratified and brightened. Those were the opinions he had always held; but it was one thing to see one's own way, and another thing to get others to view matters like oneself. He had not been in London five days after Parliament met when he saw, —as, of course, the Government had long foreseen—that it was impossible to deal with this question in this manner had they been even so disposed. They would have been opposed by the great bulk of the Scotch Members, by the Nonconformist English Members, and by many other hon. Gentlemen who sat near him, who were neither Scotchmen nor Nonconformists, but who would not tolerate the idea of a great scheme of re-distribution, or rather of re-endowment. The attitude of so many Presbyterians in the North of Ireland, to judge by the late meeting in Belfast, objecting to any allocation of the funds to religious purposes, must have confirmed the views of the Government; and the silence of the Roman Catholics as to their acquiescence in any scheme of re-distribution, which might give rise to the imputation that the hope of gain rather than the hope of justice and equality had influenced their action, was another strong argument against the feasibility of the plan preferred by him. But what would the Conservative party have done had such a proposal been made, even had it undoubtedly been the best for the future of the Protestant Church in Ireland? It was clear they would at once have linked their fortunes with the Gentlemen below the Gangway, and have overthrown the Bill. Was he not justified in saying this—that their zeal for the Protestant Church was but secondary in comparison with a political success? Did they not remember that memorable night last year when the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Aytoun) tacked on his provision for the disendowment of Maynooth to the Resolutions of the present Prime Minister. Now the Members opposite, the friends of establishment and endowment, must have known that, if a purely collegiate endowment like Maynooth should be introduced into a measure for ecclesiastical endowment, Trinity College, the pride and boast and bulwark of the Church of England in Ireland, must go also; yet how well he (Mr. Gregory) remembered the eager anxious faces of the supporters of the late Government,—their ill concealed triumph, in the hope that the Opposition Leader would refuse this provision. But they were disappointed. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) accepted it. He kept his word—Maynooth was to be disendowed; but they had heard the ominous announcement that Trinity College was next to be overhauled. They who were Liberals rejoiced at this; but they had every reason to be indebted to the Conservative party for the absolute necessity they had forced upon the Government of immediate dealing with Trinity College. Thus it was clear that it was hopeless to think of any plan of re-distribution; and all that remained was to accept any plan that was based upon principles of equality, was immediate in its operation, and final. He (Mr. Gregory) had found these requisites in the present Bill, and he would give it his unremitting support. The right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had asked, did they think this Bill would produce calm and contentment in Ireland? He (Mr. Gregory) would not affirm that it would; but he did affirm that without such a Bill it was impossible there could be calm or contentment. There were various disturbing causes still in Ireland—a strong feeling of nationality, which the Protestant clergy seemed all of a sudden to have taken up—dissatisfaction about land and education; but he had invariably held that religious animosity, produced by religious ascendancy, had hitherto tainted and poisoned the whole atmosphere of Ireland. Everything in that island had been set awry by long-continued injustice, practised under the name and shield of religion. In the north they had the Presbyterian, Scotch in blood, character, and religion. In his own country he would have been a stout Liberal; but in Ireland he had been, until recently, a most rampant Tory. Religious animosity, and the pride of ascendancy, had done this. He (Mr. Gregory) used the words “until recently,” for the presence at that moment of the hon. Members for Belfast, Carrickfergus, and Londonderry on the Benches near him showed that another spirit was evoked, and that the men of the north preferred the concord of their country to a miserable and mischievous ascendancy. Then let them turn to the other parts of Ireland. There they had the Irish Roman Catholic peasant, deeply and even passionately attached to those above him, if kindly treated—intensely aristocratic in feeling—Conservative by thought, habit, and tradition—yet they found him allied with those who professed the most advanced and unsettling doctrines. They found also, in many instances, the Roman Catholic clergy—members of the most conservative religion under the sun—forced, by the feeling of wrong, to sympathize with their flocks, and to fight under the same banners. Religious injustice has done all this. He (Mr. Gregory) had ever before him the words of a chorus in one of the Greek tragedies when he thought of the strange position of Ireland—“The fountains of the sacred rivers flow backward to their sources, for justice is not in the land.” The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down did not raise the “No Popery” cry on this occasion; but most of the Gentlemen around him had done nothing else this autumn. They had declared this act of justice was to subjugate Ireland to the Roman Catholics, who would never be content until they had obtained that ascendancy of which we were now divesting ourselves, and that even then they would never tolerate a Protestant Government. But were these observations founded on facts? Did they remember what occurred in Canada six years ago, when war was threatening with the United States? Did the Roman Catholic Prelates assume a sullen or even doubtful attitude towards their Protestant Monarch? No; they issued addresses, calling on their Roman Catholic flocks to be loyal to the flag of England—for that under no other form of government could they enjoy more thorough equality, justice, and protection. A friend of his—Mr. Ussher, a Protestant gentleman—a few years since visited Prussia, in order to see how they managed their religious matters there. He wrote a most interesting pamphlet called The Church of Rome in its relations with Protestant Governments. He described the perfect equality that prevailed in Prussia in the dealings of the State with all religious bodies, and he summed up—

“We here see the Roman Catholic Church—far from being, as she is to us in Ireland, a source of weakness and frequent trouble—turned into an arm of strength for the State, and that not by being given any privileges or by being favoured more than other creeds, but by being simply placed on the same footing as others, suffering no disadvantages and enjoying no superiority.”

Now, he asked, could anyone suppose that Prussia could have done the great things she had done, had she been a kingdom divided against herself? Did they think if her citizens had been murdering and shooting one another to the cry of "To hell with the Pope on the Spree," or to "Perdition to Martin Luther on the Rhine"—and they had recently read of such scenes in the most prosperous and enlightened Ireland—that she would have formed a united Germany, amalgamating Protestants and Catholics into one Fatherland? And yet national weakness and national discord is what Gentlemen opposite wished to foster and maintain. They conjured up every species and variety of fear, and yet they shut their eyes to the real and greatest fear of all—a distracted and divided State. Last year the Conservative Benches resounded with every imaginable prophecy of woe; but this year the attitude of those who were called the friends of the Church was absolutely extraordinary. Instead of recognizing the verdict of the country as inevitable, and providing for the coming change by wise and prudent counsels, they seemed to look to visionary schemes of resistance, and to some kind of angelic interposition in the House of Lords. At a meeting reported that morning in the north of Ireland, the cry of "No Surrender" was raised more definitely than ever, and a rev. Prelate who took the chair, and who recommended wise and prudent counsels, was shouted at as "Judas." Was that the way to save the Church? He confessed he dreaded the future of the Church, if she were allowed to drift hopelessly without compass and without pilot and without chart. That was the real danger. Their Church had been subjected to centuries of fostering, and, if he might so call it, to hot-house care. Now she had to be exposed to the rude winds of heaven, and to take her chance—she had to enter the race with other denominations on the voluntary principle, and though, like Hamlet, they were "fat and scant of breath," the Irish Protestants seemed determined not to undergo the necessary training. Yet let them take courage, and deal with their altered circumstances like men. If they would but work out the provisions of the Bill, there would be ample means for a fresh start. "But," said hon. Gentlemen opposite, "how can the few Protestants in Ireland support their Church?" Surely the wealthiest portion of the Irish community could support an adequate ministry. But no one who had visited America ought to have any feeling of despair. He must have seen in every young and poor community, in every town which sprang up as it were in a night, commodious edifices erected for God's worship, the ministers supported, and the services conducted with solemnity and decorum. It was the voluntary zeal and united efforts of these poor communities which built these numerous and handsome churches. He said "united efforts," for he remembered walking with a Roman Catholic gentleman in the town of Trois Rivières, in Canada, where he was greatly struck by the appearance of the many and handsome churches. "This is the Protestant cathedral which we have just built," said his (Mr. Gregory's) companion. He (Mr. Gregory) was surprised, and said, "Which you built! Did you, although a Roman Catholic, contribute to a Protestant place of worship?" "Of course I did," said he, "and not only that, but our Roman Catholic Bishop was invited also to subscribe." "I cannot, of course," said the Bishop, "subscribe to an heretical Church, but I suppose you mean to put a spire on it?" "Of course," said the applicant. "Well," replied the Bishop, "that will be an ornament to the town, and I have much pleasure in subscribing my thirty dollars to its adornment." Such was the spirit on the other side of the Atlantic. He confessed that when he returned to Ireland, when he saw the offensive religious placards in the streets, reviling all that was held sacred and reverential by the great mass of Irishmen, when he read the fierce invectives in the Press against his fellow-Christians, and when he listened to the frantic denunciations in the pulpit, he felt he had got into an atmosphere where only theological salamanders could exist, and he welcomed the voluntary system or any system which would compel Irishmen to look after their own religion, and to leave their neighbours to their own worship and belief. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) had occupied nearly an hour in his essay on the necessity and advantage of the connection of Church and State. He showed that such a system had every grace and merit, and that disconnection was fraught with every mischief. But who gave the first precedent for disestablishment and disendowment? Why, the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was the main-spring. Did he not try his 'prentice hand on Jamaica? Well, he (Mr. Gregory) would not upbraid him for that; but he would bid him and his Friends around him to derive comfort and encouragement from this very act. He (Mr. Gregory) had recently cut out of The Times an account of what was going on in Jamaica, owing to the disestablishing and disendowing enactment of the Conservative Government. This account stated that though the Bishop was still in hope of Imperial assistance, yet that the Church was preparing for what must take place next year. That—

“The measure in question had produced a revulsion in the Church; that it had suddenly sprung into life and become full of activity in its operations, and exhibited an amount of earnestness and vitality never known before.”

Jamaica was thus indebted to the right hon. Gentleman, and the inference was that Ireland ere long might be similarly indebted to the right hon. Gentleman who sat opposite to him (Mr. Gladstone). Before sitting down, in addition to this crumb of comfort from Jamaica, let him give to hon. Members opposite some other encouragements from the past. Let them look at all the great successive measures of justice to Ireland which had passed, and the result of those measures. Let them begin with Catholic Emancipation. The country, according to the authority of the Duke of Wellington, was on the verge of civil war. That measure was passed, and there was at once a comparative calm. The Tithe Commutation Bill found the peasantry in a state of frenzy. It became an Act of Parliament, and there was instant peace; every single measure of justice, not excepting the Abolition of Ministers' Money, had brought with it its own blessing and reward, and yet every single one of these salutary Acts was accompanied with prophecies of ruin, and jeremiads and denunciations and invectives more lugubrious, more despairing, more menacing, than at present. Let those, then, who were swayed by the terrifying assurances of the right hon. Gentleman that the present measure was as “disastrous as foreign invasion,” take comfort from the fact that the terrors which the right hon. Gentleman was often inspiring—and which no doubt he felt—were nothing more substantial than those uncomfortable dreams, the result of a disordered stomach, from which men awoke and felt very comfortable. The right hon. Gentleman had a special fondness for arousing terrors. Here was an example of one of these bugbears. In 1861 the right hon. Gentleman addressed a meeting at Aylesbury. After harrowing his listeners by narrating to them the designs of reckless men “in the most exalted place in the realm—in Parliament,” against the Church and against religion, he proceeded to say—

“How many Bills were introduced in the last Session of Parliament, all under different forms, having one sole end in view—to undermine the Church and the most precious privileges of Churchmen. Our mode of distributing charities is called in question, our cemeteries threatened with invasion, our adversaries aim at changing our marriage laws, at ‘facilitating’ our public worship, as they pretend, and of despoiling of its national character the sacred constitution of our Church.”

“As to church rates, my opinion is well known. I believe their complete abolition would be a terrible blow struck at the alliance between Church and State, and that under no possible or imaginable circumstance should such a concession be made.”

And yet after all this he (Mr. Gregory) found the abolition of church rates passed last Session with the greatest equanimity; and he further found the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) congratulating his constituents before the late election that the church rate question was settled, “as it alienated more friends from the Establishment than the money was worth.” Thus it turned out that the most terrible blow which could be struck at the alliance of Church and State, according to the opinion of one of the heads of the Conservative party, was a subject of positive congratulation on the part of another of its Leaders, as being an actual benefit to the Church. He had no fear of the overthrow of the Protestant religion in Ireland; he had no fear but that a moderate ecclesiastical system might be substituted for the present one, if instead of abandoning themselves to resentment, or standing there, “gazing idly up into Heaven,” the heads of the Protestant Church would look their position in the face, and adapt themselves to the conditions which the Legislature was determined to impose. The Protestant laity would have to make sacrifices to support their Church, and, in making them, they would insist on the clergy availing themselves of the facilities for providing for the future which the Bill afforded. He thought the worst friends of Protestantism were the right hon. Gentleman and his followers, who counselled the Irish clergy not to avail themselves of the provisions of the Bill. Hints were thrown out that the House of Lords would reject it. He did not believe for a moment that such a suicidal course could be pursued by a body of prudent farseeing men; but this he did say, that if this Bill was thrown out, no matter on what pretext, they would see springing up in one hour, through the length and breadth of Ireland, a sullen feeling of wrath far deeper, far wider, than any that had prevailed in the wildest periods of agitation, and an impetus, the strength of which could not be measured, would be given to that conviction daily gaining ground, that justice from an English Parliament was a hopeless thing, and that it was from the great Republic of the West that "cometh their salvation." It depended on the great Liberal party to prevent such a catastrophe—it was by closing their ranks, by presenting an unbroken front, by sinking all minor differences of opinion. There were many differences of opinion. He (Mr. Gregory) might think that Maynooth ought never to have been inserted in this Bill—he might think that the compensation to Maynooth and the Presbyterians, as the payment came originally from the national income, should be defrayed from national resources and not out of these emoluments; but, on the other hand, there were other Gentlemen about him who held views very different from his, in fact, views absolutely, contradictory. He (Mr. Gregory) was ready to waive his opinions in deference to theirs for the sake of unanimity, and he in return expected similar deference from them. He was convinced that the supporters of the voluntary system would act in this cordial spirit when they considered what an enormous gain this Bill was to the principles they held, and of what vast importance it was to Ireland. If Catholic Emancipation was the foundation of religious equality in Ireland, this was the coping-stone of the edifice. He did not detract from the merits of those who passed Catholic Emancipation, they overcame the prejudices of years, and admitted their fellow-subjects to the privileges they possessed; but we were going further, we were divesting ourselves of the privileges and emoluments we possessed that our relations with our fellow-countrymen might no longer be tainted with the smallest savour of injustice. Her Majesty's Government might well affix to this Bill, when it became law, the inscription of Pope Sixtus V. on the completion of St. Peter's—

"Magnus bonos magni fundamina ponere templi,

In conclusion, he would say to those who were of the same religion as himself—let them be hopeful and not despairing; let them not confound the inner or the vital with the mere external condition of a Church; let them not take that to be essential which was but an accessory; let them not fix their gaze alone upon the gift which lay on the altar and avert their eyes from the altar which sanctified the gift. It is true they might lose the pride and pomp and wealth of a stately hierarchy; they might not have spiritual Peers of Parliament legislating exclusively for their particular form of belief, but they might have, if they only willed it, a power, a vitality, an active earnest co-operation among all their members such as they had never seen before. Their Church had never had a chance. It had ever borne along with it the damnosa hæreditas of injustice. They had been floundering and stumbling like the old pilgrim Greatheart in the Slough of Despond with a burden round their neck. That burden was injustice. They were now about to throw off that burden to reach terra firma and to stand erect an honest and a fair-dealing Church in the sight of God and of their fellow-countrymen. Let them think of all this. Let them recall the memorable words of Jeremy Taylor, words which he (Mr. Gregory) had recently quoted on the hustings, but which in this matter could not be quoted too often, words, the truth of which the conscience of every one who listened to him would recognize, words which every page of Irish history for the last 200 years confirmed, and they were these—"That a prosperous iniquity is the most unprofitable condition in the world."

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, he would not have risen at that moment to take part in this debate, but having put an Amendment on the Paper to the same purport as that which had been so ably moved by his right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire, he wished to take that early opportunity of rising to support the Motion that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He craved the indulgence of the House while he attempted to argue the question on the broad general grounds of justice; for he should avoid, as much as possible, all technical details. When a great wrong was contemplated, in amelioration of, it was alleged, some greater wrong, it was only just and proper to consider what in reality the alleged wrong was. Before they inflicted a great wrong on any man, or any class of men, they should satisfy themselves that a greater wrong was being endured by some other man, or class of men, which could only be redressed by the infliction of the wrong they contemplated; in fact, that the greater good to be effected would counterbalance the lesser wrong to be inflicted. But even that view at the best was but a rule of the Jesuits—to do evil that good might ensue—and was contrary to all morality. But in the case before them where was the wrong? The Protestants did not in any way interfere with the Roman Catholics. The latter had their own clergy, their own churches, and their own endowments, all unmolested. As to the assertion sometimes made, that they paid tithes to the Protestant Church, that had now repeatedly been shown to be utterly groundless. He quoted the late Sir George Lewis in confirmation of that—

"This grievance is commonly stated to be that the Roman Catholics are compelled to contribute by the payment of tithes to the support of a Church from the creed of which they differ. Now, in fact, the Roman Catholics, although they may pay the tithe, contribute nothing, inasmuch as in Ireland tithe is in the nature, not of a tax, but of a reserved rent, which never belonged either to the landlord or the tenant."

He contended that the remedy in this case was worse than the evil to be cured. This measure was most unjust in principle, and it was also erroneous in policy. The hon. Gentleman who last spoke laid great stress on the argument that if the Irish Church was robbed of its property there would be no lack of enthusiasts and good people to relieve her necessities and contribute to her wants; but surely it was small encouragement to the charitable to give again that endowment and those funds of which the present Government was now about to despoil her.

That process—robbing the Church with a view to fresh funds being given to her—was simply a sheep-shearing process, which would probably lead to the same result at any future time, when the fresh crop was ready for shearing again. The hon. Member appeared to think that concession had always been followed by peace and contentment in Ireland; but he must be allowed altogether to deny the truth of that assertion. The state of Ireland did not justify it. Was this measure likely to produce peace? On the contrary, it would light up the flames of religious discord, which few of them might live to see extinguished. Instead of leading to peace it would lead to incessant turmoil and renewed discontent all over the country. If no material wrong existed, why should they for a sentimental grievance disturb the most solemn engagements of centuries, and substitute the supremacy of the Pope for the rule of our Queen in Ireland? It was in every sense entirely inexpedient to make such a change. They had heard a great deal of justice—equal justice to Ireland; but what the First Minister of the Crown called justice, he could only designate as injustice; what the right hon. Gentleman called charity to lunatics, he called spoliation and sheer confiscation. There was a paragraph in the Queen's Speech with reference to this subject, which he would take the liberty of quoting. It was as follows:—

"I am persuaded that, in the prosecution of the work, you will bear a careful regard to every legitimate interest which it may involve, and that you will be governed by the constant aim to promote the welfare of religion through the principles of equal justice, to secure the action of the undivided feeling and opinion of Ireland on the side of loyalty and law, to efface the memory of former contentions, and to cherish the sympathies of an affectionate people."

Was it equal justice to take the tithe rent-charge and apply it to other purposes, and to leave the land still liable to maintain the Protestant churches and ministers? Was it so, to endow the Popish College of Maynooth with £400,000 of money robbed from the Protestant Church? How could it be said that the above conditions were carried out, when they proposed to pass a measure, repealing a vital clause of the Act of Union, and to commit an act stigmatized by the late Attorney General of Lord Palmerston's Government as a "mere act of

confiscation," affecting the interest of a loyal class, comprising the owners of eight-ninths of the landed property of Ireland, while they left the Roman Catholics in full possession of all theirs? If they were bent on carrying out an act of disestablishment, at all events leave to the Protestant Church the property which was justly her own, by private endowment and otherwise, as much as the property of the Roman Catholic Church was hers. If property given by Parliament or Royal grant many years ago, and since much improved in value, was liable at any moment to be taken away, what became of the title of properties given for public services to the ancestors of some of their noblest titles? But, he asked, was it consistent with the words he had quoted to endow the Roman College of Maynooth with very nearly £400,000 taken from the Irish Church? Would that contribute to the contentment of Ireland. Could it be called equal justice to take the tithe rent-charge now allotted to a specific purpose and apply it to another purpose, partly the endowment of a Roman Catholic College? The hon. Gentleman had rightly interpreted the feelings of the Protestant landowners; and, therefore, although their land would still be liable to tithe rent-charge, they would still be willing to support their ministers as before. And in reference to this part of the subject they had heard to-night from the Prime Minister, in answer to a Question he (Sir George Jenkinson) had asked him in the earlier part of the evening, that in taking the income of the Irish Church at £700,000, they must not calculate it at that value, because part of that consisted of glebe houses and glebe land. But could a more weak or foolish argument be used? Were not glebe houses and glebe lands of money value to a poor clergyman who occupied them? Did not anyone acquainted with practical life know that if they paid any servant so much wages per week, and in addition gave him a house and garden free, it was so much additional wages. Therefore, what could be more weak or unreal than such an argument? His argument, therefore, remained untouched—that if they gave the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth fourteen years' purchase of the income now paid to that establishment out of the Imperial Consolidated Fund, and if they took that sum—£400,000—out of the funds of the Protestant Irish Church, they were bound in justice to give to the Protestant Church at least as much out of their own funds, which, taking their income at £700,000, and multiplying it by fourteen, would give them £9,800,000, instead of the £5,700,000 now offered by this iniquitous Bill. The Bill of the Government really proposed to repeal a vital clause of the Act of Union, the 5th clause of which provided for the perpetual unity of the Church of England and Ireland. The clause was as follows:—

"That the Churches of England and Ireland, as now by law established, be united into One Protestant Episcopal Church, to be called The United Church of England and Ireland; and that the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the said United Church shall be, and shall remain in full force for ever, as the same are now by law established for the Church of England: and that the continuance and preservation of the said United Church, as the Established Church of England and Ireland, shall be deemed and taken to be an essential and fundamental part of the Union; and that in like manner the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the Church of Scotland shall remain and be preserved as the same are now established by law, and by the Acts for the Union of the Two Kingdoms of England and Scotland."

It had been said that Parliament made the Union, and that therefore Parliament could break it. Perhaps so; but it could not break one vital clause of it, and cut it and carve it, and leave the rest. It must break all or keep all, like a lease or any other covenant; and not break part, and hold part to the advantage of one set and to the injury of another set of Her Majesty's Irish subjects. The whole Act of Union must be retained intact, or repealed. In furtherance of this view he would here quote the opinion of Lord Russell, for many years the trusted Leader of the party opposite—

"In Ireland not only is there a vast proportion of the property, but also a vast proportion of members of the learned professions, and of others, whose importance cannot be denied, who are attached to the Protestant Church, and by whom anything that could be considered as at all tending to overturn the Established Church would be looked upon as placing them in a state of political inferiority to their fellow-countrymen. And besides that, we must recollect that the Act of Union made the Irish Church Establishment a part of the Church Establishment of England. From these considerations, Sir, I cannot but come to the conclusion that . . . any measure involving the destruction of that Church would involve a breach in the Act of Union; endangering the integrity of the Empire in the first place, and in the second place—considering how many years have elapsed since the Act of Union has passed into the law of the land—probably occasioning such a rent in the whole ecclesiastical constitution of these realms, that I think the Church of England would suffer deeply from such a measure.”—[3 Hansard, xlii, 1178.]

He also referred to the opinion of Lord Plunket—
